Harper's magazine.
New York, etc. : Harper & Brothers, 1850-http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437

www.hathitrust.org

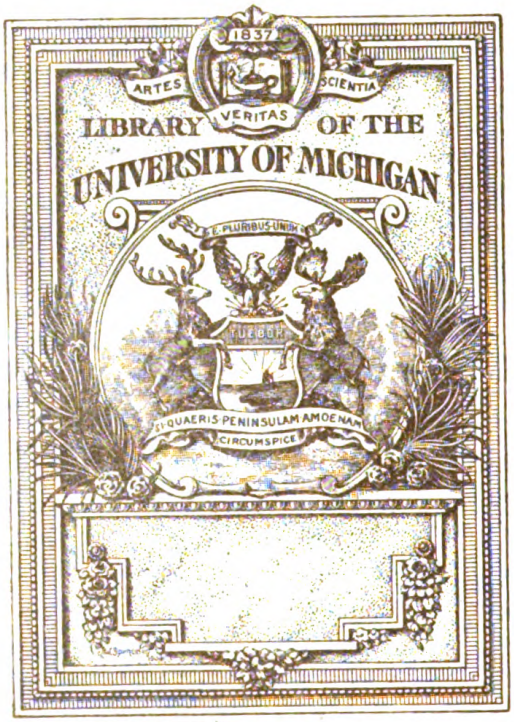
Public Domain, Google-digitized http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

We have determined this work to be in the public domain, meaning that it is not subject to copyright. Users are free to copy, use, and redistribute the work in part or in whole. It is possible that current copyright holders, heirs or the estate of the authors of individual portions of the work, such as illustrations or photographs, assert copyrights over these portions. Depending on the nature of subsequent use that is made, additional rights may need to be obtained independently of anything we can address. The digital images and OCR of this work were produced by Google, Inc. (indicated by a watermark on each page in the PageTurner). Google requests that the images and OCR not be re-hosted, redistributed or used commercially. The images are provided for educational, scholarly, non-commercial purposes.



Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

B 1,473,690

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

AP
2
.H29

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

HARPER'S

B964

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

VOLUME XXXIV.

DECEMBER, 1866, TO MAY, 1867.

NEW YORK:
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
327 to 335 PEARL STREET,
FRANKLIN SQUARE.
1867.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

CONTENTS OF VOLUME XXXIV.

ADAM GORROW ..... Elizabeth Stuart Phelps 207
AMERICAN MIND, NEW ASPECTS OF THE ..... Samuel Osgood 793
ANTIPODES ..... Alice Carey 764
AREA GATE, AT THE. (Illustrated) ..... Charles Gates 137
AT BAY ..... Elizabeth Stuart Phelps 780
AUNT SARAH'S OUTFIT ..... Katherine F. Williams 363
BALLAD OF UNCLE JOE. (Illustrated) ..... Alice Carey 1
BANKS'S RETREAT FROM THE VALLEY. (Illustrated) ..... D. H. Strother 423
BEHIND THE SCENES ..... Arthur Fleming 114
BOAT, AN OPEN, FORTY-THREE DAYS IN ..... Mark Swain 104
BOOKWRITING, TO BEGINNERS IN ..... John Home 118
BOYS, A BRACE OF ..... Fitz Hugh Ludlow 472
BRIGHT, JOHN ..... M. D. Conway 94
BURGLARY AT FAUSTEL EVERSLEIGH. (Illustrated) 27
BUSHY AND JACK ..... Mary Hose 660
CALCUTTA, THE CITY OF PALACES ..... Wm. L. Stuart 299
CALIFORNIAN CARAVANSARY, A ..... C. H. Webb 603
CAPTURE, ESCAPE, AND IMPRISONMENT. (Illustrated) ..... John S. C. Abbott 150
CHAUCER'S GRISILDIS ..... Susan M. Waring 611
CHRISTIAN NEIGHBORHOOD, A. (Illustrated) ..... Catharine E. Beecher 573
CHECK-MATE, THE IMPENDING. (Illustrated) 698
CIVIL WAR AND SOCIAL BENEFICENCE ..... O. B. Frothingham 356
CONCENTRATION IN VIRGINIA. (Illustrated) ..... D. H. Strother 714
COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE ..... James J. Belcher 382
CRETE, HISTORICAL SKETCH OF ..... S. G. W. Benjamin 758
CROCKETT'S, DAVY, ELECTIONEERING TOUR ..... J. Bethune 606
DIFFERENT POINTS OF VIEW 171
DISRAELI. (Portrait) ..... M. D. Conway 753
DODGE CLUB, THE. (Illustrated) ..... James De Mill 409, 545, 699
DRIFTING ..... N. G. Shepherd 87
EASTER HOLIDAYS ..... George C. McWhorter 589

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

DRAWER FOR DECEMBER 128
DRAWER FOR JANUARY 267
DRAWER FOR FEBRUARY 401
DRAWER FOR MARCH 536
DRAWER FOR APRIL 674
DRAWER FOR MAY 810

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

CHAIR FOR DECEMBER 120
CHAIR FOR JANUARY 258
CHAIR FOR FEBRUARY 389
CHAIR FOR MARCH 525
CHAIR FOR APRIL 663
CHAIR FOR MAY 801

FATHERS-IN-LAW, MY ..... Ellice Woodruffe 633
FISHES, SOMETHING ABOUT. (Illustrated) ..... J. V. C. Smith 286
GOLD MINE IN CONNECTICUT, OUR ..... G. W. Gesner 200
GOOD LOOKS 57

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

GOOD-MANNERS ..... George C. McWhorter 791
HEROIC DEEDS OF HEROIC MEN. (Illustrated) ..... J. S. C. Abbott 150, 559
HOHENBADEN ..... C. C. Cox 113
HOURS WITH THE DEAD ..... Arthur Fleming 197
HOW I HAPPENED TO MARRY ..... Sophie May 656
IF I WERE RICH ..... N. G. Shepherd 449
IN A STREET CAR ..... Nora Perry 374
IN THE SMOKE ..... Charles Gates 593
JIM-JIMS, THE ..... C. H. Webb 787
JOHN ECCLESTON'S THANKSGIVING ..... Nora Perry 99
JONES'S IMPUDENCE ..... W. H. Davenport 67
JOSEPHINE ..... Katherine F. Williams 734
KNICKERBOCKER'S VISIT ..... Charles E. Chamberlaine 323
LAKE SUPERIOR—THE PICTURED ROCKS. (Illustrated) ..... A. L. Rawson 681
LAST DAY ON THE PORCH ..... Arthur Hastings 83
LAST DAYS ..... Caroline Seymour 697
LAURA'S LOVERS ..... Mary N. Prescott 502
LITERARY NOTICES.

Shanks's Personal Recollections of Distinguished Generals; Holmes's Authorship of Shakspeare, 263. Spurgeon's Morning by Morning; Smith's Principia Latina, 264. Browne's American Family in Germany; Beethoven's Letters; Melville's Battle-Pieces; Botts's Great Rebellion; Nichols's Sanctuary; Sir Brooke Fosbrooke; Kissing the Rod; The Race for Wealth; All in the Dark; Madonna Mary; The Parlor Stage, 265. Photographs of Sherman's Campaigns; Laboulaye's Fairy Tales, 266.

MARCH, A FORCED ..... S. H. Dow 584
MEDICAL DELUSIONS OF THE OLDEN TIME ..... James J. Belcher 250
MONEY ARTICLE, A ..... Samuel Osgood 615
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

United States.—The October Elections, 124. The November Elections, 125. The Election in New York, 266. Constitutional Amendment in Texas, 125. Fenian Trials in Canada, 125; Mr. Seward's suggestion respecting American citizens, 125; James Stephens in New York, 126. Proposition for Impeaching the President, 267; Mr. Ashley's Charges, 530; Action of Congress, 807. The Constitutional Amendment, Message of the Governor of North Carolina, 267. The President's December Message, 393. Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, 394. Report of the Secretary of War, 396. Speech of Mr. Colfax, 397. Bills introduced into Congress, 397. Mr. Sumner's Reconstruction Resolutions, 397. Recligibility of the President, 397. Resolution for a Territorial Government for North Carolina, 397. District of Columbia Suffrage Bill, and Mr. Davis's Speech, 398, 530. Bills reported, 398. Memorials for Territorial Governments for Virginia and Louisiana, 398. Mr. Trumbull's Speech, 399. The South and the Amendment, 399. General Howard on the Condition of the Freedmen, 399. The Pacific Railways, 400. Selling and Whipping Freedmen, 400. The Ocean Yacht Race, 400. Indian Massacre in Dakotah, 400. The Tenure of Office Bill: First introduced, 397; Passed in Congress, 532; Vetoed and passed over the Veto, 807. Military Governments for the South: First Suggestion, 397; Bill as finally passed, 669; Vetoed by the President, but passed, 806. The Supplementary Bill vetoed and passed, 807. The President's Vetoes: the District of Columbia Suffrage Bill, 530; the Nebraska and Colorado Bills, 531, 808; the Military Government Bill, 806; the Supplementary Bill, 807; the Tenure of Office Bill, 807. Veto and Passage of the District Suffrage Bill, 530. Mr. Ashley's Charges against the President, 530. Mr. Kelso's Resolution, and Mr. Loan's Speech, 531. Veto of the Nebraska and Colorado Bills, 531. Mr. Ashley's Substitute for Mr. Stevens's Reconstruction Bill, 533. Speech of Mr. Raymond, 533. The Question of Reconstruction referred back to the Committee, 533. Financial Measures, 533. Passage of Bill respecting Slavery, 533. Franchise in the Territories, 534. Time for Meeting of Congress, 534. Suspending Payment for enlisted Slaves, 534. Censuring the Coolie Trade, 534. Repealing Sections of Amnesty Bill, 534. Mr. Motley and Mr. Seward, 534. The Nebraska Bill passed over the Veto, 669. The Military Government Bill as passed, 669. Summary of Action on the Bill, 670. Mr. Banks's Louisiana Proposition, 670. The New Orleans Riot, 670. Passage of the Military Government Bill, 671. Governors Brownlow and Bramlette on the Condition in Tennessee and Kentucky, 671. Murder of Union Soldiers in South Carolina, and subsequent Action, 671. Ex-Governor Brown of Georgia on the Situation, 672. Close of the Thirty-Ninth and Opening of the Fortieth Congress, 806. Election of Mr. Colfax as Speaker of the House, and Mr. Wade as President of the Senate, 806. The President's Protest against the Army Bill, 806. Veto of the Military Government Bill; its Passage over the Veto, 807. Appointment of Military Governors, 807. The Tenure of Office Bill passed over the Veto, 807. Relief of Southern Destitution, 808. Nebraska admitted into the Union, 808. Orders of District Military Commanders, 808. Freedmen's Meeting at Columbia; Speeches of Wade Hampton and others, 809. Letter from General Longstreet, 809. The Canadian Confederation, and Congressional Resolution, 809.

Southern America.—Condition in Mexico, 126. The Empress Carlotta Insane, 126. General Sheridan on our Relations, 126. Mission of Campbell and Sherman to Mexico, 267, 400. The War on the River Plata, 400, 672. Evacuation of Mexico by the French, 672. Martial Law in the Capital, 672. Spain and Chili, 672. Disturbances in Peru, 672. Troubles between Colombia and Equador, 672.

Europe.—Aspect of the Eastern Question, 125. Turkey and the European Powers, 127. Reported Alliance between Russia and Austria, 267. The Alabama Claims, 267. Reports of a Fenian Rising in Ireland, 267, 400. Colliery Explosions in England, 400. Arrest of John H. Surratt, 400. Evacuation of Rome by the French, 400. Propositions by the King of Italy to the Pope, 400. The War in Crete; Destruction of the Monastery of Arcadi, 534. New Complications of the Eastern Question, 535. Present Status of the Pope in Rome, 535. Protestant Worship prohibited in Rome, 535. Agitations in Germany, 535. Revolutionary Movements in Spain, 535. Dissolution of the French Ministry, 535. Reform movements and Bread Riots in England, 535.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MONTHLY RECORD—(Continued).
Opening of the British Parliament, 672. The Queen's Speech, 672. Reform Measures in Parliament, 673. Fenian Movement at Chester, 673. Fenian Risings in Ireland, 673, 810. Opening of the French Chambers, 673. The Emperor's Speech, 673. The new North German Confederation, 674. Prussia in the Ascendant, 674. Proposed Turkish Parliament, 674. Fenian Rising in Ireland suppressed, 810.

MOON, CHILDREN IN THE 571
MRS. PULLET'S PERVERSION ..... J. W. De Forest 646
MY LOST ALICE ..... Louise Chandler Moulton 378
NEWS, HOW WE GET OUR ..... W. F. G. Shanks 511
NEW YORK TO WASHINGTON ..... Arthur Fleming 367
OLD AUNT MATILDA ..... Alice Carey 239, 312
OLD MRS. HUNTER ..... Ellice Woodruffe 348
OUR EXPECTED GUESTS ..... D. R. Castleton 466
PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR. (Illustrated) ... D. H. Strother 172, 423, 714
PICTURED ROCKS OF LAKE SUPERIOR. (Illustrated) ..... A. L. Rawson 681
POLICE COURT, A LONDON. (Illustrated) 192
POND, THE ..... Charles Gates 752
PORTER, BENJAMIN H. (Illustrated) ..... John S. C. Abbott 559
QUIET HOUR, THE ..... N. G. Shepherd 196
RISTORI ..... Kate Fields 740
RUM CREETERS IS WOMEN ..... J. W. De Forest 484
SABLE ISLAND, THE SECRETS OF. (Illustrated) ..... Charles Hallock 4
SANTA ROSA OF LIMA ..... Mrs. E. G. Squier 88
SLACK A LITTLE ..... Benjamin V. Abbott 224
SLEEP, THE ROMANCE OF ..... James J. Belcher 638
SLEEPY HOLLOW, A REMINISCENCE OF. (Illustrated) ..... E. Guilbert 20
SPIDERS, TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND. (Illustrated) ..... B. M. Wilder 450
STREAM, THE SHADED. (Illustrated) ..... N. G. Shepherd 572
STOOL-PIGEONRY ..... Alfred L. Carroll 233
STEWART, ALEXANDER T. ..... Wm. W. Campbell 522
STRAYED AND STOLEN ..... D. R. Castleton 593
STRUGGLES FOR LIFE ..... S. T. Frost 342
STUART, GILBERT CHARLES ..... Mary Titcomb 47
SUGAR-MAKING ..... Phœbe Cary 713
TALK ABOUT TALKING ..... James J. Belcher 318
TERROR, THREE DAYS OF ..... Ellen Leonard 225
THREE HUNDRED A YEAR ..... Louise E. Chollet 235
TWENTY-THIRD OF JULY ..... Mary N. Prescott 61
TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND SPIDERS. (Illustrated) ..... B. M. Wilder 450
TWO ROPES ..... James R. Smedburg 370
VALLEY OF THE SHENANDOAH. (Illustrated) ..... D. H. Strother 172
VINE LANE ..... Wm. Wirt Sikes 50
VIRGINIANS IN TEXAS, THE ..... George F. Harrington 72, 214, 332, 492, 621, 765
WILD BILL. (Illustrated) ..... George Ward Nichols 273
WORK OF SALVATION, THE ..... Caroline Chesebro 35
YVON AND FINETTE. (Illustrated) ..... Edouard Laboulaye 138

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

1. Uncle Joe Afield 1
2. Uncle Joe at Home 2
3. Uncle Joe at Rest 3
4. Going to a Wreck 4
5. House of Refuge, Sable Island 7
6. Head-Quarters, Sable Island 8
7. Mare and Foal 11
8. The Patrol 14
9. Stripping the Wreck 15
10. The Camp 16
11. The Videttes 17
12. Chasing Wild Ponies 18
13. In Memoriam, Sable Island 19
14. The Old Mill, Sleepy Hollow 20
15. The Andrè Monument 21
16. Bridge over the Pocantico 22
17. The Old Dutch Church, Sleepy Hollow 22
18. Vlypse's Castle 23
19. Grave of Washington Irving 24
20. Memorial Church to Irving 26
21. In the Woods, Faustel Eversleigh 29
22. What ought I to do? 32
23. At the Area Gate 137
24. Fairy Lore 138
25. Yvon and the Wolf 138
26. Fearless and the Giant 139
27. The Fiery Horse 141
28. Polyphemus 143
29. The Bailiff and the Tongs 146
30. Dragged Down-Hill 147
31. Dragged Up-Hill 147
32. A Broomstick Trip 149
33. Portrait of J. R. Hurd 150
34. In Prison at Richmond 153
35. Portrait of W. H. Raynor 154
36. Capture of Raynor 154
37. Portrait of C. J. Murphy 156
38. Passing the Guard 159
39. The Line of March 161
40. Possum Dar! 163
41. Crossing the Pamunky 164
42. A Mutual Scare 166
43. Crossing the Potomac 169
44. A Bushwhacker in Virginia 172
45. How the Idea got into their Heads 177
46. Locust Grove 179
47. Union People in Virginia 182
48. Rebel Troopers at Breakfast 185
49. Serfdom 186
50. Kernstown 188
51. Turner Ashby 189
52. After the Battle 190
53. Thanksgiving for the Victory 191
54. London Police Magistrate 192
55. Old Thief and Young Witness 193
56. A Greenwich Diner 194
57. Acquitted 194
58. Sent for Trial 194
59. The Frequent Visitor 195
60. Friends and Relatives of Prisoners 195
61. Wild Bill 273
62. Putting upon Him 276
63. Are you satisfied? 277
64. For Life or Death 278
65. Black Nell 280
66. Taking to the Water 282
67. The Warning 283
68. The Struggle for Life 284
69. The Farewell 285
70. Fishes: The Perch Family 286
71. Fishes: Spine-Rayed 287
72. Fishes: The Carp Family 288
73. Fishes: The Pike Family 288
74. Fishes: Cat-Fish and Horned Pout ... 289
75. Fishes: The Salmon Family 289
76. Fishes: The Herring Family 290
77. Fishes: The Cod Family 290
78. Fishes: The Flat-Fish Family 291
79. Fishes: Salt-Water Suckers 292
80. Horned Ray, or Sea-Devil 292
81. Fishes: The Eel Family 293
82. Fishes: The Lamprey Family 293
83. Fishes: The Soft-Rayed 294
84. Long-Beaked Chelmon 294

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

85. Fishes: The Ray Family..... 295
86. The Pilot-Fish 295
87. Fishes: The Shark Family 296
88. Fishes: The Sturgeon and Chimæra 297
89. An Aquarium 298
90. Calcutta—The Landing-Place..... 299
91. Entrance to the Hoogly..... 300
92. Scene on the Hoogly..... 300
93. Bum-Boat at Calcutta..... 301
94. Black Town, Calcutta 302
95. A Hindoo Devotee..... 303
96. A Palkee 303
97. Zig-Zag Lane, Calcutta..... 304
98. Sailors Ashore 305
99. A Collision..... 306
100. On a Drive 307
101. An Upset 307
102. Caderpoor, below Calcutta 308
103. An Elephant Ride..... 308
104. A Juvenile Juggler 309
105. Contortionist and Sword-Player 310
106. The Burning Ghât, Calcutta..... 311
107. The Dodge Club: Dick! 409
108. Here I invite my Friends..... 410
109. The Club Assembled..... 411
110. The Place Vendôme 412
111. Keep it, Buttons! 413
112. That's a Hotel Bill..... 414
113. Cicero against Verres..... 415
114. Sac-r-r-r-ré! 416
115. Number 729..... 417
116. Horror! Despair!..... 418
117. Those Italians! 419
118. Genoa the Superb 420
119. Their Noble Excellencies..... 421
120. Lazaroni and Macaroni 422
121. Interior of a Tent..... 423
122. The Fortsmouth..... 424
123. The Narrow Passage 427
124. An Explosion..... 430
125. Burnt Railroad Bridge..... 431
126. The Peaked Mountain 434
127. You know Swartz! 438
128. Mushroom Aristocracy..... 439
129. Jordan a hard Road to travel 446
130. Lowering the Flag 448
131. The James Island Spider..... 450
132. Cocoon of James Island Spider..... 451
133. Interior of Cocoon..... 452
134. The Scorpion 453
135. The Mygale, or Trap-Door Spider.... 453
136. A Spider in the Egg 453
137. Young Spider in the Egg..... 454
138. Reel for Spider's Silk..... 455
139. The Nephila Plumipes 456
140. Body of House Spider..... 457
141. A Torn Cocoon 458
142–147. Cocoons of Spiders..... 461
148. Web of Epeira Riparia..... 465
149. The Dodge Club: Yankee Doodle... 545
150. I kiss Hands! 546
151. The Young Hussar..... 547
152. A perplexed Senator..... 548
153. Exit the Senator..... 549
154. Darn it!—Don't!..... 551
155. Thump! 552
156. A Trying Moment..... 553
157. Senator and Donkey..... 554
158. Do you see that? 556
159. The Mill at Pæstum 558
160. Portrait of Benjamin H. Porter..... 559
161. Porter at Roanoke..... 561
162. Porter exploring Charleston Harbor... 563
163. The Assault on Fort Sumter..... 565
164. Porter in Prison..... 567
165. Death of Porter..... 570
166. The Shaded Stream..... 572
167. A Christian Home..... 573
168. Ground-Plan of Home 581
169. Dressing-Table 582
170. Plan of Chambers 583
171. Pictured Rocks: The Chapel 681
172. Indian Dogs 682
173. Grand Island Harbor..... 683
174. Bill Lemm..... 684
175. First Inhabitant of Munising 684
176. Miner's Castle, Lake Superior..... 685
177. Sail Rock, Lake Superior..... 686
178. Exterior of Grand Portal..... 687
179. Chapel Beach and Bluff..... 688
180. The Cascade, Lake Superior 689
181. The Amphitheatre, Lake Superior.... 690
182. Interior of Grand Portal 692
183. The Grand Sable, Lake Superior..... 694
184. F. Wilson, Esq. 695
185. Mr. Williams 695
186. Doxtater..... 696
187. Bully..... 696
188. The Guide, Marquette 697
189. The Impending Check-Mate 698
190. The Dodge-Club: The Spaniards.... 699
191. A Thousand Pardons! 700

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

192. The Senator..... 702
193. Villa of Diomedes, Pompeii..... 703
194. Phew!..... 704
195. A Street in Pompeii 705
196. The Ascent of Vesuvius 707
197. The Descent of Vesuvius..... 708
198. Where's Figgs?..... 709
199. Where Mr. Figgs was 711
200. The Ladies..... 712
201. The Mountaineers of Virginia..... 714
202. Harper's Ferry Revisited 715
203. Below the Blue Ridge..... 716
204. At the Rebels' Gate..... 723
205. Refugees Returning..... 723
206. Up with the Flag again!..... 724
207. The Union Man's House..... 725
208. I was in Hopes..... 726
209. Is it Constitutional?.. 727
210. The Road to Winchester..... 731
211. Benjamin Disraeli..... 753

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

NO. CXCIX.—DECEMBER, 1866.—VOL. XXXIV.

Ballad of Uncle Joe.

WHEN I was young—it seems as though
There never were such when—
There lived a man that now I know
Was just the best of men;
I'll name him to you, "Uncle Joe,"
For so we called him then.

A poor man he, that for his bread
Must work with might and main.
The humble roof above his head
Scarce kept him from the rain;
But so his dog and he were fed,
He sought no other gain.

His steel-blue axe, it was his pride,
And over wood and wave
Its music rang out far and wide,
His strokes they were so brave;
Excepting that some neighbor died,
And then he dug his grave.

And whether it were wife or child,
An old man, or a maid,
An infant that had hardly smiled,
Or youth, so lowly laid,
The yellow earth was always piled Above them by his spade.

For spade he had, and grubbing-hoe,
And hence the people said
It was not much that Uncle Joe
Should bury all the dead;
So rich and poor, and high and low,
He made them each a bed.

The funeral-bell was like a jog
Upon his wits, they say,
That made him leave his half-cut log
At any time of day,
And whistle to his brindle dog,
And light his pipe of clay.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1866, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

VOL. XXXIV.—No. 199.—A

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

When winter winds around him drave,
And made the snow-flakes spin,
I've seen him—for he did not save
His strength, for thick nor thin—
His bare head just above the grave
That he was standing in.

His simple mind was almost dark
To school-lore, that is true;
The wisdom he had gained at work
Was nearly all he knew;
But ah, the way he made his mark
Was honest, through and through!

'Twas not among the rulers then
That he in council sat;
They used to say that with his pen
His fingers were not pat;
But he was still a gentleman
For all and all of that.

The preacher in his silken gown
Was not so well at ease
As he, with collar lopping down
And patches at his knees,
The envy of our little town.
He hadn't a soul to please;

Nor wife nor brother, chick nor child,
Nor any kith nor kin.
Perhaps the townsfolk were beguiled
And the envy was a sin,
But his look of sweetness when he smiled
Betokened joy within.

He sometimes took his holiday,
And 'twas a pleasant sight
To see him smoke his pipe of clay,
As if all the world went right,
While his brindle dog beside him lay
A-winking at the light.

He took his holiday, and so
His face with gladness shone;
But, ah! I can not make you know
One bliss he held alone,
Unless the heart of Uncle Joe
Were beating in your own!

He had an old cracked violin,
And I just may whisper you
The music was so weak and thin
'Twas like to an ado,
As he drew the long bow out and in
To all the tune he knew.

From January on till June,
And back again to snow,
Or in the tender light o' the moon,
Or by the hearth-fire's glow,
To that old-fashioned, crazy tune
He made his elbow go!

Ah! then his smile would come so sweet
It brightened all the air,
And heel and toe would beat and beat
Till the ground of grass was bare,
As if that little lady feet
Were dancing with him there!

His finger nails, so bruised and flat,
Would grow in this employ
To such a rosy roundness that
He almost seemed a boy,
And even the old crape on his hat
Would tremble as with joy.

So, digging graves, and chopping wood,
He spent the busy day,
And always, as a wise man should,
Kept evil thoughts at bay;
For when he could not speak the good,
He hadn't a word to say.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

And so the years in shine and storm
Went by, as years will go,
Until at last his palsied arm
Could hardly draw the bow;
Until he crooked through all his form,
Much like his grubbing-hoe.

And then his axe he deeply set,
And on the wall-side pegs
Hung hoe and spade; no fear nor fret
That life was at the dregs,
But walked about of a warm day yet,
With his dog between his legs.

Sometimes, as one who almost grieves,
His memory would recall
The merry-making Christmas-eves,
The frolic, and the ball,
Till his hands would shake like withered leaves,
And his pipe go out and fall.

Then all his face would grow as bright—
So I have oft heard say—
As if that, being lost in the night,
He saw the dawn o' the day;
As if from a churlish, chilling height
He saw the light o' the May.

One winter night the fiddle-bow
His fingers ceased to tease,
And they found him by the morning glow
Beneath his door-yard trees,
Wrapt in the ermine of the snow,
And royally at ease.

What matter that the winds were wild?
He did not hear their din,
But hugging, as it were his child,
Against his grizzly chin,
The treasure of his life, he smiled,
For all was peace within.

And when they drew the vest apart
To fold the hands away
They found a picture past all art
Of painting, so they say;
And they turned the face upon the heart,
And left it where it lay.

And one, a boy with golden head,
Made haste and strung full soon
The crazy viol; for he said,
Mayhap beneath the moon
They danced sometime a merry tread
To the belovéd tune.

And many an eye with tears was dim
The while his corse they bore;
No hands had ever worked for him
Since he was born before;
Nor could there come an hour so grim
That he should need them more.

The viol, ready tuned to play,
The sadly-silent bow,
The axe, the pipe of yellow clay,
Are in his grave so low;
And there is nothing more to say
Of poor old Uncle Joe.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE SECRETS OF SABLE ISLAND.*

GOING TO A WRECK.

ON the charts of the northeast Atlantic coast, in about latitude 44° and longitude 59°, eighty or ninety miles southeast from Nova Scotia, is laid down the Island of Sable. It is needless to be precise about the locality, which is often, alas! too easily found; and few are prompted by mere curiosity to seek it out. Neither would accuracy avail the mariner to avoid it, for he is treading the very threshold of danger when full thirty miles distant, and the Island quite out of sight below the horizon. Like the monster polypus of ancient story, it lieth in the very track of commerce, stretching out its huge tentacles for its prey, enveloped in fogs and mists, and scarcely distinguishable from the gray surf that unceasingly lashes its shores. Insidious currents sweep round it in most erratic course—perpetual almoners to its insatiate maw. Vessels lose their reckoning, and are often in the very jaws of destruction when they imagine themselves far from danger. The junction of the Gulf Stream and the waters of the St. Lawrence form eddies which inevitably sweep them upon the shoals. Once a sealed dispatch boat was sent out from the Island before a southeast gale, in hope that it might carry tidings to the main land, but in thirteen days it came back to a point within six miles from whence it started!

The whole region for leagues around is a trap and a snare. One sunken bar stretches sixteen miles away to the northeast; another, twenty-eight miles to the northwest. The embrace of these long arms is death, for between them lie alternate deeps and shoals, and when the sea is angry it thunders and reverberates along a front of thirty miles, extending twenty-eight miles to seaward. No light-house throws its warning gleam beyond this seething death-line, for stone structures will not stand upon the ever-shifting sands, and wooden ones of sufficient height could not withstand the storms. The mariner drifts to his grave through total gloom. Between the years 1806–27 forty vessels, and it is supposed many more, were lost. The whole Island bristles with stark timbers and the débris of wrecks. How many of them are the dumb witnesses of an untold tale!

Imagination may run fancy-free through the field of romance that invests the Isle of Sable. Strange traditions have such close alliance there with stranger facts, that truth and fiction become synonymous to the eager ear that listens. To the credulous fisherman or superstitious sailor the tale need be but told to be believed. Ask the wayfarer, who perchance was cast upon its mysterious shores, what he saw and heard there, and he will shake his head in silence; he has no disposition to unearth its secrets. Even the hardy wreckers, who serve humanity upon its treacherous sands, patrol its

* The writer is indebted to J. Bernard Gilpin, M.D., M.R.C.S., of Halifax, Nova Scotia, for valuable sketches and many interesting facts.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

precincts with a kind of awe, and crouch by the hearth at night when the storm rages fiercest; for at such a time ghostly shadows are often seen to flit from point to point, strange lights gleam and vanish, shrill cries, hoarse voices giving commands, and rattling of chains mingle with the thunder of the surf. But when the indefatigable "look-out" trudges forth to the beach after a storm he can seldom find palpable evidences of these invisible things—no shattered wrecks or swollen corpses upon the beach. All those clamors and wails of distress were but empty sounds signifying nothing! Yet the self-same ghostly voices were heard three hundred years ago on that fatal day, the 28th of August, 1583, when the intrepid Sir Humphrey Gilbert lost his finest ship. The historian tells us that they "scared the helmsman from his post;" and shortly afterward the vessel beat to pieces on the Northeast Bar. Only twelve men survived the dread disaster. These escaped in a boat to the Nova Scotia coast, and from them we gain our first definite acquaintance with Sable Island, signalized by the holocaust of one hundred men to its insatiable shoals.

That the locality is most trying to superstitious nerves we can well conceive. When human skeletons start unbidden from their resting-places in broad daylight, fancy is apt to run wild among the spectres that darkness conjures up. There is a preternatural shifting of scenes after every violent storm. Sandy hillocks fifty feet high, that have been landmarks for a generation, have tumbled into the sea; mountains of sand are piled to-day where yesterday the ground was level as a floor. Old wrecks, long buried, come forth to view. Scores of human skeletons are unearthed. Acres of land have disappeared beneath the sea, and old inlets are filled up, and hidden treasure is revealed. Since 1820 five or six miles of the west end of the Island have been submerged, and the ocean now rolls fathoms deep where the Superintendent's house formerly stood, and three miles out to sea. No secure anchorage in this world's haven have the heroic little community who occupy here to rescue life and property.

Norse tradition credits the first discovery of Sable Island to the bold Bjorn Heriafson, in the ninth century. From that period history is for a long time silent; but we know that it must have had occasional visitors, for in 1553 a company of "Portingals" were induced by favorable report to stock it with swine and cattle, which they left there to breed, and for which act, whether prompted by humane or speculative motives, many a shipwrecked mariner for years after had great cause to bless them. The survivors of Sir Humphrey Gilbert's disaster found them to have greatly multiplied; and in 1635 they are said to have numbered fully 800 head. The Island was doubtless well known to the French when they colonized Acadie; for it was made a penal colony in 1598, when forty French convicts were landed there by the Marquis De la Roche and left to their fate. Seven years afterward a vessel was sent out by royal command to take them back to France, but only twelve survived to tell the story of their sufferings—gaunt and bearded creatures clad in seal-skins, scarred by many a combat with seals and sea-lions, and scathed by the pitiless storms of winter, which they weathered without a shelter, until a wreck afforded them materials for a hut. The recital of their sufferings before the Court of Henry IV. earned them a free pardon and fifty golden crowns apiece; but hard as their experience had been, it nevertheless possessed sufficient attractions to lure them back, now self-exiled, to their former home, where they long plied a prosperous trade in furs. Traces of their abode still remain. The "French Gardens" are pointed out to the curious, and it is said that the ghost of a certain Paris gentleman always appears to wrecked Frenchmen, and complains of King Henry for robbing him of his wife, and banishing him there for no crime, along with the convicts of 1598.

At that time Sable Island abounded in black foxes, invaluable for their skins, which to this day bring fabulous prices; but these have long since disappeared. The great morse, or walrus, also made their home there and reared their young. They, too, have departed, though even within late years curiosity has occasionally lured them back to their old haunts; and they have been seen by people now living basking upon the sands, long after more northern localities were deserted by their kind. Their huge, long-tusked skulls are frequently found half hidden in the sand, not less the objects of curiosity to the naturalist than of wonder to the ignorant. Not long ago a stupid fisherman collected his gaping comrades and exhibited one of these with tusks inverted, which he averred was the skull of a gigantic goat. Perhaps, some future day, some savant will find his skull exhumed and exhibit it as that of a gigantic ass whose species is extinct.

Subsequently, and up to the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Island was much resorted to by fishermen; and as wrecks multiplied with the increase of commerce the cupidity of bad men was excited, and the Island became the abode of wreckers and pirates and vagabonds of infamous character. Few who survived shipwreck, to reach its then inhospitable shores, ever lived to bear their story to the main land; but jewels and articles of rare value were often exhibited confidentially as having come from there, and many an adventurer, who left his home for clandestine voyage, returned not long after with galore of wealth. Then, by-and-by, horrid tales of blood began to be whispered about, and the Isle of Sable became an ill-omened name, at which people shuddered and turned pale, less because the winds and waves were merciless than on account of man's horrid inhumanity to man. Here, secure from reach of the law, and protected by the very

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google dangers which multiplied his victims, the wrecker plied his murderous calling. This dark and bloody ground could furnish materials for a hundred romances, whose recital would make the blood run cold; but such volume of the Island's history must ever remain sealed to mortal ken.

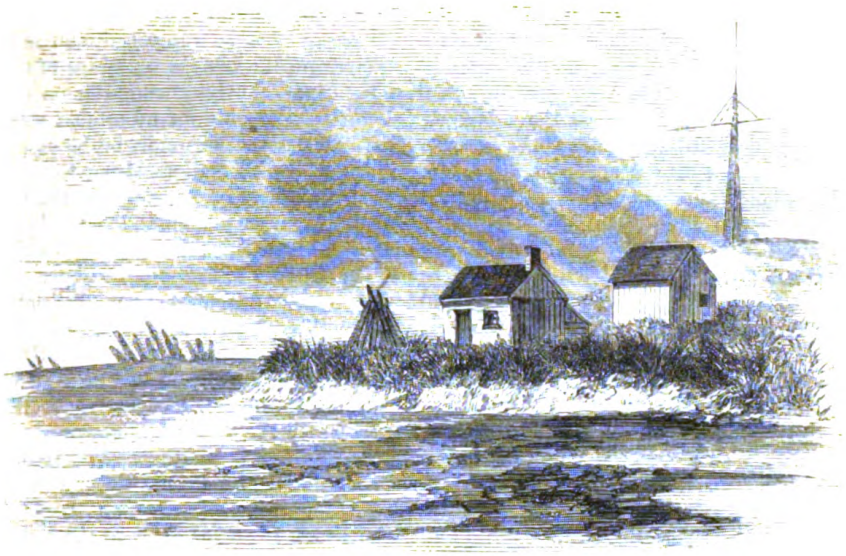
It is a relief to turn from this tragic period to the opening of the present century, when humanity prompted the philanthropists of Nova Scotia, headed by the Executive, to lay the foundation of the present Relief Establishment, whose usefulness every commercial country has had mournful occasion to acknowledge. That which brought the project under immediate consideration was the wreck of the transport Princess Amelia, having on board the furniture of Prince Edward, the present good Queen's father, with recruits, officers, and servants to the number of two hundred, all of whom perished—though it is supposed that some reached the shore and were murdered by the pirates. A vessel was sent from Halifax to inquire after them, and she also was wrecked. The Provincial Legislature at once took action. By recommendation of the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir John Wentworth, a sum was appropriated for the construction of suitable buildings, the vagabonds that infested the Island were driven off, and in 1802 the present Establishment was founded. In 1804 an annual allowance of $1600 was voted for its support, and Edward Hodgson was appointed Superintendent, who, with a crew of four men, volunteered their services. His salary was $400 and "found." This was the beginning; and the satisfactory result a saving of forty-one lives, and property to the value of $9200, up to July of 1804. In 1808 sixteen persons were employed on the Island. In 1812 the Commissioners reported that the Establishment was inadequate to effect the humane purposes for which it was designed, so frequent were the wrecks and so insufficient the apparatus for rescuing life and property.

But it seems that little improvement was effected for several years, for in 1825 came a second appeal — this time from the philanthropic Sir James Kempt, and addressed to the British Government. It proved effectual. During all this previous period the Establishment had been solely supported by the poor province of Nova Scotia, although the commerce of almost every nation reaped its benefits more than she. It is true that correspondence was opened with some Boston merchants soliciting their co-operation, but the parties differed as to terms, and nothing resulted. But in 1826, answering Sir James Kempt's appeal, the British Government appropriated $2000, which increased the annual fund to $3600. Henceforward improvement was steadily visible. The old Superintendent died, and Captain Joseph Darby succeeded him, under an able Board of Commissioners, composed of Sir Samuel Cunard, Captain Maynard (both now dead), and Jacob Miller. New apparatus was added, and in 1833 the stanch buildings now standing were erected. They are fitted up with all the modern life-saving appliances and conveniences for wrecked seamen, with ample provisions for months. As many as 300 wrecked people have been provided for together. In 1833 the Establishment was also out of debt for the first time. Its annual expenses often exceed the appropriation, but the deficit is made up by salvages and the produce of the Island. Wrecked materials are always sold for the benefit of the owners, and the salvages come out of the proceeds. The credits have sometimes amounted to nearly $3000 in a single year. It is a natural question why great gains do not accrue where so large an amount of treasure lies buried; and why the Island people do not employ their leisure time in digging for hidden wealth? Echo answers, "Why?" One thing is certain, the Government will not permit a search, probably from fear of exciting the cupidity of the men. It is said that a certain vessel now lies buried in the sand which is positively known to contain a large amount of silver-plate; but it is doomed to remain unearthed forever, unless a gale of wind shall some day lay it bare.



No person is permitted to reside upon the Island without a license. Nevertheless, applications for this humane but dangerous service are numerous. It is a life of isolation and dull monotony, whose daily routine is varied only by a wreck, a chase after wild ponies, a scrimmage with the great Greenland seals that bask upon the bars, or the welcome arrival of the Government cutter, which periodically visits the Island to carry supplies and bring off wrecked persons. Here is a specimen leaf from Captain Darby's diary:

"June 6; morning. Wind S.S.W.; cloudy. No reports from the look-outs. Sent the men and horses to the wrecks to haul wood. Empty barrel came ashore at noon. Wind, evening, S.E."

A whole day's existence embraced in a meagre record of twice a dozen words—a waif upon the tide of life as empty and insignificant as the barrel that drifted ashore! So pass the long days for months, varying little. The live-stock have to be fed and cared for. There is the little garden to be tilled, with its patches of potatoes, cabbages, and turnips. The needed supply of wood must be gathered; hay is to be made in its season, and buildings to be repaired. Sometimes there is a fishing excursion, a search for cranberries, or a hunt for wild rabbits.

But at length an eventful era dawns. It is a calm day in June; a light breeze scarcely ripples the sea, which now wears its fairest guise. The long belt of surf that fringes the Island glitters dazzlingly in the sunshine, and the gulls and wild-fowls are feeding far out to sea. Seldom has the picture so brilliant a setting. In the hour of this repose a signal-flag is seen to mount the tall flag-staff of the Look-out Station at the West End, and before it has

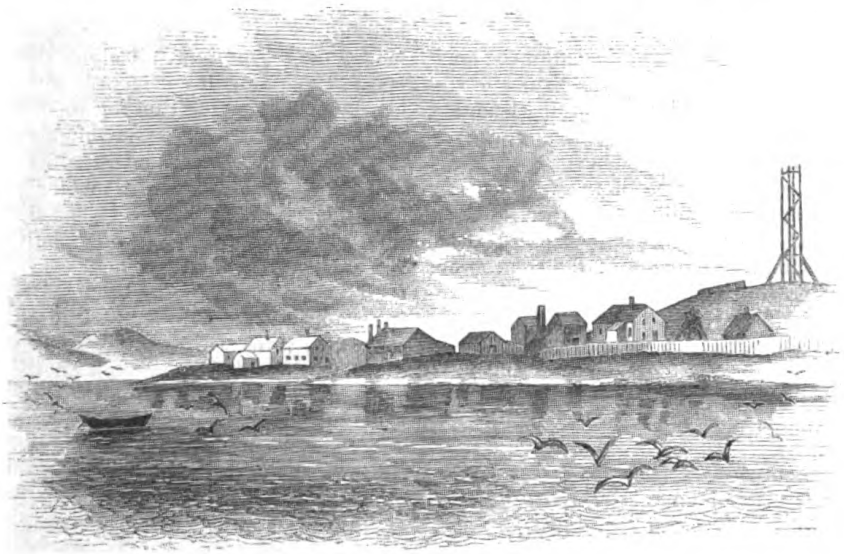
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HOUSE OF REFUGE AND LOOK-OUT STATION.

fairly shaken itself to the breeze a responsive signal rises to the mast-head on the high hill at Head-quarters, nine miles away. There is a speck in the offing, and with a good glass the long-expected cutter is plainly seen standing in, with her red ensign flying at the peak. There is joy on the Island; and if one on board the vessel were near enough to distinguish objects he would observe a commotion in the little hive on shore. Over the sandy hills and along the beach the outpost men are galloping their shaggy ponies in hot haste to Head-quarters, recalled by the signal-flag. There is bustle and preparation at the barn and boat-house, and the whole community of men and animals seem to have turned out of doors at some unwonted cause of excitement. The dogs bark in chorus, and frisk and tumble in the sand; barefooted urchins halloo and scream; and a patriarch rooster even mounts a post and crows at an unusual hour.

To the stranger on board the cutter the landscape that gradually rises to view is one of singular novelty, and not without its beauties, while the whole situation possesses an absorbing interest. Petrels flit and hover in his wake, and dip into the surface of the fatal current that now flows peacefully in such well-dissembled mien. There is a sense of exhilaration in thus daring the dangers of the treacherous deep and braving its angry passions—an excitement in the knowledge that a sudden change of wind will compel the vessel to claw off the coast at once, and run to sea for life; and while the nerves are strained to fullest tension the great sea-gulls come out from land and scream at his temerity. They wheel swiftly overhead, and seem enraged because the waves do not this time bear death and destruction upon their crests. An Island record shows that for a certain period of four months there were not five calm days; and another journal states that it has sometimes taken the cutter eight days to come to anchor; but now the calm serenity is real, not feigned. Gradually the line of low, dark hummocks, that have for some time limned the horizon, loom up and resolve themselves into high hills fringed by breakers. A zone of glistening surf beats in solemn monotone upon the dazzling beach as far as the eye can reach. Bare conical sand-hills, mottled with patches of green, or crested with rank, waving grass, rise up in most fantastic shapes, over and around which myriads of birds are hovering.

Passing the western extremity, new scenes are opened to view—the West-end Look-out and Flag-staff surmounting a grass-grown knoll, with the House of Refuge (most welcome sight to mariners cast away!) standing near at hand upon a plateau of waving grass that most delightfully relieves the barrenness of the adjacent landscape. And now, all along the foaming beach, came startling evidences in quick succession of the dangers and terrors of this dread locality—grim wrecks and whitening ribs of vessels washed by the waves, or high and dry, half buried in the sand. A melancholy interest attaches to every object; but there is no time now to indulge a contemplative mood. The cutter sweeps past a high cone that has obstructed the vision, and suddenly the tall flag-staff and crow's-nest at Head-quarters is opened to view, with its red ensign waving a welcome upon the highest hill on the Island, and a cluster of neat cottages brooding together at the foot, adorning a picture as peaceful as a midsummer scene in a New England village. While the heart is fairly leaping with the joys of a new sensation the cutter rounds to, in five fathoms' water, a short distance from the shore, and before her anchor has firmly



Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

griped the bottom dark objects begin to dot the beach. Down gallop the ponies into the very edge of the surf, drawing a life-boat on a broad-wheeled cart, throwing up the sand in jets as they run. It is but the work of a few minutes to launch, man, breast the breakers, pull away, and board. Then follows many a rough greeting and hearty hand-shaking in the style of good old-fashioned friendship, and such as only those can appreciate who have been shut out from the world for months and seen no faces but their familiar own. There are eager inquiries for news from the Island and shore, and a demand for letters and papers. These are in part hastily satisfied, and then precious little time is required to tumble into the boat and pull lustily for shore.

The graceful cutter rapidly drops astern, sitting like a duck on the water, with her anchor apeak, and her mainsail hoisted and shaking, ready to run to sea at a moment's warning. On either side bullet-headed seals bob up and down in the waves or frisk in the foam just ahead; and as the boat rides in on the mounting crest of a comber, under a long, strong pull of the oars and the steady eye and sure arm of the steersman, the novice holds his breath hard and gripes the thwarts nervously when the keel strikes the sand high up the beach, and the waters seethe, struggle, and recede. In an instant the crew are overboard holding hard the boat on either side against the reflux wave. There is a momentary pause; another billow mounts high astern, breaks, and surges upward, drenching the crew to the skin, while with a vigorous run they bear her high up out of the breakers. But the more dainty passenger steps dry shod upon terra firma, and joins the procession of men and horses which by this time are dragging the boat back to Head-quarters.

Toiling through the deep and yielding sand they plod slowly through a ravine, and presently turn into a broad, grassy valley, sheltered by lofty hills which completely shut them in from the ocean. Here, ranged around an irregular square, are the several buildings of the principal station—the comfortable house of the Superintendent, where a hospitable welcome always awaits the stranger, be he casual visitor or castaway; the Sailors' Home for shipwrecked crews; substantial quarters for the men; two or three large stores and boat-houses; the blacksmith's shop, oil-house, and outbuildings. There is also a well-stocked barn and barn-yard, where one may hear the low of kine and the cackle of domestic fowls. There are pigs and horses, and a garden neatly inclosed. And conspicuous over all, on a neighboring hill, towers the tall flag-staff and crow's-nest, from which the entire Island can be scanned at a glance in clear weather. Just in front of the little hamlet, and down a sloping beach, a boat lies tranquilly at anchor on the bosom of a lake which stretches away to the right and left for fifteen miles, in varying outline of shore. Wild fowls are floating on its surface, and here and there a bearded seal may be seen sporting. So sudden and complete is the transition from the former scene that one might fancy himself in some sequestered inland vale but for the eternal roar of the surf dinning in his ears.

The various buildings of the Establishment are constructed of thick plank to resist the violence of the storms. Some are neatly painted, and there is an air of snug and cheerful comfort within and without; yet every where, on chimney-piece, door-post, and gable, some mute waif from the sea is ever at hand to remind one that this Island is the drill-room of storms and the region of perils. In the Superintendent's house is a fine library of five hundred volumes, in great part the gift of the philanthropic Miss Dix who once visited here; but there is among them many a volume whose stained leaves and shrunken covers show that they are offerings

HEAD-QUARTERS.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

from the sea. A carved figure-head over the entrance is the sole memento of some nameless disaster. Even the very wood-pile consists of wrecked timbers and planks bristling with spikes and bored with many a tree-nailed hole. In the boat-houses are metallic life-boats, with mortars and lines, hawsers, and signal-guns. The store-houses contain provisions, packages of clothing, and other requisites for wrecked seamen. Here, too, is the Home for Sailors, and on its gable end is a board from which beams forth a single word of constant welcome and encouragement, and that word is "Hope."

While mind and eye have been engaged in contemplation of these novel scenes the shadows have crept far down the hills into the valley. The sky is ruddy in the west, and a day of unusual calm draws near its close. The stores have been safely and laboriously landed from the cutter, and the men lounge listlessly about the quarters. Presently the peal of a wrecked ship's bell rings out clear and full, summoning the household to prayers. The Superintendent takes position behind an old capstan in front of "Government House," and prepares to read the service, while the hardy wreckers, bronzed and weather-beaten, gather round in quiet decorum; and many an attentive eye regards the portly form of the old "sea dog" as he repeats the lesson of the day. The picture with its surroundings is sublimely characteristic, but none can paint the steady beat of the surf falling in mournful cadence upon the shore, or the damp, salt odor of wrecks with which the very atmosphere seems tainted. The old man is dead now, but many will often recall to mind the grim and rugged features and iron-gray locks of him who officiated at these little seasons of devotion, or the fashion with which, with pardonable vanity, he was wont to decorate himself with the medals and rewards of worthy service which he had so justly won.

With the dawn of day all is bustle and busy preparation. Some stores have to be taken down the lake to the outpost station at the south side, three miles away. The teamster has hitched three scrubby ponies into a clumsy wagon with tires full eight inches broad, and when the load is on he drives out into the shallow lake, axle-deep, to where a quaintly-constructed boat is waiting to receive the cargo. If the wind be fair the journey to the station is easy. Here lives Solomon Knox and family in solitary independence, and here, as at other stations, is the inevitable wood-pile of planks and spars standing on end; here is Solomon's barn and garden, and here the flag-staff and look-out. Solomon is one of the most sagacious and daring boatmen ever employed on the Island. His life is a history of hair-breadth escapes and acts of noble bravery, to some of which well-prized medals bear testimony. There is nothing of special interest here or by the way, though the varying shores of the lake are ever attractive to the eye of a stranger.

"Lake Wallace" is one of the many remarkable features of Sable Island. The Island itself is bent like a bow, and the lake follows its trend for half its length, and occupies one-half its breadth, which in no place is more than a mile and a half wide. Its greatest depth is fifteen feet. In some localities, on the south side, it is separated from the ocean by a ridge only 200 feet wide, and the sea often breaks into it in stormy weather. Like the land, it has undergone many changes. When it was first discovered it had no outlet. Many years afterward an inlet was formed by a breach of the sea, which made it a commodious harbor for small craft; but another tempest closed it again, and shut in two American vessels that had run in for shelter. In 1811 it was almost filled up by a gale blowing the sand-hills into it. At the same time a heavily laden boat was blown entirely out of the water! At present it affords fine facilities for transporting goods, and saves much heavy hauling by wagon. Eels and flounders abound in its briny waters, and in places it is almost paved with luscious and juicy clams.

It has now been observed that the history of the Island has been marked by varied striking eras. Since the period of its discovery it has been occupied in turn by explorers, convicts, trappers, fishermen, pirates, and wreckers. The huge walrus, which centuries ago held royal sway throughout the little realm, at length gave place to the black foxes, which some mischance had probably set adrift from the main land on floating fields of ice and landed there. These afterward disappeared, and herds of wild cattle and swine roamed its narrow precincts. The former became extinct about the middle of the last century, and in 1825 the swine were exterminated. A rigorous winter destroyed the greater part, and the balance fell victims to knife and bullet; and when the last gaunt porker made his coup de grace the Island was rid of a pest and abomination, for the taste of human flesh had made them ghouls, and they roved from hill to shore holding horrid revel on corpses which they rooted from the sand. For the last hundred years or so the wild ponies, whose name is famous, have in turn held and occupied—hardy, diminutive scrubs, whose shaggy manes cover head and shoulders and sweep the ground. Wild rabbits, too, abound, and brown rats swarm in prodigious numbers, which are constantly increased by accessions from the sea. After storms they are often seen coming ashore by scores, clinging to planks and drift-wood. Anent the rabbits, there is a story of a certain Snowy Owl (Strix nictea) which, having lost his reckoning, happened upon this Island. Most fortunate misadventure! That day the gentleman dined on rabbit. The delicate tid-bit pleased his palate; he tarried the next day, and when he had thoroughly cultivated his taste he departed. Men thought, and the rabbits hoped, that he had gone "for good," but after a lapse of three days he returned with a

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 full hundred of his kinsfolk. What wily words he used to lure them to that southern latitude the record states not; but that the reward proved equal to the inducement is evinced by the fact that this denizen of the arctic zone is often seen nowadays watching beside a rabbit-burrow in the heat and glare of an August sun, with his head all furred and feathered for a polar campaign.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

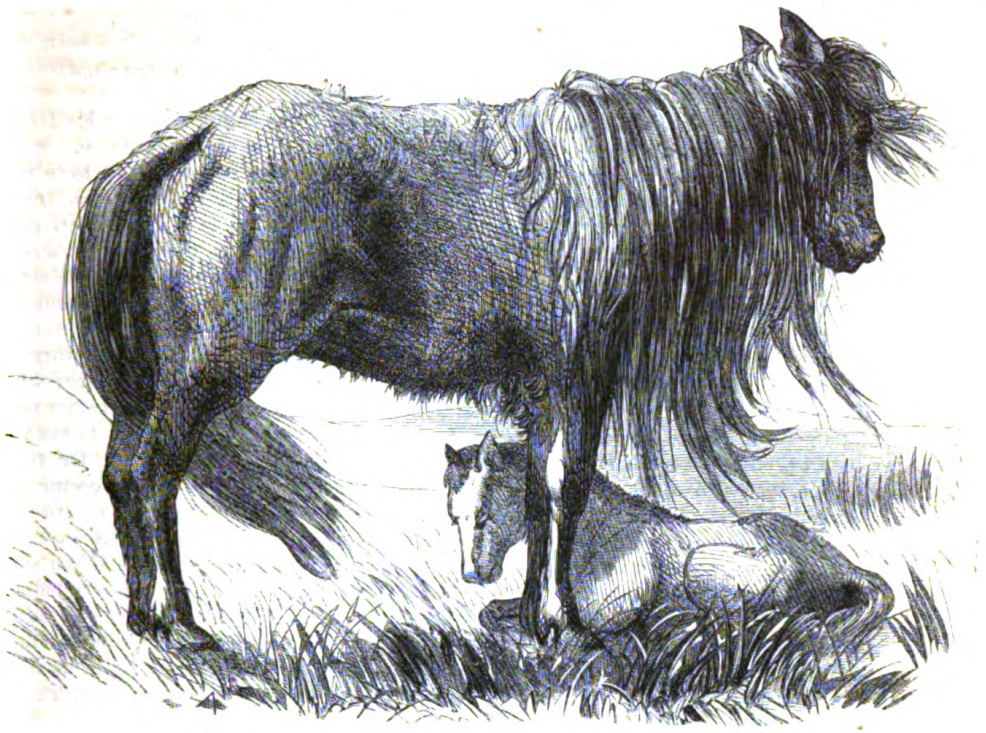
Contemporary with these eras in animal life are the changes which the Island itself has undergone. Portions have sunk from sight, and new land has risen from the sea; breaches have been made and inlets closed; hills have toppled over and dissolved, and others grown up like mushrooms; the lake has been emptied and filled again; new things have been buried from sight and old ones disinterred. It has no fixed figure or foundation, but, like some half-decayed and sea-worn waif upon the shore, it lies limp and helpless, the sport of the winds and waves, tossed by the surf and beaten into all kinds of fantastic shapes.



Many a toil-worn denizen of the heated metropolis, released for a fortnight's holiday, has felt his nerves thrill with the excitement of a canter along the breezy beach at Long Branch; he will stand on the cliffs at Newport, and grow romantic when the billows thunder at his feet or a gale comes careering in from the sea on the crests of the waves; a barnacle-covered keelson bleaching on the sands of Fire Island entrances him. But if he would feel the acutest sense of exhilaration of which soul and body are capable—if he would experience in some degree the thrilling consciousness of perfect freedom which the wild mustang enjoys—let him mount a swift-footed pony and give her stride along the hard, gravely shore of Sable Island, where the surf is deafening, where wave following wave seems to chase him as he flies, and the foam darting up the beach seizes his horse by the hoofs, struggles for an instant, and then wriggles back baffled, hissing with rage and vexation. Ghostly wrecks, posted like skeleton sentinels for many a mile, grin and gape at him. Huge beach-clams, buried in the sand, spurt up their jets before him. Sleek, glossy seals, that have lain basking in the sun or piled like ledges of rock high up the sloping shore, stare an instant with their large, wondering eyes, and then taking alarm, flap and flounder toward the water pell-mell in ridiculous hurry and confusion. Pony catches his rider's spirit of mischief, and charges on them as they tumble into the surf, cutting off the retreat of some, leaping the slippery backs of others, separating whelps from their dams, and creating general consternation. Up and down in restless circles the anxious mother swims until she recovers her offspring, and then sculls off joyously with the infant on her back, holding hard by its tiny flippers—more fortunate now than when the ruthless wreckers make their raids from the stations and club them by the score for the sake of their skins and oil.

Now drawing rein for a moment's rest, pony ambles leisurely along, occasionally startling a shelldrake from its haunts within a wreck, or driving before him a timid ringneck or brace of peeps as they run swiftly along the beach. At intervals a brackish rivulet crosses the path, or a little bay makes up into the land; and anon a toppling sand-cliff, which the waves have undermined, and whose edge is overhung with matted roots, threatens to bury the passer. Perchance on the very summit of some distant cone a wild stallion is seen perched, standing sentinel, his clumsy figure outlined in bold relief against the sky.

All this is grand, novel, and picturesque, and the attendant feeling of loneliness only adds zest to the enjoyment. The salt air invigorates, and the sea-breeze cools the brain. And so by this time we are ready for another scurry over the beach, and a second charge into another herd of awkward seals. Then, wheeling abruptly and diving into a gully around the base of a cone, we lose sight of the ocean in an instant, and discover wondrous change of scene. On through wavy valleys, blossoming with the wild rose, the fragrant lily, and the china aster, and strewn with strawberries, blueberries, or cranberries, which may be gathered by the bucketful, over grassy knolls round and smooth as a haystack; now surmounting the dividing ridge of the Island, when the ocean on both sides may be seen at a glance, and anon skirting the verge of some precipitous cliff, where the tall grass sweeps the right hand pommel, while the left stirrup goes dangling over the dizzy edge, with the ocean thundering seventy feet below. Betimes a tawny rabbit starts up on end, takes an observation, and with a hop, skip, and jump, and a flirt of his tail, darts into a wild-pea patch. Anon dense flocks of wild-fowl rise from the long grass with a cry of alarm, wheel rapidly through the air, and then subside. All along the north side of the Island are limpid fresh-water ponds, girt with rank grass, where ducks and water-fowl breed by myriads. The ground is strewn with nests, and as the chance passer surprises the community from their courtship or siesta thousands fill the air, circling over the surrounding hills in rapid flight, wheeling out to sea, or hovering directly overhead, screaming their anger at the intrusion; and as the horse's hoofs crunch mercilessly into eggs and unfledged young, they swarm and pursue like bees, filling the air with their cries, and dealing stinging blows with their beaks. Horse and rider are both fain to join in ignoble retreat, and whip and heels do double duty until the shrieking multitude give up the chase.

Throughout all this flying trip not a stone is to be seen or a pebble of the size of a pea; no trees, nor shrubs of scarce sufficient height to cast a shadow; only a little withwood or low-spreading juniper. Yet the diversity is remarkable, and the scenes shift with the rapidity and freshness of a kaleidoscope. Here

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MARE AND FOAL.

in one place is a long barren, shut in by hills, on which there is not a blade of grass visible. It is called the "Desert," and its sands are as desolate and as constantly shifting as those of Sahara. Standing within its dreary precincts one can give his imagination flight, and without time, fatigue, or money, spend a season on the wastes of Africa. Again "rub the lamp," give pony whip and spur, and in an instant we are transported to a Western prairie, whose rank grass rubs the horse's sides, and where grass and sky bound the horizon as palpably as in Texas; and, strange coincidence! herds of wild horses roam as freely here as there, plunging through the billowy verdure, and scurrying away at the approach of man, just as if he and they had been forever strangers. Here, in secluded pastures, the wild mare suckles her foal, unsuspicious of danger, while the omnipresent stallion stands faithful guard on an adjacent eminence. Or, perchance, in the early evening twilight, some solitary outcast of the herd strolls down to an unfrequented spot on shore and stalks the lonely beach; or leaning against some crumbling wreck, ruminates on the fickleness of fortune and the vicissitudes of this sublunary sphere. Once again, if we would entirely change the scene, a ten-minutes' gallop will carry us over the ridge and on to the bank of the rippling lake, where, taking one of the quaintly constructed Island boats, with their broad floor and lofty stem and stern, a fair wind will dry the perspiration from the forehead and carry us a dozen miles down toward the other end of the Island. And if we should wish to go so far, a horse procured at Farquar's, at the East End Station, will take us to the very extremity, where the huge back-bone of the North-east Bar stretches far away to sea like a Giant's Causeway, bristling with wrecks for full five miles of its extent. Over it the spray dashes in showers, and forms little ponds in its centre, which empty themselves by miniature rivulets running back to the ocean. Here we find another House of Refuge like that at the West End. No one lives here, and it is only occasionally visited by the patrol, unless, perchance, some Vandal fishermen should land (as they have frequently done), and steal what philanthropy has provided for castaways. It is incredible that men exist so utterly devoid of humanity as to wantonly destroy or carry off those necessaries without which their fellow-men would die; and they have done this immediately after receiving the hospitality of the Superintendent's house. Sometimes there have happened hand-to-hand encounters between the honest wreckers and the fishermen, and for a time it was found necessary to take away every thing from the Houses of Refuge as soon as the fishing season commenced. Nevertheless the wrecked seaman will always find fire-wood and matches, with provisions and a few articles of clothing to supply immediate wants, and there are finger-boards and directions, printed in various languages, how to find water and inhabited houses. Truly the lone castaway who warms his benumbed limbs at this hospitable fire, and eats the food that has been provided, will ever have occasion to bless those

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

generous Nova Scotians who founded this model colony, as well as those who have for years contributed to its support. Bread cast upon these wild waters will certainly return again.

Thus touching lightly, as the bee sips, we have traversed every part of Sable Island. Our illustrations faithfully portray its most interesting features, and show every building except those of the East End Look-out, which do not differ materially from the rest. Every foot of this singular territory is hallowed if not classic ground, made memorable by the great and good who are known to have perished there, as well as by the colonies of nameless dead who lie buried in its sands. Every grassy knoll or barren hill is distinguished by some dead man's name or old ship's tradition; every grinning wreck is monumental. Here, in some barren spot, if we turn over the sand, we may find, as others have done, traces of some encampment of centuries past, where ancient coins, antique inkhorns, ornaments of fantastic design, knives made from iron hoops, rusty bayonets, and kindred relics are mingled with ashes and the bones of animals and men. An English shilling of the reign of Queen Bess, sharp as when sent from the mint, furnishes the date of the misfortune, but nothing is left to give a clew to the sufferers, who they were, except that they were Englishmen. There is a rotten strip of red bunting, and here and there an ancient shoe, worn by many a fruitless step to the eminence where the tattered rag waved long in vain for relief which never came! Again, casually glancing up some sand-cliff lately caved away, we may discover curious strata of burned and decaying fragments etched in dark line across its face, or bits of wood and canvas projecting; and, digging there, exhume mementoes of another wrecked regiment which, like the "43d," was cast away here when returning to Halifax after the siege of Quebec. Alas, how many strong men did battle with famine before the present Establishment was founded! We might also gather from old housewife tales how, in 1820, the Juno drifted ashore without spars or rigging and with only one tenant, and he a dead man in the hold; or how a gentleman and lady were found in the surf lashed to a broken mast. More than all this, if we are content to take assurances for facts, we might give credence to traditions of the old Vikings, who claim the Island's first discovery, or to semi-legendary history like that of the old regicide, who, it is said, hid, lived, and died here, and whose ghost every 29th of May (the anniversary of the execution of Charles I.) marches about the Island with a broad-brimmed hat on, carrying a drawn sword and singing psalms through his nose so loud as to be heard above the storm! Again, could imagination supply the functions of the palate, we should in our brief tour have breakfasted, dined, and supped with the reader on the abundant good things which the Island provides — toothsome black ducks, dainty rabbit stews, fresh laid eggs, juicy clams and lobsters, or possibly a pony steak, which connoisseurs say is not bad; nor would fresh cod and mackerel or a slice of lean seal come amiss, topping off with ripe strawberries by way of dessert.

But this is all the sunny side of Sable Island life, and precious little of it there is too. Such halcyon days as these two which we have now enjoyed are as rare as a lunatic's lucid intervals. Even now there is a dull leaden haze thickening on the horizon, the sun wears a livid hue, and the surf begins to roll along the shore with a groaning, uneasy, and troubled sound—portending a gathering of the elements for strife. See! the cutter is already clawing off the coast. The old Sea Dog is weather-wise, and means to keep the land on his weather side. Hope he will return in good time to take us off, and not leave us to vegetate for three months on the Island, as a certain doctor was left some years ago. We have no wish to turn wrecker just now. However, it is fortunate we are near old Farquar's house. We shall have shelter there and good entertainment. Here is the grizzled old fellow himself taking observations from his door-step, and carefully scanning the southern quarter, while his huge Newfoundland dog is just coming in with a seal which he had caught in the surf.

"Well, Farquar, how is the weather gage? Any chance of a storm?"

"Ay, ay, Sir, a storm; you may well say it! I've smelt it all day; and, mind! a private word to you—I dreamt last night of a wreck!"

This last remark in an undertone, and emphasized by the forefinger brought significantly to the temple.

"But come in, Sir. The fog is making fast, and we shall have it tooth and nail in an hour, blowing great guns. Come in, Sir, I say. A storm in these diggings is no trifle. I've no fancy for being out myself, and they do say [here a monitory tap upon the shoulder] there be such doings and carryings on as is not becoming the likes of us to behold!"

"We have heard stories of ghosts and strange noises at such times, Mr. Farquar."

"Whist! I've heard and seen them myself, but these are things not to be talked of above a whisper. Do you mind the wreck of the Senator down at the beach there? Well, I've seen lights there to come and go like the flash of a dark lantern, but devil a living creature within a good five mile of it."

"Very remarkable, Mr. Farquar!"

"You may well say it! More than that, I've seen the ocean on fire, Sir, and waves of flame leaping twenty feet high up between the sand hills! but it was only in places. Old man Darby has seen it too."

"Couldn't you tell us more particularly about some of these strange sights—these ghosts that blow horns, rattle chains, and walk about the Island at night?"

"Not for the Governor's salary would I breathe a word to a living soul. However, I

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google might tell you of Lady Copeland's ghost. It's been in print, I believe, and there's no harm in speaking of it now, though it happened afore my time, and I can't swear to the truth on it, albeit there's folks now living in Halifax who knew well the parties concerned in it. Never heard of Lady Copeland's ghost! Well, sit you down here and take a pipe, while I go and get some hot stuff which will slush my tongue and help us to swallow the yarn the handier."

While old Farquar is gone the storm breaks in all its fury, not a gradually increasing gale, but suddenly, as though it had restrained and concentrated all its violence for a single blast which should puff the whole Island out of existence in an instant. None but an eye-witness can conceive the horror and intensity of these storms. The whole Island rocks and trembles to its foundation. As far as the eye can reach the sea foams and drives like a snow-wreath in a whirlwind, while inland nothing can be seen but drifting sand and mist shutting in a narrow horizon of long grass tossing wildly and streaming in tatters from the wind-swept hills. The combined artillery of contending armies is as nothing compared with the thunder of the breakers, and the flying sand rattles like hail wherever it strikes. No living creature can withstand the blast, and man must creep if compelled to go forth into the storm.

But all is snug within old Farquar's home. The stout timbers of his well-pinned house stand firm, and the blaze in the fire-place is made more cheerful by the blast that shrieks in the chimney and whisks it spitefully up the flue. And now, seated on seal-skin cushioned stools before a hearth of glittering copper torn from a wrecked ship's bottom, warmed by flickering brands gathered from one wreck, and soothed by a cigar from another, we listen to Farquar's yarns, while many a carved memento and curious relic upon mantle, sideboard, and wainscot illustrate the startling tale, add emphasis to assertion, and conviction to truth.

"And now about Lady Copeland's ghost," the old man says, as he knocks the ashes from his pipe against his boot-heel. "She was wrecked, you know, on the Amelia Transport, sixty years ago, and Captain Torrens, of the Twenty-ninth, was sent out from Halifax to look after the wreck, for the talk was that it had fell into the hands of pirates, and all them that wasn't drowned was murdered. Well, as bad luck would have it, the Captain was wrecked too, and many of his soldiers went to Davy Jones, but he got safe ashore himself. After caring for them that was alive and burying the drowned, he went off to take a look about the Island. When he came back and got to a shanty they called the 'Smoky hut' (which is torn down long ago), his dog began to growl and bark as if he was frightened at something in the hut, and looking in what should he see but a lady in a white gown all wet and dripping with sand and sea-weed as if she had just been rolled ashore in the surf. Of course the Captain was startled to see the lady there, but he wasn't frightened one mite, for he was a brave man. So he goes up to speak to her, but she didn't answer a word, only held up her hand and showed the bleeding stump of her fore-finger. In a jiffy he ran for the surgeon's chest, and went up to her to dress the wound like a decent man, when what does she do but slip past him and streak it out of the door, and he all the time calling and begging her to come back. But she wouldn't mind him, and kept on running until she dove head-foremost into the lake.

"What to do he didn't know, he was all taken aback so. And so he walks slowly back, thinking the matter over, and when he got back to the hut there was the same lady again holding up her finger as before! After looking steady for a while at her pale, wet face, he seemed to know her face, and finally remembered her name, for she was well known to the Halifax quality. 'Is that you, Lady Copeland?' said he. She bowed 'Yes,' and then held up her finger again. 'Ah! I see now,' said he, thinking it all over; 'the pirates murdered you to get the ring?' She bowed 'Yes' again, and then the Captain swore to hunt the villain out and return the ring to her family. This seemed to please her, for she smiled, bowed, and disappeared into the lake as previous. Well, would you believe it, the Captain tracked one of the most noted pirates down to the Labrador, made the acquaintance of his wife and family, who didn't know who he was, and, after asking some questions, he found that the ring had been left at a watchmaker's shop in Halifax to sell; and sure enough he found it there, bought it, and sent it home to the lady's friends as he had promised to do.

"Now, Sir, don't you believe there's such a thing as ghosts? There was the ring which the lady was known to have on her finger when she went aboard the vessel to go to her husband in Halifax, and the same ring was found as you have seen. It was all the talk in Halifax for years after. One thing is sure, the old pirate was never seen out after dark after the ring was found by the Captain."

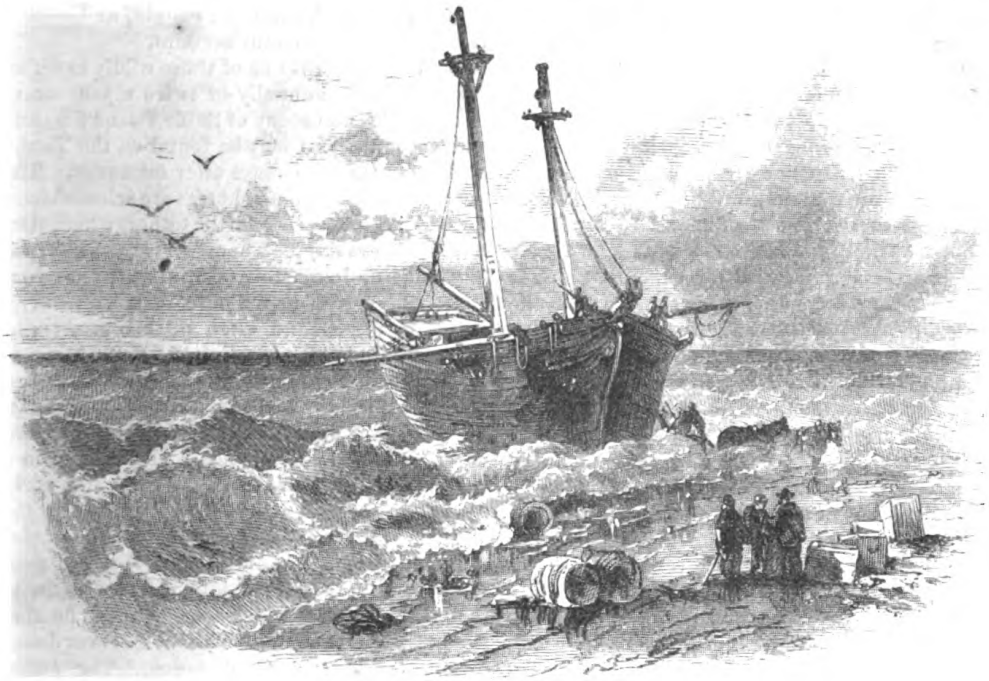
Farquar was told that the incidents were certainly very extraordinary, and that facts which were so well authenticated could not be disputed; but this qualified assent to a belief in the existence of ghosts did not more than half satisfy him, and so he talked no more on these topics. He contented himself with general remarks about the Island: how the sand was impregnated with gold, and that some gentlemen had once got permission to dig for it there; how the wreckers killed the seals and made oil, but that it was not very remunerative, because the seals were small and did not yield largely; how as many as 120 barrels of cranberries had been exported to Halifax in a single season; how they caught the wild horses; and all about the domestic economy of the Establishment. At length, with brain excited by the varied in-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE PATROL.

cidents of the day, the visitor retires to rest, rocked by the winds of a hurricane, with the deafening reverberations of the surf for a lullaby. But it is on the wings of such a storm that many a noble ship rides to destruction, and Farquar's dream of a wreck may prove true.

The ocean is superlatively grand after a storm. Before it was simply terrific; but now its full power is most sublimely felt, when the huge billows, no longer torn to shreds by the winds, sweep on in unbroken volume, gathering force by their own momentum, melting mountains by their touch and twisting planks and spars as if they were rushes. It is at such a time that the patrol mounts his hardy pony and starts forth upon his solitary mission of mercy, to look out for wrecks and render assistance, if needed, in saving life and property. Out into the earliest gray of the morning, murky with thick and flying mists, sturdily facing the blasts that almost sweep him from the saddle, he struggles on, scarcely making headway through the drifting sands and plashing pools. He rides up the central valleys, ever and anon mounting a knoll to look seaward where some old wreck, loosened from its fastenings, is knocking about in the breakers, and betimes plunging down to the beach to examine some dark object struggling in the land-wash—an iron-hooped cask, a spar crusted with barnacles, a hen-coop, or an empty bottle. Such tokens are all that he often finds, except perchance some whitening skull that the wind has laid bare and the rain washed clean; and so trudging on for miles, he at length discerns the figure of the south side patrol advancing through the mist. The two worthies meet, draw rein, compare notes, and then turn to retrace their steps and make their reports at Head-quarters.



But the patrol does not always bring in a clean bill, and he will tell how he once found a ship's bell tolling its own dirge as it tossed in the land-wash; how he has pulled the exhausted sailor through the ground-swell; how he has found the beach strewn with many a swollen corpse, with carved locker and binnacle, richly bound volumes, and many a trinket and souvenir of a lady's toilet; and how there once drifted ashore a coat of arms richly carved and gilt—the only token the inexorable sea ever gave up of the boom of sullen guns that were heard at night in the height of the storm. Distinct and fresh as when first laid on was the golden motto that surmounted its crest: Spero Melesia!" Stanch ship and sturdy crew had all gone to the bottom, with all this world's prospects wrecked in a single night. Not a vestige remained, save this golden message wafted up from the solemn sea: "I hope for

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 better things!" There is but one ignoble consummation for all things temporal, but there is a world beyond to which all may look for better things.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Such sea-beaten waifs the patrol occasionally discovers; or, perchance, before he has completed his rounds, the sullen boom of a gun comes heavily from windward, or else the pack lifts and he discerns the outline of a dark hull grinding on the outer bar, with flapping sails and rigging loosely streaming in the wind, and swept with foam from stem to stern. Then quickly the alarm flies to Head-quarters. The signal-flag goes up before the courier has fairly dismounted from his horse. "A wreck! a wreck!" resounds on every hand. From every house the tenants issue forth like firemen at the bell-stroke. There is a rush for the boat-house and stables, where horses ready harnessed are always in waiting, and in a twinkling the life-boat is mounted on its wheels, the wrecking apparatus is tossed into it, and a motley cavalcade goes galloping along the winding beach in the direction of the wreck. All is excitement, and every eager horseman presses forward to his duty, the lumbering cart following in the rear, with its three ponies strangely harnessed, one in the shafts, and two ahead as leaders, on round many a point and crescent shore, and thence across the Island toward the other beach. But ere they have accomplished half the distance they descry the figure of a stranger toiling wearily toward them. Hurrah! there can be no mistake, it is one of the shipwrecked crew; one at least is safe! The foremost gather around him with congratulations and eager questions. It is the captain of the vessel, a brig. His men, he says, are most of them safely landed in the yawl, and the vessel is thumping on the beach, but not yet broken up. He will guide them to the scene of the disaster. Now, gathering fresh courage and stimulated to continued exertions, the cavalcade presses forward; but presently a thickening cloud of fog envelops them so that they can scarcely see their horses' heads before them. The guide becomes bewildered, and all are in danger of losing each other in the fog. On this emergency the only means of giving the stranded seamen immediate relief is to form a line of patrol across the narrow strip of land, and thus move forward abreast, keeping each other within sight or hail. Thus they proceed toward the extremity. But presently the fog lifts a little, and the dim outline of the vessel is barely defined just outside the surf, with her bows driven high up into the sand and her stern pounding heavily with each successive surge. Some of her sails are set, and with each lurch of the vessel flap with a loud report. It seems that the captain, finding no escape, has wisely driven his vessel ashore before the wind. The yawl is discovered near at hand, with the worn and weary seamen soundly sleeping under the thwarts; nor do they express surprise when awakened to see strange faces around them, knowing full well that the captain had gone for aid. Sailors are so much the victims of circumstances that they learn to accept the vicissitudes of life with a show of stolid indifference in whatever shape they come.

While all are waiting for the arrival of the cart and deliberating what course to pursue, they are startled by a voice from the deep, and lo! the form of the steward appears on the forecastle, and a stentorian voice hails: "Ahoy

STRIPPING THE WRECK.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE CAMP.

there! breakfast is ready! All you chaps what wants breakfast better git aboard in a hurry if you want it hot!"

Had manna fallen from the clouds the event could scarcely have been more startling, for the crew believed he had been washed overboard and drowned. But the voice and figure were unmistakable. It was the voice of a genuine Cape Cod Yankee, who was lord of the galley, and the figure held in his hand a steaming coffee-pot from which the muddy fluid slopped fitfully with every thump of the vessel. Such a welcome and bona fide summons needed no repeating, and when all had satisfied their senses they clambered up the forechains with unwonted agility and applied themselves to their task as best they could. Nor were they invited to partake of mean fare. There was pork and potatoes, and pudding afterward, with a ration of gin and oranges for dessert. How the steward contrived to make stove and sauce-pan do duty will ever remain a mystery, for the vessel thumped so that it was difficult to eat, even with the primitive table service of fingers.

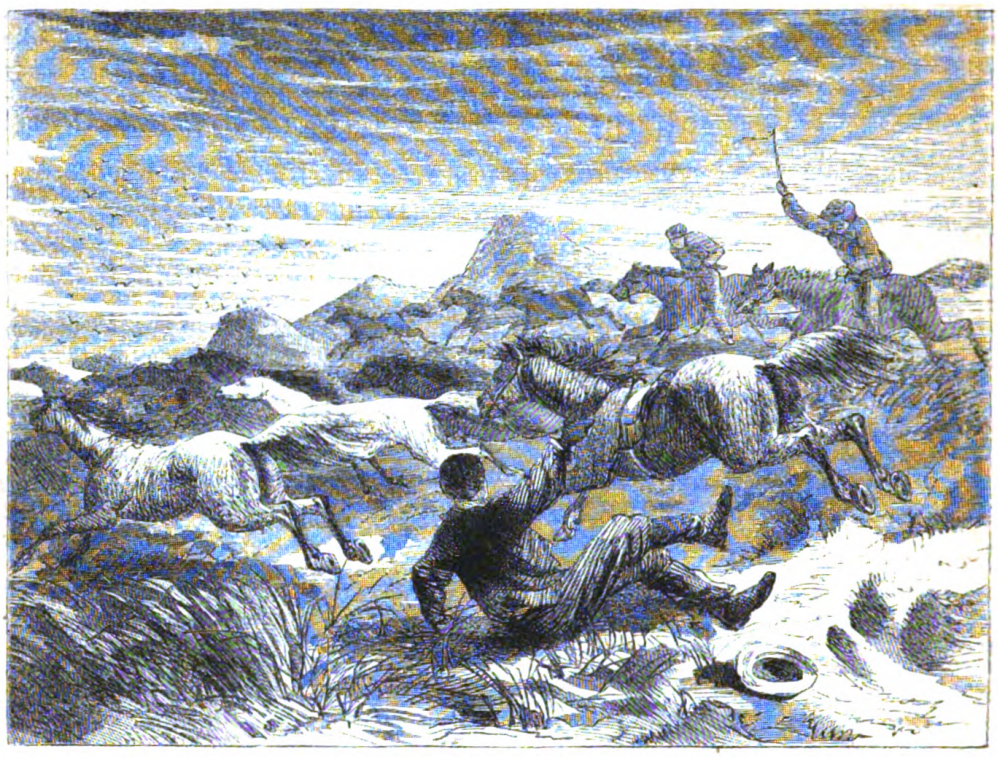
From this day forward for a month there is constant work for man and horse. To strip the wreck of spars and sails and every thing of value that can be saved, to land and store the cargo, and haul it down to Head-quarters for reshipment, will cost many an hour of toil and many a tedious trip to and fro through the tiresome sand. All this time some one must remain in camp near the wreck, to guard the goods from depredators or render prompt service in the event of a sudden gale; but, comfortably sheltered by a mainsail thrown over the brig's caboose, and protected from the damp fogs and searching blasts by an overshadowing bluff, their temporary hermitage is not only endured with equanimity, but invested with a spice of romance. The lighter spars of the dismantled vessel furnish tent-poles, a solid mahogany log supplies a sofa, and a barrel set on end serves nicely for a chimney; and at night no moss or down can furnish a more comfortable bed than the softly yielding sand which the pressure of the body moulds to tired and aching bones. And when the day's labor is ended the lantern swings cheerily overhead, while song and jest go freely round, and startling tale seasoned by oft-replenished pipe. Sometimes the solitude is broken by a visit from the patrol, or, perhaps, "Old Sam," a worn-out patriarch discarded from the stables, comes down for an evening stroll, and moping near at hand furnishes the butt for many a jibe and jest.

But it is time to look for the return of the cutter, if, peradventure, she has been fortunate enough to weather the gale. Once more the signal flag mounting to the mast-head announces the happy intelligence that she is already in the offing, and in an hour or two she again comes gallantly to anchor abreast of Head-quarters. The Captain states that a few hours' run carried him clear of the circuit of the storm, and that there was only a stiff breeze of wind where he was. He has additional service to perform now, for the shipwrecked crew are to be transported to the main land with their luggage; besides, he has orders to carry back a score of the wild ponies which are to be caught, and sold in Halifax on Government account.

And now follows one of those wildly exciting episodes which annually or twice a year occur to break the monotony of Sable Island life, and whose counterpart may be found on the Texan prairies in the wild chase after mustangs. The fleetest and best-trained horses are selected from the stables, or loosed from the tethers where they have been grazing. There is a careful girthing of saddles and adjusting of bridles. Some dextrous riders leap to the bare back with only a halter to guide, and when all are ready and properly equipped according to fancy, they canter off in motley cavalcade—red shirts and blue, rough pea-jackets and stained tarpaulins, hats and caps of fantastic shape, and flaunting bandanas wound round the head, all mingled in a curious melange, bobbing as they go, like corks upon the waves. Galloping on toward the lower extremity of the Island where the ponies most do congregate, and where they are generally secure from intrusion, videttes begin to mount the hill-tops which overlook their feeding grounds, and taking observation, discover dusky groups moving in the distance. The entire number of ponies does not now exceed two

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

hundred, but they do not herd all together. They are divided into half a dozen gangs (each known to the Island people by a distinguishing name), have separate pastures, and are each presided over by an old grizzled stallion, sagacious as Solomon and conspicuous for his patriarchal length of mane, which falls in tangled masses over head and shoulders. These old custodians are ever on the alert, and even now can be seen standing a little apart from their charges, with head erect, sniffing the tainted atmosphere and tossing their shaggy locks from their eyes.



Warily the hunters now move forward in ample circuit, always keeping the hills between themselves and their prey, and at length appear in long, unbroken line behind them, stretching from shore to shore. The ponies are now again outwitted, and the quandary in which they find themselves caught for the thirtieth time in their day and generation is evinced by their restless and anxious movements. The ocean foams on either side; their pursuers are behind; while before them, though now far distant, lies the inevitable pound into which they are to be driven. As the hunters slowly advance the jealous stallion collects his outlying mares and foals, and gathers his herd together, and then keeping them well in pack, boldly confronts the enemy, while they retreat at a gallop. Up and down the line he marches, backs and fills, luffs and cruises to windward, like a gallant frigate, but finding himself closely pressed, fires off a snort of defiance and follows after his convoy. Gradually the several herds are driven together and mingled with each other; and then, with a yell of exulting triumph, the hunters dash after them at the top of their speed—the wild stallions, now thoroughly alarmed, mixing with the rest of the herd, and all scurrying away in promiscuous and wild career. Now follows a headlong chase and desperate riding over hill and dale, through tangling grass and sandy plains, accompanied by many a fall and ridiculous antic. Here one wild pony, detached from the herd, charges straight over the crest of a cone—leaping, with a plunge of full twenty feet, sheer over the back of his pursuer, who has coursed around its base to head him off, and then rolling over and over in the sand until he recovers his feet again. Anon some rider spurs gallantly up the gentle slope of a sand-hill, whose bold precipitous face is hidden from sight, and reaches the top to lapse suddenly from view amidst an avalanche of sand, which half buries himself and horse at the foot. This brings a shout and a jeer from the whole cavalcade, which is presently followed by some other mishap; and thus, with many a roll and plunge and fall, the terrified ponies are driven far up to the north end, where, amidst yelling and shouting and waving of caps and handkerchiefs, they rush headlong into the yawning chasm of the large corral which is waiting to receive them.

Then follows "confusion worse confounded"—a snorting, kicking, plunging—a curious mixing up of heads and tails, a rushing and huddling of terrified masses together, a crushing of half-smothered colts, and a general desperate struggle to break through the bounds. This commotion is measurably increased by the efforts which are now made to lasso some victim from among the struggling mass. The process is as laughable as it is novel. A noose is made at one end of a long rope, the other end being secured outside of the pound. This noose is then carried upon the end of a long

THE VIDETTES.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CHASING WILD PONIES.

pole by an active fellow, who warily approaches the animal selected, and by a dextrous movement slips it over his head. Instantly this feat is accomplished he drops the pole and runs, while several men outside pull lustily until the tightening rope chokes pony into good behavior, and the creature is then drawn or led out of the inclosure, and from thence is pulled and pushed by main force down to the water's-edge. Here two men seize the ends of a long rope, and, running in opposite directions, wind it around pony's legs, and drawing it tightly bring him submissively to his feet. His legs are then firmly tied, and half a dozen men lift him bodily into the boat. This process is repeated upon each successive victim until the desired number is secured. The balance of the impounded herd are then let loose from the inclosure, whence they scamper away, and speedily find their way back to their old feeding-grounds.

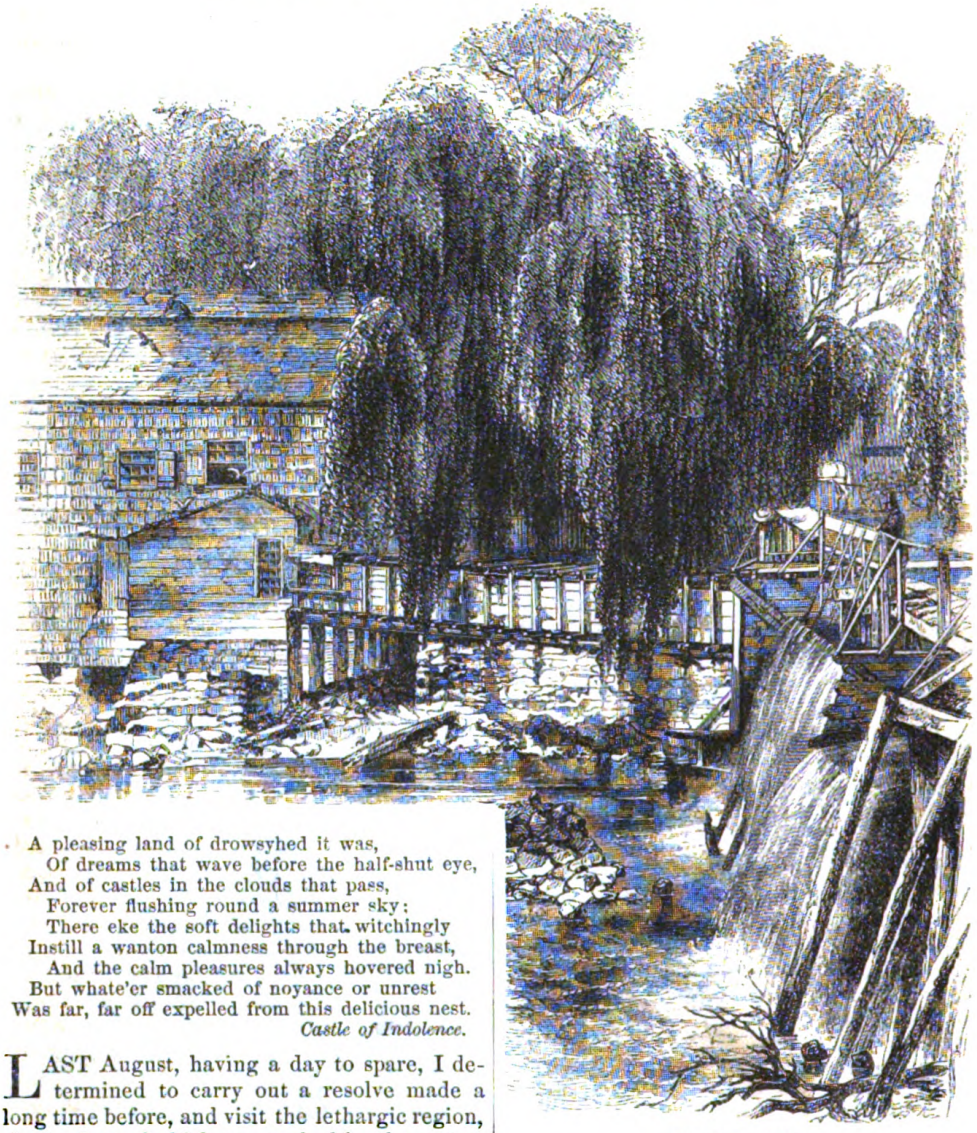
The boat carries three or four ponies at a time to the schooner, where a waist-band and tackle hoists them into the hold. Their legs are then untied, and they are properly secured for their prospective voyage. At first they are disposed to be fractious, and make the first night hideous by their furious kicking and constant uproar, altogether banishing sleep. Sometimes they seem to take a malicious revenge by fastening their teeth into the trowsers of their groom as he is descending backward into the hold to feed them, and snap at his head and hands when he distributes their provender; but the sea voyage soon quenches their fire, and by the time they are landed at Halifax they have become well-behaved brutes, gentle as lambs, and the most vicious can be fondled with impunity.

It is not positively known when the present breed of horses was introduced upon Sable Island, though it is generally believed that they sprang from certain stock known to have been placed there by an American named La Mercier, about the year 1735. Some, however, think their origin of much earlier date. Dr. J. Bernard Gilpin, of Halifax, Nova Scotia—a naturalist of note, who has contributed many valuable papers and specimens to the Smithsonian Institute and the Natural History Societies of the Provinces—in a carefully-prepared paper describes them as a race of large-headed, low-withered ponies, with tail set very low into a very short quarter; a cock-thrappled neck, and a short, square ear; from twelve to thirteen hands high; mane and tail reaching nearly to the ground, and covering the nostrils; the coat long and shaggy during winter, especially under the chin and on the legs. He mentions an instance where the mane measured three yards. In form they resemble the tarpany and wild horse of Tartary, and are almost the counterpart of the horses depicted on the Elgin marbles and Nineveh sculptures. Their type is also found in the fecal breed of the Ukraine. As regards color, there seems a remarkable tendency to assume the Isabella, the light chestnut, and even the piebald, known

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

from earliest ages. The bays and browns are the most numerous; of blacks there are a few, and of grays none. The bluish mouse color is also frequent. They persistently refuse the shelter of a stable in all kinds of weather, and always avoid the society of man. They are never observed to lie down to rest, but seem to sleep standing. Fights are frequent between the stallions of the several gangs, in which they are often nearly disabled. The young horses between two and three years old are driven from the herd by the leader, and hang in small bands upon the outskirts; and when an old or disabled mare, unable to keep up, drops behind, as sometimes happens, she at once becomes an object of greatest attraction to them, soon produces foals, and thus the nucleus of a new herd is formed.

From these observations it is plain that the horse, if left to himself for a long period of years, following the laws of natural selection, will return to the habits and appearance of the old primal stock; and the necessary inference is, that the numerous known varieties of the horse do not belong to distinct and different species, but have all one common descent from one common stock.



Should any reader wish to farther investigate this interesting page of Natural History; should he desire to roam the broad field of Romance, or more startling Fact; to read aright the lesson of Humanity; to moralize upon the instability and uncertainty of earthly things, or tremble at the majesty of the elements in anger, let him venture a trip to Sable Island. It is one of the strange places of creation. And when his visit is ended, and he turns a last look at its receding shores, he may perchance obtain at a single glance a comprehensive picture of the whole—a human skull bleaching on the sand, a wild horse snuffing the salt-sea breeze, and an ancient wreck surf-worn and barnacled. The single glance embodies volumes.

IN MEMORIAM.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A REMINISCENCE OF SLEEPY HOLLOW.

THE OLD MILL.

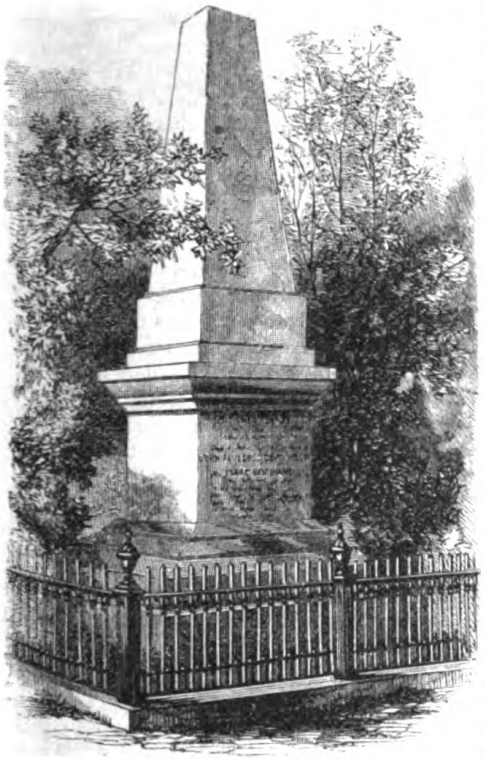
A pleasing land of drowsyhed it was,
Of dreams that wave before the half-shut eye,
And of castles in the clouds that pass,
Forever flushing round a summer sky:
There eke the soft delights that witchingly
Instill a wanton calmness through the breast,
And the calm pleasures always hovered nigh.
But whate'er smacked of noyance or unrest
Was far, far off expelled from this delicious nest.
Castle of Indolence.

LAST August, having a day to spare, I determined to carry out a resolve made a long time before, and visit the lethargic region, the borders of which are washed by the waters of the famous Tappan Zee. An hour's ride on the deck of a steamer not very remarkable for its speed, along a river unsurpassed by the Rhine of the fatherland, and in sight of villas and country seats of great taste and beauty, brought me to Tarrytown, a Dutch village of considerable antiquity, cozily nestled among the hills, which here begin to assume proportions quite formidable. Within its boundaries Sleepy Hollow is situated.

I have always found it best in visiting a strange place to have a suitable guide—one to the manner born—full of the incident and story of the locality. Such a person, I felt sure, was to be found in a tall, gaunt-looking man whom I saw conversing very earnestly in front of the news-room of the village. His appearance was quaint in the extreme, his garments being of ancient pattern, while his genial face was marked with deep furrows, well cut in by the thorough plowing of Time.

"My friend," I said, approaching him, "I am come to view this classic neighborhood, and want some one to act as my guide. Have you, for a consideration, an hour or two to spare?"

At first I thought that my request would be met with a refusal; but after a moment's deliberation my newly-formed acquaintance announced that, if a conveyance were included in the arrangement, he would gladly accompany me. Of course I assented to the condition enforced, and, feeling delighted that I had secured the guidance of one evidently so impregnated with the very spirit of the place, speedily began to leave the village behind me.



Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A short ride brought us to a plain shaft of dolomite, erected by the road-side, upon which was plainly visible the following inscription:

ON THIS SPOT
The 23d day of September, 1780, the Spy,
MAJOR JOHN ANDRE,
Adjutant-General of the British Army, was captured by JOHN PAULDING, DAVID WILLIAMS, and ISAAC VAN WART,
All natives of this county.
HISTORY HAS TOLD THE REST.

The People of Westchester County have erected this Monument, as well to commemorate a great Event, as to testify their high estimation of that Integrity and Patriotism which, rejecting every temptation, rescued the United States from most Imminent peril, by baffling the arts of a Spy and the plots of a Traitor.

DEDICATED OCTOBER 7, 1853.

THE ANDRE MONUMENT.

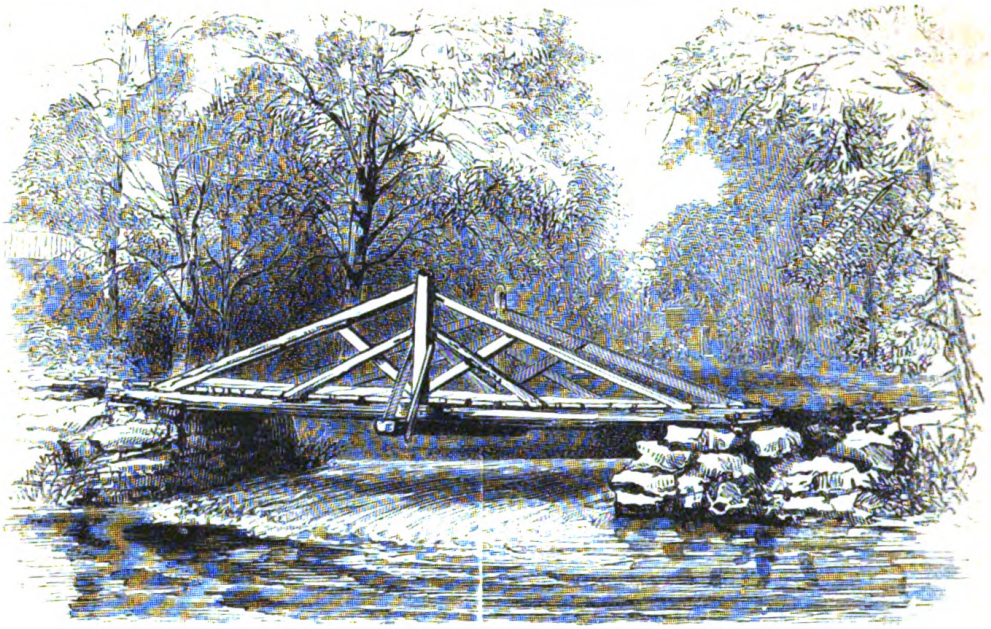
"This," said my cicerone, "is the first point of interest. Poor Major Andrè was captured here. On the knoll, over there, the three guardsmen were amusing themselves as they best could while they watched the road. Presently they saw him ascend the hill above us and come toward them. He was on his way from West Point to Dobb's Ferry, six miles below this, and supposed he was through the worst part of his journey; but the Fates were against him, and he was soon taken prisoner."

"But why," I inquired, "do you call him Poor Andrè. He was a spy, and had he been successful we should have been, in all probability, irreparably injured. Why then, my friend, shou'd we gloss over his offense?"

"I make, Sir," answered my companion, "a broad distinction between the spy and the traitor. The one risks all to benefit the cause which lies nearest his heart, the other does all that he can to ruin one which he professes to support. Treason, to me, ever will be odious, and I can not make light of it. But such was not the gallant Andrè's offense. He did but his duty."

My guide, I saw, was approaching a favorite hobby, and was waxing warm. I therefore changed the subject.

"Where," I asked, "are Andrè's captors buried?"

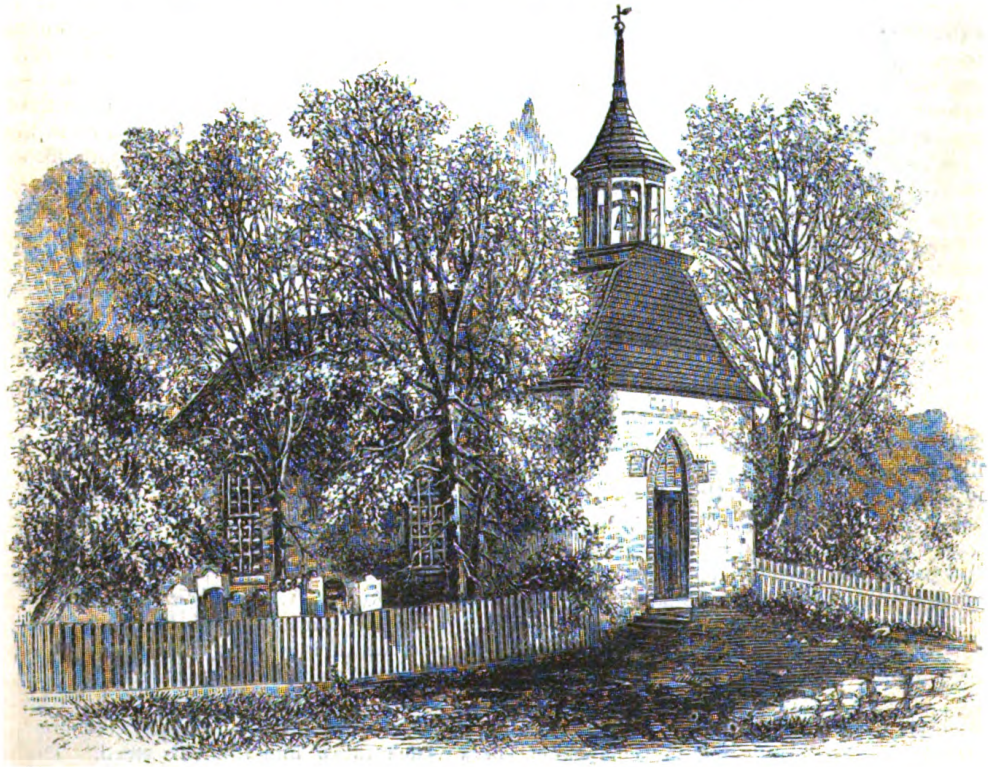


"The State of New York provided very liberally for them," he replied. "It gave each one a farm, on which he settled. Paulding is buried in the Episcopal cemetery at Peekskill; Van Wart lies among the Greenburgh hills, a few miles east of us; and Williams sleeps at Livingstone, in Schoharie County."

The spot upon which we stood was one of great natural beauty. North and south the road wound, with innumerable foldings, along beautiful residences, while here and there luxuriant maples and locusts meeting overhead formed waving arches of emerald green. On the east, the long corn leaves in a neighboring field mingled in a most soothing manner their rustling music with the quiet utterances of the brook which purled beneath our feet. On the west, the Hudson, bright with the reflection of the midsummer sun, flowed lazily toward the sea. The broad Tappan looked like a mirror, no ripple even disturbing its smoothness; while in the distance the air was full of hazy images of dream-land hills, which reached down to kiss the waters of Haverstraw Bay, that wide expanse which bold Hendrick Hudson supposed was the termination of his first upland voyage.

No wonder, I thought, that Washington Irving thanked God that he was born upon the banks of the Hudson River. No other stream, viewed apart from the prejudices which attach themselves to another nationality, can be compared with it. It is matchless, superb! What grandeur there is in the abrupt looking Palisades! how majestically they rise out of the water! And the hills, with what picturesque beauty do they slope from their summits to the water's edge! We next came to a rustic bridge which spanned a silvery brook.

"This," said my friend, "is the Pocantico, the Pockohantes of the Algonquins, the aborigines of the place. And this is the bridge alongside of which Ichabod Crane disappeared. He had been to the merry-making at Baltus Van Tassell's homestead, and was returning, when, at the spot we have just left, where Andrè was captured, then known as Wiley's swamp, he heard the strange rider. Whipping up old Gunpowder, he attempted to turn up the Bedford road, which led directly to his boarding-place; but failing in this, endeavored to gain the shelter of the church before us. As he reached the bridge he received the tremendous blow which threw him from his steed. The next morning the animal was found grazing in



Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BRIDGE OVER THE POCANTICO.

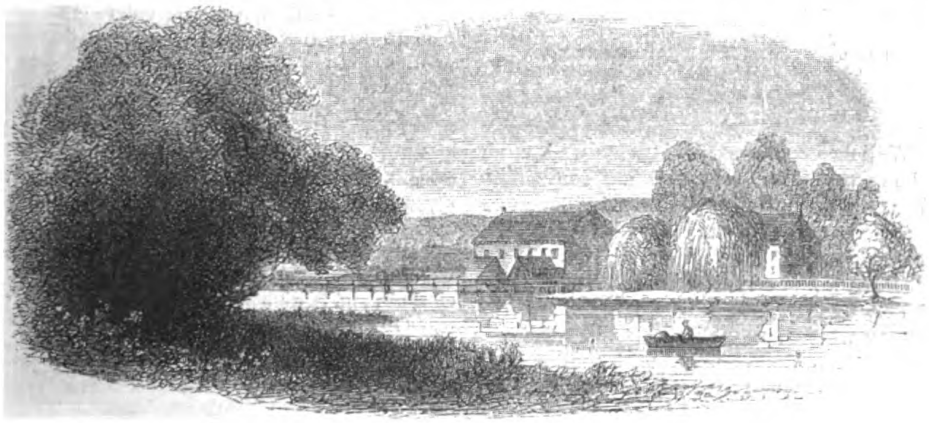
the church-yard, but Ichabod had disappeared, and was heard leading the Dutch lads and lasses in the choir, or teaching the children their lessons, no more."

This recital of my well-posted informant interested me exceedingly. I was now in the very midst of intensely classic scenes. Within a stone's-throw was the old mill, built in 1686, the capacious flume of which, slowly but surely, swallowed up the eddying waters before me; while in front, only a few paces off, stood the Dutch Church, surrounded by locust-trees and lofty elms, from "which its decent white-washed walls shone modestly forth, like Christain beauty beaming through the shades of retirement." I enjoyed the prospect vastly.

THE OLD DUTCH CHURCH.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Can you imagine any thing more interesting than this?" inquired my guide. "Look at the old sanctuary before you. Note how well it is built. It is full as stanch and sound as it was in 1699, the year in which it was finished."



"How came it to pass," I asked, "that this edifice was placed here, so far away from the present village?"

"This was supposed to be the spot about which the settlers would centre. The river, supplying as it does ample power to turn the mill, was considered of great importance. On its bank the manor-house was accordingly located. Tradition says that when Vrederyck Vlypse, the first lord of the domain, began to build the church, he laid the foundation, and then withdrew his laborers that they might repair the damage done to the dam by a recent freshet. No sooner, though, had they finished the dam than another freshet came one night and washed it away the second time. Nothing daunted, they soon had a stronger structure erected, when lo! another freshet came and destroyed it. This discouraged the proprietor, and he was about to give up in despair, when Harry, his favorite slave, dreamed that the cause of his ill-success was the withdrawal of his men from the church. Let that be finished first, the warning said, and the dam will stand. He forthwith resumed work upon the church, and afterward built the dam, which is doing good service at this day.

"The castle, or manor-house, which you see yonder is full of associations. In 1756 Colonel George Washington, then Commander-in-Chief of the Virginia forces, had occasion to communicate with General Shirley, and for this purpose left his head-quarters at Winchester and traveled to Boston on horseback, attended by his aids-de-camp. On his way he stopped in New York for a few days, and while there was entertained by Mr. Beverly Robinson, between whom and himself a strong friendship existed. It happened while he was the guest of his host that he met Miss Mary Vlypse, or, as we spell it now, Phillipse, the daughter of Vrederyck Vlypse, who was born and reared here, and was deeply impressed by her rare accomplishments and beauty. My father used to tell it as a fact, well established in his day, that the young Colonel once rode up here to pay his respects to the object of his regard. However that may be, it is certain that he did stop at the castle very frequently in after-years, when the country was in the throes of the Revolution.

"A very singular story, which I recollect, illustrates well the bravery of the matrons of the times which tried men's souls. The subject of it was Mrs. Cornelia Beekman, the wife of Gerard G. Beekman, who succeeded the Vlypse family in the possession of the castle.

"Some time before the capture of André John Webb, an aid-de-camp of the Commander-in-Chief, while on his way from New York to Peekskill, stopped at the castle and asked Mrs. Beekman to take charge of his valise, which contained his new uniform and a sum of gold. 'I will send for it,' he added, 'in a few days; 'but do not deliver it to any one without a written order from me.' A fortnight after his departure Mrs. Beekman saw an acquaintance, Joshua Smith, whose loyalty to the national cause was doubtful, ride up to the house and heard him ask her husband for Lieutenant Webb's valise. Mr. Beekman was about to comply with his request when his wife advanced and demanded a written order before she would relinquish her custody of it. Smith replied that he had none, the officer having had no time to write one; but added: 'You know me very well, Madam, and when I assure you that Lieutenant Webb sent me for the valise you ought not to refuse to deliver it to me, as he is in very great need of his uniform?' Mrs. Beekman had conceived a great dislike for Smith before this, his known sympathy with the royalist cause being in marked contrast to her enthusiastic devotion to the colonies, and influenced by it she determined to hold on to her charge until a written order of undoubted genuineness should compel her to surrender it. Smith was vexed at her doubts; but his entreaties had no effect on her resolution, and disappointed at the ill-success of his effort, he

VLYPSE'S CASTLE.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

rode away. The result proved that he had no authority to make the application; and it was subsequently ascertained that, at the very time of this attempt on his part to secure the uniform, Andrè was concealed in his house. After Andrè's capture the Lieutenant called in person for his valise, and bore a message from Washington, thanking Mrs. Beekman for the prudence that had prevented an occurrence which might have caused a train of disasters, for Webb and Andrè were of the same height and form; and beyond all doubt, had Smith obtained possession of the uniform, Andrè would have made his escape through the American lines."

During this narration our horses had been slowly walking up the hill, past the old church, into the cemetery, where all that is mortal of Irving lies buried. This home of the dead is most beautifully situated upon a slope which descends into the gorge of the Pocantico. Through the trees could be seen glimpses of the Hudson; while all around us were the localities which the magical pen of Diedrich Knickerbocker has made forever celebrated. Who is there, I thought, who would not like to sleep his last sleep amidst such surroundings as these?

IRVING'S GRAVE.

We shortly came to the Irving lot. What surprised me was the perfect simplicity apparent in all its appointments. Within the inclosure, ranged in two lines, are the different graves. Each has a plain head-stone of marble, on which are inscribed the name and age at death of the occupant. As will be seen the grave of Washington Irving does not differ from those of the rest of the family. The inscription simply tells that

WASHINGTON,
SON OF WILLIAM AND SARAH S. IRVING, DIED
NOV. 28, 1859,
AGED 76 YEARS 7 MO. AND 25 DAYS.

"Well do I recollect the day that we brought his body to this place," said my companion. "What a turn-out of notables and village people there was! It was the longest funeral that I ever saw."

"Did you know him personally?" I asked.

"Yes, for years; I was an officer of this cemetery when he bought this lot. He was from the beginning charmed with the location, and always said that his body should rest here by the side of his mother. Many are the conversations I have had with him at different times."

We now passed out of the cemetery and began to view more particularly the scenery of the Hollow. Irving appears to have had a special fondness for this spot. In Wolfert's Roost he says: "And now a word or two about Sleepy Hollow, which many have rashly deemed a fanciful creation, like the Lubberland of mariners." In the Legend in the Sketch Book he thus fancifully describes it:

"From the listless repose of the place, and the peculiar character of its inhabitants, who are descendants from the original Dutch settlers, this sequestered glen has long been known by the name of Sleepy Hollow, and its rustic lads are called Sleepy Hollow Boys throughout all the neighboring country. A drowsy, dreamy influence seems to hang over the land, and to pervade the very atmosphere. Some say that the place was bewitched by a high German doctor, during the early days of the settlement; others, that an old Indian Chief, the prophet or wizard of his tribe, held his powwows there before the country was discovered by Master Hendrick Hudson. Certain it is, the place still continues under the sway of some witching power that holds a spell over the minds of the good people, causing them to walk in a continual reverie. They are given to all kinds of marvelous beliefs; are subject to trances and visions, and frequently see strange sights, and hear music and voices in the air. The whole neighborhood abounds with local tales, haunted spots, and twilight superstitions; stars shoot and meteors glare oftener across the valley than in any other part of the country, and the nightmare, with her whole nine fold, seems to make it the favorite scene of her gambols."

The entire region is in keeping with this pen-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

picture. One might suppose that Diedrich Knickerbocker had drawn upon his imagination for his romantic valley; but such is not the fact. I recognized the exactness of the sketch in every step that I took. A stillness, such as he describes, pervades the atmosphere. The birds appear to sing more lazily, and the bees—of which there are great numbers in the Hollow—to dart here and there, for their sweet burdens, less blithely than in other neighborhoods. The news of the outer world, the events which daily fill men's minds and often excite them to an unusual degree, are in this remote retreat seldom, if ever, heard of. Many of the inhabitants did not, I believe, at the time of my visit, know that Abraham Lincoln had fallen asleep, or that Lee had surrendered to the superior strength and strategy of Grant. I stopped by the road-side and asked a worthy matron if she knew of the successful landing of the great cable; but her emphatic Dutch denial convinced me that no tidings of its inception and successful completion had ever reached her. The Dutch characteristics of the dwellers are very marked. They still cling to the hipped roofs and far-projecting eaves of their forefathers. The damsels have, as in days of yore, bright red cheeks, and eyes roguish enough to set the hearts of the lads into great commotion.

As might be expected, in a community where the vital forces are not subject to severe drafts, the people are generally long-lived. I saw and conversed with one old man who had reached the ripe age of fourscore and ten, who inhabited the cottage where Andrè stopped to rest after his capture. He was full of anecdote and story, and took pleasure in telling me of by-gone times. He remembered well the appearance of the Father of his Country, whom he had frequently seen in his earlier years, and could talk by the hour of the Skinners and Cow-boys, the records of whose bold raids and actions had been familiar to him from his early youth.

As we journeyed through the Hollow we came across a little school-house, roughly made of boards, which was curiously perched upon a gore of land formed by a forked-shaped lane which crossed the main road. As we approached it my guide told me that it was popularly supposed to be the identical school-house which Ichabod Crane taught in, "from whence, in a drowsy summer's day, the low murmur of pupils' voices" conning over their lessons was heard of old, "like the hum of a bee-hive;" but the accuracy of the tradition he could not vouch for. We entered the school, and found the children as happy and contented as school-children usually are. One boy was pulling a dancing-jack behind the teacher's back, and a girl was drawing an animal of uncouth proportions on her slate; but these shortcomings on the part of these members of the rising generation were not peculiar to the pupils of Sleep Hollow academy only. I had been, I recollected, a boy myself once, and therefore forgave them.

After bidding the teacher and scholars of this retired institution farewell, we found ourselves in the village again. Here the drowsy feeling which possessed me while in the Hollow passed away. It appeared as if we were breathing a new atmosphere, less oppressive and fuller of oxygen than the other.

As we approached the Andrè monument from the south we saw, not far from it, the foundation of a structure evidently ecclesiastical from its shape. I asked what it was. "It is," said my fidus Achates, "the beginning of the Memorial Church of Washington Irving. When alive, the great author, though truly catholic in his feelings, was a devout member of the Episcopal communion, and as a remembrance of his connection with them the Episcopalians are erecting this memorial of him."

"Is it not singular," I asked, "that a memorial should take this form? Irving was but a layman, and never employed his pen in the defense of his faith. Why erect a church to him? No Dante, nor Shakspeare, much less a Cervantes, has been honored so. Louis Philippe, it is true, made Victor Hugo a peer of France, and Victoria made Macaulay a peer of the realm, and Queen Anne desired to make Jonathan Swift a bishop; but this is a tribute to the worth of literature which far surpasses them all."

"You look at it in the wrong light," rejoined my companion. "Washington Irving was not only a great writer but he was an exemplary Christian, and it seems to me quite appropriate that he should be honored by his friends and admirers by a temple erected for the worship of the living God, whom he delighted to serve. This will be a source of continual benefit to the entire community; a fountain from which will issue the solid benefits accruing to society from the active workings of an effective religious organization. What better memorial can mortal desire than this?"

I did not argue the point further, but left it to go back to the personal reminiscences of Irving, with which my companion had interested me.

"Was Irving a man of much humor in private life?" I asked.

"Very great," was the response. "No man could perceive the comical aspect of a subject quicker than he could. When he first moved into this region—I think it was about eighteen hundred and thirty-seven—he was very much annoyed by the thefts which some bold boys perpetrated upon his fruit. One tree in particular, which stood at a distance from his cottage, and which bore apples of a choice kind, was yearly stripped by them. He determined to stop their visitations by a method which was peculiar to him. Learning one day from his gardener that a squad of them were on the premises, after placing him in a certain spot and telling him what to do, he described a circuit, and from the opposite side came upon the boys unexpectedly. He having very recently

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google settled in the neighborhood they were not familiar with his appearance, and went on pocketing and munching the apples with the utmost nonchalance.

"After surveying them a while he singled out the lad who apparently assumed the post of leader, and addressed him:

"'Boy,' he said, 'those are very poor apples. I know where there is a tree on which there is a far better kind.'

"'Where is it?' asked the wary marauder.

"'Over yonder,' rejoined Mr. Irving, indicating the direction of the cottage.

"'We are afraid the old gentleman will catch us,' replied the urchin.

"'He is not there now,' said Mr. Irving; 'you will be perfectly safe. Come with me; but do not make any noise, lest he should overhear us.'

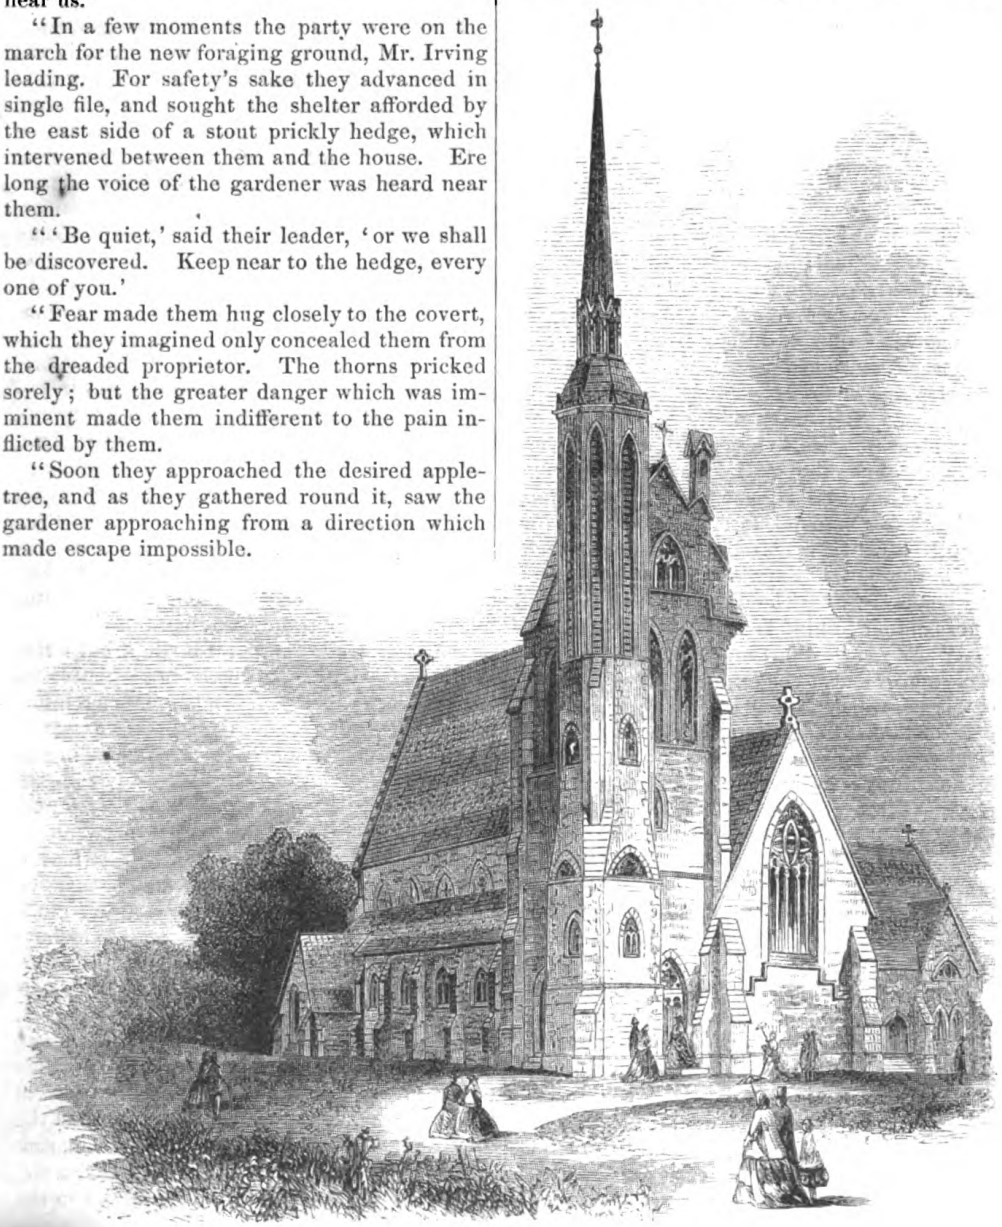
"In a few moments the party were on the march for the new foraging ground, Mr. Irving leading. For safety's sake they advanced in single file, and sought the shelter afforded by the east side of a stout prickly hedge, which intervened between them and the house. Ere long the voice of the gardener was heard near them.

"'Be quiet,' said their leader, 'or we shall be discovered. Keep near to the hedge, every one of you.'

"Fear made them hug closely to the covert, which they imagined only concealed them from the dreaded proprietor. The thorns pricked sorely; but the greater danger which was imminent made them indifferent to the pain inflicted by them.

"Soon they approached the desired apple-tree, and as they gathered round it, saw the gardener approaching from a direction which made escape impossible.

"'Boys,' said Mr. Irving, 'this is the tree I spoke of, and I am the owner of it—Mr. Irving.'



"Great fear began at once to be visible on every face.

"'Do not be afraid,' he continued, 'I shall not punish you; the prickly hedge has done that sufficiently already. I only ask that, when you want to eat my fruit, you will come to me and ask for it. I do not like to have my property taken without my permission.'

"The lad who was the ringleader in this affair told me in after-years of the details of it himself, and added that the rebuke was so thorough that he never robbed Mr. Irving's or any other apple-orchard again.

"Another story characteristic of him is current among us, to this effect:

"Many years ago, when the Episcopal church

THE MEMORIAL CHURCH.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

became too small for the increasing wants of the society, a movement was made to enlarge it. This question was under consideration at a meeting of the vestry, of which Mr. Irving was a member. One or two of the gentlemen present were in favor of building the enlarged portion of brick, the material of which the body of the edifice is composed. One or two more hoped ere long to have a new edifice of stone erected, and were therefore in favor of making the enlargement, which they alleged was to be but a temporary matter, of wood. Both parties held tenaciously to their views, and eventually the discussion, though entirely courteous, waxed warm, without any apparent possibility of its coming to a successful issue either way. At this juncture Mr. Irving, who had been sitting quietly in his chair during the contest, and who was keenly enjoying the scene, said:

"'I have listened with interest to the discussion now going on. Our friend General Webb wants the addition to be built of brick because it will correspond better with the rest of the edifice; on the other side, our friend Mr. Smith thinks it should be constructed of wood for the reason that it will be any thing but a permanent affair. Now I propose a compromise. Suppose we build it of wood and paint it to imitate brick-work, then both parties will be satisfied.'

"The question was settled as General Webb wanted it by this timely hit.

"On another occasion, in the same body, a discussion arose concerning the appointment of delegates to the diocesan convention which was soon to be held. A majority were in favor of sending new men each year, thus allowing the whole body to have eventually the opportunity of sharing in the deliberations of the council. Mr. H——, a veteran member of the vestry, was of the other way of thinking, and notwithstanding he was in the minority, held to his opinion strenuously. At the time he was declaring his views his dog, a faithful but harmless creature, by the name of Trip, lay peacefully slumbering at his feet. Trip was his master's inseparable companion, and followed him every where he went, except to church on Sunday. The return of this day he always seemed cognizant of, and never offered to accompany his master to hear the preaching. On the occasion referred to Trip was, as I have said, sleeping at his master's feet, while his master, standing erect, was advocating his position with all the eloquence he could summon to his aid. At intervals expressions of disapproval were heard from the other members, but without effect. Mr. H—— would not be put down.

"At length, an opportunity occurring, Mr. Irving, who had been listening with great patience, obtained possession of the floor, and said:

"'Mr. Chairman,—While I listen with profound respect to our friend, I claim that he has come here for the purpose, and is at this present time carrying out a preconceived plan for intimidating us, and compelling us to vote as he wishes us. He has the advantage of us. I for one desire to say something upon this subject, but am afraid to so long as he is guarded as he is by his ferocious white dog. Let him be removed from the room, and our courage will return to us again.'

"This sally was received with an outburst of hearty laughter, in which even Mr. H—— joined, and the question was at once settled as the majority desired."

With anecdotes of this nature my companion entertained me until I had left Sleepy Hollow behind and was on the steamboat wharf again. My trip had been a most delightful one, and though I dearly loved Irving before I visited the scene of his "Legend of Sleepy Hollow," yet my reverence and affection for him seemed greatly heightened by my visit to his enchanted valley. Some day I hope to behold it again.

THE BURGLARY AT FAUSTEL EVERSLEIGH.

"WELL, Biggs, what is the matter? You look important this morning."

Biggs swelled in majestic silence, deposited the muffin-dish on the table with as near an approach to emphasis as he dared, and was in the act of retreating, when the young lady standing at one of the open windows looked up from her newspaper to say:

"Aunt Dora, these burglaries are becoming quite alarming; they are traveling in our direction, I think, too; there was one at Woodthorpe only three nights ago—close to us, you know—"

The temptation to cap this piece of news quite overcame Mr. Biggs's wounded dignity, and he opened his lips and spoke.

"And one, Miss Lucy, at Willow Lodge last night, for the postman brought the news this morning with the letters."

"Dear, dear!" said Mrs. Selwyn. "I hope poor Miss Jenkins and Miss Araminta came to no harm."

"The family, ma'am, was not molested," answered Biggs with solemnity, "but every thing the villains could lay hands on was carried off, and no traces of them hasn't been discovered up to the present moment!"

"Really, Aunt Dora, it is serious. You know we are two lone women as well as Miss Jenkins and her sister. Suppose they take a fancy to visit us next?"

"Well, Lucy, what can I do? Is the case urgent enough for me to write over to the barracks and ask Colonel Patteson to send us an agreeable captain and lieutenant, with a party of soldiers warranted sober and not given to flirting, to garrison poor old Eversleigh for a while?"

"I know you are as brave as a lion, auntie dear, but still I think this is not a laughing matter. What could you or I do—or even Biggs—"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"The very fust thing these rascals does, Miss Lucy, when they get into a house, is to lock the men servants, if there is any, into their rooms; so that, you see—"

"Well, well, Biggs, that would be of the less consequence, as I am sure if they omitted to turn the key on you, you would do it on yourself," said Mrs. Selwyn with a twinkle in her eyes that merged into a laugh as Biggs retreated. "There, Lucy," she went on, "don't look so serious, and I will have all the plate packed up to-day and sent in a most ostentatious manner to my bankers, if that will give you peace of mind."

Miss Lucy Gresham continued to discuss her breakfast with a very half-satisfied look on her pretty face, which Mrs. Selwyn observing went on:

"And I'll tell you what I can do as well, if that is not precaution enough. You remember Jack Eversleigh? he is at home now on leave, and I'll write him a line to come down here for a week or two, with his "long sword," revolvers, and all his "bold dragoon" paraphernalia, and mount guard over two unprotected females. It will be quite in Jack's way, or would have been once upon a time. You have not forgotten Jack?"

"I don't remember him very well," answered Miss Lucy, bestowing a good deal of attention on her breakfast-cup. "Hasn't he turned out very wild? Mary Selden told me something of that sort, I think."

"'Give a dog a bad name and hang him,' my dear. It has always been the fashion in Jack's family to give the lad credit for being every thing he ought not to be, and so really to make him some things he would not otherwise have been. I don't know exactly what amount, or what kind of iniquity is comprehended in the word 'wild;' it is certain Jack has always been called a scape-grace; it is equally certain that I believe a truer gentleman, or kinder heart, does not bear her Majesty's commission to-day!"

Mrs. Selwyn's eyes sparkled, and her fair old cheek colored, as she spoke. Childless herself, she was very fond of her late husband's favorite nephew John Eversleigh, and had fought on the lad's side in many a pitched battle with prim aunts and austere father. And it must be owned that Jack was one of those who always give their friends enough to do in this way. Even Mrs. Selwyn, with all her fondness for him, could not deny that, thought Lucy Gresham, as after breakfast she wended her way down the shady avenue, on one of her accustomed errands of good-will and kindness to some of their poorer neighbors, with that invitation and the question of Jack's acceptance of the same, a great deal more present to her mind than she would have cared to own. She would have liked to believe that Jack Eversleigh was no worse than Aunt Dora thought him; she remembered quite well seeing him come to church with the Seldens once when he was staying with them last year, and she remembered, too, with a sigh, how he had certainly gone to sleep on that very occasion, when dear Mr. Lillydew's sermon was only ever such a little over the hour. Mary Selden had said he was "wild," and George Selden, who ought surely to know, being in the same regiment, had talked of Jack's being always "hard-up," whatever that might mean, and so-and-so—and Lucy sighed: she would have preferred to think her old play-fellow was not utterly reprobate, if she had been able.

It was very hard to look at him and yet hold to that opinion, Lucy was thinking, a day or two afterward, as she sat demurely silent near one of the windows, and listened to the merry talk that was going on between Mrs. Selwyn and Captain Eversleigh, newly arrived. Jack seemed mightily amused and interested on hearing in what capacity he was invited, and, on the whole, impressed Miss Gresham with the conviction that he would be rather disappointed if no burglar afforded him any means of exercising his predilection for strife and violence during his stay.

With these thoughts in her mind, it is not wonderful that Lucy's manner toward the object of them was shy and constrained to the last degree. Haughty or repellent she could not be, nature not having provided her with that double-edged weapon called "a spirit," but only a gentle heart that would fain have had kind and loving thoughts of all the world, and believed the best of every man, woman, or child with whom she came into contact. In theory, you see, poor Lucy had shaken her head and sighed over the iniquity of the world at large; but in practice, it was her feminine habit to take those with whom she came into actual contact much as they appeared, or professed themselves to be—not seldom, indeed, in her innocent and tender imaginings crediting them with virtues which I am afraid they had no claim to, out of that gentle region.

And the shyness and constraint did not deter Jack in the least from setting himself to restore, at the very first opportunity, something of the old familiar relations between himself and his little companion of long ago. He thought them both rather pretty than otherwise; but by that time Mr. Jack had privately arrived at the conviction, too, that Miss Gresham possessed the largest, softest, most innocent eyes, and the loveliest wild-rose complexion he had ever seen. Fashionable girls, fast girls, flirting girls, merry, outspoken, frank girls, Jack knew by scores, and had very likely waltzed, hunted, and talked nonsense by the mile, to very nearly the same number; a little tender, unsophisticated, ignorant girl, who shook her head at the opera, balls, and cigar-smoking generally, and yet who cried real, heart-felt tears over the capture of that incorrigible poacher and vagabond, Downy Dick, was something new and piquante; and, accordingly, he set himself to the task of cultivating amicable relations with Lucy Gresham,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

IN THE WOODS.

with a characteristic inability to admit the idea of failure, that must needs have gone far to insure success, even if Lucy had been other than she was.

Being what she was, it is not wonderful that after only two or three days' experience of Jack's pleasant qualities as a companion, in the quiet home-life of the old manor-house, Lucy had gone so far as to think that a gentleman might hunt and even smoke without being utterly reprobate; and that whatever might be comprehended in the vague term of being "hard-up," it could not be any thing very bad, and yet applied with truth to John Eversleigh. Simple faith of a guileless little heart! only it was a pity, you see, that it should have been grounded so very much on the fact of Jack's having handsome dark eyes and a pleasant smile that was always ready.

And in that companionship the days seemed to glide away like dreams, happy dreams, all too fleet in the passing. Ah! those long, sauntering walks through bright summer days, in which Jack's sportsman-like habit of observation, and upbringing in the vigorous outdoor life of an English gentleman, made him quick to see and able to point out to the little town-bred damsel a thousand natural beauties and things of interest which she would have passed by; those rides over breezy downs, among sweet green lanes and shadowy woodland paths, where wood-doves cooed in the happy silence, and squirrels scrambled higher among the scented pines, to look down with bright inquisitive eyes upon the sleek horses and their riders, as they wound along the slender pathways, with gentle footfalls all muffled and made tranquil by the last year's leaves that lay so thickly there. Ah! days, happy in the coming—in the passing—and yet destined to bear such a cruel sting when memory of them was all that was left!

As to the burglars, for whose expected incursions Captain Eversleigh's visit had been a preparation, I am inclined to think that remembrance of them retreated very much into the back-ground, though, for the first night or two, Jack diligently made tremendous and com-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

plicated arrangements for their reception in the way of revolvers, life-preservers, etc., etc. Stout-hearted old Mrs. Selwyn had never entertained any fears; Lucy somehow forgot hers in pleasanter things; and when, one night, just before retiring to bed, Aunt Dora produced from her pocket-book a packet of bank-notes, making an amount of nearly two hundred pounds, which she had received that day, and had delayed, for some reason or other, driving over to Marley to pay into her bankers, it was only Jack who looked somewhat grave over the imprudence.

"It's what Biggs would call a downright tempting of Providence, Aunt Dolly," he said, in concluding his remonstrance.

"Biggs is such an arrant coward that, I declare, if I could see my way to getting up an impromptu burglary for his sole benefit, I'm perfectly sure I should not be able to resist the temptation," remarked the old lady, as she put away the notes in a little cabinet of Japanese workmanship, of which the key was duly taken out and deposited for security, with true feminine ideas of the same, under the family Bible, which lay on its carved oaken stand in a recess.

The sun was streaming brightly upon Lucy's closed eyes the next morning, when she opened them with a start to find Aunt Dora standing by her bedside, looking a little disturbed, and much graver than her pleasant wont.

"My coming in did not wake you, Lucy," she said; "so I suppose it is not to be expected that you should have heard any thing of what took place last night, which was what I came to ask you."

"Took place last night, Aunt Dora!" repeated Lucy, starting up. "Why—but what were you going to say?"

"Only that it seems the house was really broken into last night, and the notes I left in the Japan cabinet in the tent-room taken after all. Jack is half-wild to think that he should have played the watch-dog so inefficiently. He never heard a sound, he says, and they must have passed his door as well as yours. But, Lucy, my child, don't look so terribly white and scared! No one was murdered in their beds this time; and Biggs was not even locked into his room, except by himself."

"Are you sure the money is gone? Oh! Aunt Dora, perhaps it's a mistake—a joke!" said Lucy, breathlessly, and with an inconsequence that made Mrs. Selwyn look a little impatient.

"I can not perceive the joke of losing nearly two hundred pounds; and, as for mistake, the money has been carried off—that's very certain. When Biggs came up stairs this morning he found the window in the little vestibule wide open. He told Martha, who came to me, and I went straight to the tent-room, and found the cabinet wide open and the money gone. It had been opened with the key, too, for that was in the lock. And you never heard any thing, Lucy?"

"Something woke me once—but what does Captain Eversleigh say—what does he think?"

"Say—why, that I ought not to have kept the money in the house: which is only true, as I dare say these light-fingered gentlemen who have been honoring the neighborhood lately knew quite well that yesterday was rent-day; and, as for his thoughts, he has ridden over to Marley post-haste to share them with the police. But I dare say nothing will come of that, for these people have not been detected in any one instance as yet. There, Lucy, I am sorry to have frightened the blood out of your cheeks; make haste with your toilet and come to breakfast, my dear—you look as if you wanted it, and we'll not wait for Jack."

But half an hour afterward Lucy carried the same shocked white face into the breakfast parlor with which she had listened to these tidings; and though Mrs. Selwyn laughed, and said that the occasion was not worth any thing so tragic, somehow that look never faded out of Lucy's face, but seemed to deepen as the day wore on.

Then ensued days of unwonted stir and bustle at quiet old Faustel Eversleigh; a great coming and going of members of the police force from Marley; much communing with the same on the part of Captain Eversleigh, who entered into the search for traces of the thieves with a great deal of energy and spirit, and a perfect influx of visitors to sympathize and condole. Energy and spirit were expended in vain, however, as far as the desired purpose was concerned. There was, absolutely, no clew, it seemed; and when two or three days had gone over, and wary detectives had prowled and poked over every corner of the old house, inside and out—had asked numberless questions of every member of the household, without, as Lucy fancied, seeming to pay much attention to the answers (that same fancy enabled her to reply to those that fell to her share with a great deal more ease than she had thought possible beforehand) they seemed as far off as ever.

Mrs. Selwyn declared she would rather lose the same amount of money three times told than go to the same fuss and bother to recover it; implored her nephew to let the search drop, and take no further steps in the matter; which Captain Eversleigh was, perforce, obliged to do, very unwillingly, as he said, "seeing that his leave was within a day or two of its expiry, and he must deprive his aunt of his presence, just at the very time he should have liked to think himself wanted."

There was a soft under-tone in Jack's voice when he made this remark, and he glanced as he spoke toward that silent figure, sitting in the farthest of the deep old windows with the gentle evening light falling softly on its bending head. Amidst all the bustle and occupation of the last few days Jack had not forgotten to notice how pale and silent Lucy Gresham had been, nor how the innocent brown

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google eyes had worn a scared and bewildered look very foreign to their usual tranquil tenderness.

"It was natural enough, that—she was such a gentle, tender little thing—not a bit stout-hearted, nor strong-minded (none the less charming for the want, though), and, of course, her nerves had been shaken by what had happened."

Captain Eversleigh was thinking something like this as he walked over toward the window where Lucy had sat silent so long, meaning, when he reached her, to say something soothing and sympathizing, only, startled and confounded by the look that Lucy turned upon him for an instant, as he did so, that he drew back involuntarily with—

"For Heaven's sake! what can be the matter, Lucy?"

There was no answer: she had turned her face away again still more closely to the window, so that it was quite hidden; but he saw instead the strong tension of the clasp in which her hands lying in her lap were pressed together. Jack was very much amazed, but he was very much moved too. He threw a hasty glance over his shoulder to where Aunt Dora was reclining in her lounging-chair, her back conveniently toward them, then stooped down very nearly to that averted face, while he said—almost as tenderly as he felt at the instant—

"Tell me what is wrong, Lucy. Ah! if you knew—"

But that beginning was destined to remain uncompleted; for Lucy Gresham suddenly rose out of her seat, upright as a dart, white as a ghost, serene and sad as an accusing angel.

"If I knew! I do know. And now that you know I do—never, never speak to me again—for that I can not bear—and be silent!" and before Captain Eversleigh could recover from his pause of petrified astonishment Miss Gresham turned her back on him and fled from the room.

She did not appear at breakfast the next morning—the last breakfast that Jack Eversleigh would partake of for some time to come under Aunt Dora's roof. Lucy had a headache, Mrs. Selwyn explained, and begged to be excused; which intelligence Jack heard without remark, and was altogether during the progress of the meal so absent and unlike himself that Aunt Dora was privately imagining that there was a reason why he should be more sorry to say "good-by" to Faustel Eversleigh this time than had existed on former occasions.

"Well, well," thought the kind old lady, "and if Jack and Lucy have taken a fancy to one another, I don't know that either could do better; and for my part I think I would ask nothing better than that the children should marry and settle down here with me, as long as I live. I have always liked to think of Jack's having the old place when I am gone, and Lucy would make the dearest little wife in the world. I do think that Jack is smitten—and she—well, well—"

And while the old lady was dreaming of love and marriage, and dark old houses growing all humanly warm and bright in the light of the sweet story that was first told in Eden, Captain Eversleigh was indignantly intent upon these two questions:

"What the deuce could Lucy Gresham mean? What the deuce does she know?"

There was no opportunity of propounding them to Miss Gresham herself, supposing that Captain Eversleigh desired it, for up to the last minute of his stay no Lucy was visible. So his farewells had only to be made to Aunt Dora when the time arrived. They were very hearty and affectionate, like the feeling that subsisted between the two, and when Mrs. Selwyn turned in again from the portico where she had stood to see Jack drive off, she felt as if the silent house had lost something that made it a pleasant home, in that cheerful, manly presence.

It had lost something else, too, as it very soon appeared; for this pale, silent Lucy of the days and weeks succeeding Captain Eversleigh's departure was as unlike the cheerful little maiden of days gone as any thing that could well be imagined. Mrs. Selwyn's heart misgave her when she saw the girl going listlessly about her little everyday duties with that kind of laborious patience and conscientiousness so sadly indicative of the "letter" without the "spirit," and noticed the nervous tremor in which she was apt to be thrown by such slight things as the sudden opening of a door, a quick footstep, or an unexpected address. She saw these things with a little thrill of terror, remembering how slight a foundation her fancy that Jack Eversleigh cared for Lucy Gresham had been built upon, and devoutly wished a dozen times a day that she had never brought the two together, nor meddled with such a doubtful matter as match-making.

As to the lost money and the suspected burglary, that seemed a subject tabooed by both ladies with mutual consent, though not so readily allowed to drop by chance visitors, with whom a topic of conversation during the orthodox twenty minutes was too precious to be parted with lightly.

"Dear me!" said a lady one morning after the circumstances of the robbery had been succinctly detailed to her by Mrs. Selwyn, in answer to her questions. "Did it never occur to you to suspect any one in the house, my dear Mrs. Selwyn?"

"Not to me, certainly," answered Mrs. Selwyn, with a disturbed glance over at Lucy, who had moved suddenly in her chair; "for I have no servant, fortunately, whose trustworthiness has not been proved."

"That is fortunate indeed—for them," returned the lady; "but really I think I should not be very easy myself under the circumstances. Does it not strike you as suspicious,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"WHAT OUGHT I TO DO?"

for instance, that nothing but the money should have been taken, or that the thief should have known so exactly where to put his hand upon it?"

"I don't think I should have thought so myself," answered the old lady, looking very fidgety, "but then I knew there was really little but the money to take. I had sent all the plate we don't use to my bankers some time before, and after my nephew came down Biggs always carried the rest into his room every night. As for the fact of the thieves knowing where to find the money, there was nothing very wonderful about that; no doubt the house had been watched; and, as we all remembered afterward, the windows of the room from which it was taken were wide open, and the lights burning, when I locked it into the cabinet. From that clump of rhododendrons yonder every movement of those in the room could have been seen perfectly well."

"Ah! true—well, it is very pleasant to have such confidence in those about us. And when may we hope to see Captain Eversleigh again?"

"He writes me that there is some chance of his being quartered with a detachment at Marley for a while—a piece of very unhoped-for good news."

The conversation changed; but when the visitor had been gone some minutes Mrs. Selwyn broke the silence that had lasted since then by saying:

"I am sorry that you should have heard Mrs. Sandell's charitable surmises, Lucy dear; Jack begged me not to let you know that such an idea had ever been started. He thought that, being such a timid little thing, it would only add to your uneasiness, perhaps."

"Who first entertained such an idea?" inquired Lucy, faintly.

"The detective who came over first suggested it, I think, to Jack, who imparted it to me; but, of course, I could not entertain it for a moment. Biggs certainly knew I had the money in the house; but surely the fidelity of twenty years—"

Mrs. Selwyn paused a little absently, and Lucy's voice broke passionately into the silence.

"Oh, Aunt Dora, don't suspect any one—least of all poor, good old Biggs! He never took the money—never! never! Captain Eversleigh must be sure of that; and oh! surely he would never let you think so for one instant; it would be too cruel—too wicked!"

"Why, Lucy!" said Mrs. Selwyn, looking at the girl's flushed face in some wonder. "Biggs ought to be very much obliged to you for your championship, only it is a pity there should be no more call for it. As for Jack's entertaining such a suspicion, he pooh-poohed it from the very first; so there is no occasion for all that indignation, my dear. I am not vindictive, I hope," Mrs. Selwyn went on, after a little pause, "but I would give the money over again to have the real thief brought to light, there is something so painful in the atmosphere of doubt and suspicion that surrounds an undiscovered crime.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Don't let us talk any more of it, Lucy; we have been wise in ignoring it hitherto. Have Daisy saddled, and go for a canter over the Downs, my dear; there is a fresh wind blowing that will put all megrims to flight, I dare say."

But instead of ordering Daisy to be saddled Lucy put on her hat and mantle, and taking her solitary way out into the grounds, wandered to a spot at some distance from the house, where a pretty little brown river stole through banks all picturesquely broken and rugged, singing as it went with a happy music to which the girl had unconsciously set dreams as gentle and glad many and many a time in the bright summer days that were gone. Thoughts of them came back to her now, perhaps, all strangely and sadly mingled with the altered present; and throwing her arms forward against the moss-grown trunk of one of the old trees bending over the little river, Lucy hid her face upon them and wept passionate, despairing tears, never known before by those gentle eyes.

"What ought I to do? What is right? What is best?" she thought, with that dreadful, agonizing struggle to reconcile duty and expediency that is apt to beset those whose conscience is so tender and whose heart so gentle as poor Lucy's. "It would break Aunt Dora's heart if it came to light; and mine is breaking now, I think. What shall I do?"

But no answer came to that sad, appealing cry; the wind sighed among the trees overhead, and the leaves came shivering down at the sound, and were borne silently away on the brown water, for it was summer no longer; and never, surely, was autumn so cheerless before, Lucy thought. But joy and sadness are in the eyes which look and the ears which listen, and the fairest sunshine would have been clouded just now to Lucy Gresham's.

In fact, Lucy's eyes had seen nothing very clearly since that night, now many weeks ago, when the bank-notes were stolen from the Japanese cabinet in the tent-room; or, at least, every thing since then was distorted in the light of the utterly confounding sight they had witnessed on that occasion.

It was all before her now, as she sat with hidden face and hands clasped before her eyes; for whether poor Lucy shut her eyes or opened them they only seemed to serve her as long as she looked at one thing.

Yes; it was all before her now. How, on that horrible night, she had started from a light sleep and a happy dream to listen breathlessly to a sound in the corridor outside her door—a quiet, muffled footfall passing stealthily along, and dying away in the distance. How, when it had quite gone—had been gone minutes indeed—she had sprung from her bed, in fear that lent her for the instant all the hardihood of courage, intending to fly into Aunt Dora's room; and how, as she opened the door, she saw with her own eyes—ah, Heaven, yes!—in the broad summer moonlight that lit up all the corridor from end to end with its solemn splendor, John Eversleigh—kind Aunt Dora's dearly-loved nephew—coming out of the tent-room, with the little fanciful, ivory-clasped box that held the bank-notes in his hand! How, in the wonder, the terror, the incredulity with which she looked on this sight, she had shrunk back into the room, and had listened to that muffled footfall coming quietly back past her door, past Aunt Dora's, till it died away again out of the corridor. Then the poor child had crept back into her bed, had turned her face down upon the pillow so as to shut out the fair moonlight, and repeated over and over again, with a piteous persistence in the words, "I have been dreaming; it was a dream; nothing so horrible could be true!" trying so to stifle thought and drown conviction, till suddenly she raised her head, joyful, trembling, melted to thankful tears, in the light of the blessed inspiration that suddenly flashed upon her mind. "It was a joke—a practical joke—this abduction of the bank-notes—done just to give Aunt Dora a little fright and a little warning! How foolish not to have guessed that at once! Of course the money would be restored, and confession made the next morning, when Aunt Dora had been thoroughly well frightened." In the tremulous thankfulness of this relief Lucy sank into the sleep from which Aunt Dora had wakened her that morning.

How poor Lucy's hope that "it was all a joke" had fluctuated through the after proceedings, and had finally faded away altogether, would have been a pitiful thing to see, if any one could have had a clew by which to trace it! Now she had almost forgotten that the cloud which had enshrouded her since that night had ever been temporarily lightened by that idea. Ah no! every thing was wretched—the world a miserable place, people inconceivably wicked, and those happiest and best off who had been laid to rest once for all under the church-yard daisies. Poor little Lucy! This, her first practical encounter with absolute, outcrying evil, had done the work of years, as, indeed, it always does on natures so tender and innocent.

She rose up now, after a while, and walked slowly homeward; so slowly that it was dark when she reached the house, and quite dark in the drawing-room when she opened the door and entered quietly.

As she did so the familiar tones of a rich, manly voice reached her, that she would have known among hundreds, and that she recognized now with a great bound of the heart.

Yes; there, surely enough, standing in the full blaze of the fire-light, was Jack Eversleigh, laughing and chatting with Aunt Dora as if there were no such things as care, or trouble, or wrong-doing in all this work-a-day world. He stopped short, though, as the door opened and Lucy entered, coming forward the next minute with, perhaps, ever so little constraint in his manner as he held out his hand. Lucy

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google half extended hers; but, ah! no, her hand must never lie in that large cordial grasp again! She drew it back, and, bowing low, Jack turned easily away to his former place, and resumed his talk, while Lucy sank down trembling into a seat where the shadows gathered most thickly, and almost hid her from view.

Aunt Dora was certainly in the best of moods and spirits (she was auguring favorably for the success of her pet plan and the happiness of Lucy, you see, in this sudden reappearance of Jack Eversleigh), and as for her nephew, his momentary embarrassment had left no palpable traces behind.

"How can he laugh? How can he talk so lightly as he does?" thought the poor child, cowering among the shadows, with a kind of sorrowful, indignant wonder. "How dare he come here? Is it possible that he did not understand me?—that I did not speak plainly enough?"

She hid her face, and shrank down still more closely in her corner. And still the merry talk and laughter went on by the fire-place.

"Apropos of scrapes, Jack," Mrs. Selwyn said, presently, "how long is it since you walked into one in your sleep?"

Jack Eversleigh laughed, and colored a little.

"Oh! ever so many years now—so many that I hope that proponsity and I have parted company for good and all. It used to cause me no end of bother, though, at one time. You remember the—"

And here Captain Eversleigh broke off, to stare in boundless surprise at the little figure starting from that dark corner with clasped hands and eager, pallid face.

"A sleep-walker! Do you walk in your sleep? Oh! if it were possible that—Aunt Dora—the bank-notes!—the money that was taken!" cried out poor Lucy, breathless, and shaking in every limb.

"The bank-notes, Lucy!—what an idea! Certainly, Jack had a queer habit of walking in his sleep, and doing strange things in a state of somnolency; but I don't suppose—"

"But I saw him, Aunt Dora!—I saw him! Oh! if I had only known—only guessed! I am so happy—so very, very thankful!" And here Lucy sank down in a burst of tears that came fresh from her very heart.

"You saw me!" repeated the young man, looking from Aunt Dora to that crouching, weeping little figure, with an expression of bewilderment; "why did you not say so, then, and save all the bother?"

"I thought you knew what you were doing, and meant to do it. How could I know?" sobbed Lucy.

"Thought that I deliberately and of my own will possessed myself of money that did not belong to me!" said Jack, with involuntary haughtiness. But the next instant his sense of the ridiculous overpowered him, and he burst into a laugh so hearty and prolonged that Aunt Dora joined in it, till the tears streamed down her face; and even poor Lucy was fain to echo it, at the dire and imminent risk of becoming hysterical.

"Poor, dear Lucy," said Mrs. Selwyn, presently, between her gasps for breath—"so you have really been thinking that Jack played the part of burglar that night! That explains so many things. My poor child! There, I will not laugh any more, if I can help it; but, for Heaven's sake! tell us all about it, for I own I don't see the thing quite clearly yet."

And so the whole story had to be gone over, or rather dragged into light by questions; for now such deep, overpowering shame beset Lucy—such a keen perception of the fact that John Eversleigh must of necessity and for evermore hold her in abhorrence—that she was well-nigh speechless.

And Jack, being really a chivalrous and generous-hearted fellow, seeing all the pain and shame in the poor little face, and desirous of sparing it to the uttermost, suppressed whatever feeling he might have had in the matter, after that one involuntary burst, and listened, with good-natured amusement, to the relation of his own exploit.

"I wish you could enlighten me as to what I did with the money, for, on my word, I have never set waking eyes on it. At least, I remember now thinking that it would be a good joke to improvise a burglary, just for Aunt Dora's amusement (you suggested the idea yourself, ma'am, please to recollect); but what on earth became of the money? Did I go straight back into my room, I wonder?"

"No; down stairs, I think," said Lucy, faintly.

"The open window in the vestibule, Jack; how is that to be accounted for? Ah! I have it. Do you remember the little summer-house on the other side of the shrubbery? There's a sliding panel that conceals a recess in it, and many a time you have hidden my keys and work-bag there, when you were a boy. Jack, I will wager half the money that you put it there!"

Which, on examination, turned out to be the case. There lay the little ivory-clasped box, containing the roll of bank-notes, never touched since Mrs. Selwyn's hand had placed them in it; and so the mystery of the "Burglary at Faustel Eversleigh" was a mystery no longer; though in years to come it became a story that Aunt Dora was never tired of telling to the little bright-eyed listeners round her chair, who called the hero and heroine "papa" and "mamma."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE WORK OF SALVATION.

SOMETIMES in mid-winter comes a day so bright and warm we throw open the windows and invite in all outdoors; from the florist's round the corner ethereal odors troop in, and the chill chamber becomes as suggestive of violet beds as Emmet's grave in St. Paul's church-yard.

It came to pass that the old gentleman and the young lady, who secretly made such a time of ascending a flight of stairs and taking their places with the audience assembled from week to week, and even oftener, for the expounding of high spiritual matters, finally were reckoned among the regular attendants and the convinced hearers assembled in that place. Great was the rejoicing among the brethren.

This was the day that had come to Mr. John Hancock. His fears and anxiety, his watching and waiting for the life that was lost to him, he one morning ceased, yes, almost ceased, to feel. She over whom he mourned as doubly lost to him was given back, and he looked up to heaven, with eyes not free of tears indeed; for this restoration was not, he owned to himself, that which he had looked and longed for, but with resignation, and even thankfulness, and toward his fellows of earth with increased sympathy and gentleness, if that was possible; there was now but one thing more—he had only to perfect his improvements, and he should be ready to go.

Ready indeed at any moment! He had not heard without understanding the story of the Flood, of Nineveh, Pompeii—ready! for there was Tom Harvey who understood his aims. Still, if he could be allowed to perfect his own inventions—one likes to finish his work, it seems as necessary as to do one's own breathing.

The young lady who invariably accompanied the old gentleman was supposed to be his daughter by those who merely saw them come and go—known to be so by others who understood that these two were the "celebrated photographer" Hancock, and his no less celebrated assistant in business who painted on porcelain and ivory.

These conferences with mediums, this entrance to the invisible world, was brought about through the portrait painter Goldsmith, who produced such wonderful likenesses of the dead-alive, painted under spiritualistic influences. He was a man whose word had weight with Hancock and Miss Agnes; they reckoned themselves his debtors, and, indeed, in the matter of business, he had served them many a good turn; the income Miss Agnes derived from the miniature copies she made of his remarkable portraits was constantly increasing, while Hancock traced the better part of his business in town to the influence of this artist's commendation. Indeed, whether they acknowledged it or not, he was the rock on which they planted themselves when they decided to remain in town and forego the patronage they were accustomed to find in their country travels

Goldsmith had said something to Miss Agnes one day that made the way to the Hall of Interview very clear and open to her. It was a remark concerning monomaniacs whose minds had been restored to their true balance, whose lives had been made happy by the recovery, through ordained media, of their lost beloved ones.

It was a hint, a suggestion, the delicacy of the stroke made its effectiveness.

So these two were numbered finally among inquirers; and to Hancock, ere long, was vouchsafed the comfort of communications which proved him to be no longer a prisoner of time but a freeman in the universe.

Facts became more momentous when, one day, Mr. Goldsmith procured a portrait which Hancock and Agnes were compelled to verify as Hamlet and his father's ghost.

The effect produced by this addition to the "home circle" was startling. Goldsmith had the uncheerful gratitude of Hancock to manage; but that was not so difficult as the something else he had to deal with in Miss Agnes, though it took neither form of words nor of action.

How far did she believe, how far hope, nay, how far did she fear, when she saw the portrait of her mother, denizen of another world, between which and our own falls the black drapery of death?

There on the wall it hung, and there it was to hang—Madonna never worshiped by true saint as the vision by the photographer.

There on the wall it hung, a beautiful fascination, not without its terrors to the eye and the heart of Agnes.

To both it was a mystery—to each a mystery with how deep a difference! One surrendered to it; fain would the other have surrendered also. But she approached it with a questioning of heart that at least equaled the awe of her gaze. Goldsmith saw this, and he was a young man who honored Miss Agnes.

There was another artist, not so notable as the painter, who worshiped the ground Hancock walked on, and adored Miss Agnes. A youth as "brave as Cæsar, and as meek as Moses," who set all the spiritual business down, profanely, as so much humbug, and derived not the slightest satisfaction from contemplation of the evident benefit the serious and sad-hued autumn life of Hancock was receiving from his delectable communications.

This was Tom Harvey, the chemist, who was so materially assisting Hancock in the execution of his improvements. He and Hancock had been working unawares along in the same track for some time, when he went into the photographer's back-room one day to make an experiment, and the fact came out.

The two men looked at each other as surprised as men could look on ascertaining, each in regard to himself, that he was not the original he had supposed.

"Thou must bleed for me," says the philosopher. On this basis their friendship rested.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Harvey was not slow in performing the gracious feat of surrender. He asked a question or two, rather, it seemed, from interest in the subject than from any impulse of self-interest. Hot-headed youth though he was, he really manifested no eagerness to establish his priority of idea, and he threw himself into Hancock's service, silencing his own right, calling, and what was better, feeling it to be no more than that of an interloper.

He had his reward. He became the trusted friend of old Hancock, and of Hancock the younger, who, in her way, was equal to the colaborers in enthusiasm, though the fact was demonstrated in a way that would have suggested a doubt in some minds equivalent to that of the savage who, touching fire, thought it ice. They would have seen in the white light of her fire the glitter of an iceberg.

John Hancock was a slightly-built, white-haired, white-bearded man, a slender insignificant, who worked on so quietly by day, or by night, as it happened, that he might have been busy turning the scientific world upside down in the next room and you never have guessed it.

His daughter surpassed him in height. In person she was commanding, yet the most timid child brought by happy mother to have her picture taken was speedily set at ease by her, and felt the soothing comfort of her most benignant presence.

Such a woman as she, introduced suddenly into the presence of Hancock, would have disturbed and annoyed him, not by offensive self-assertion, but by a sense of the impassable space between them. He would have found it impossible to work with her. But he had never surveyed her from a distance. They had grown together in their unworldly ways, in knowledge, grace, and godliness.

Goldsmith, who was the rage, and often quoted as authority, said, "I call Miss Hancock an artist;" and as he called himself one, they, of course, stood on a level: but he had the consciousness of patronage, and there was no denying that in her interest he liberally dispensed it.

Tom Harvey, musing on such words as these, became indignant, and wondered what right Goldsmith had to say any thing about the lady any way—to touch her with his eyes even—or to form any opinion whatever in regard to her.

"With all this confounded nonsense about the spirits, their mediums, and rappings, they're in a fair way of getting the devil well-stirred up about their affairs," he said to himself. "Haven't they as much as they can attend to already, I'd like to know? I liked Goldsmith better when he kept to his sketches and nature. But now he's a liar, and he knows it, and that's the worst of it."

But when he had gone as far as this in his reflections, Harvey checked himself. Goldsmith and he had been boys together, and each had fought his way with tolerable manfulness into the scene of activity called the world. For this reason the chemist persuaded himself that he had no right to interfere, even in thought, with the sources of Hancock's happiness. And then, besides, he was in doubt about Miss Agnes.

The friends had separated without formality, but very decidedly, at the point where Goldsmith took up his remarkable business of painting the faces of dwellers in invisible worlds. Very decidedly, yet not as the foolish do, with words sharper than swords.

And lo! they met again in Mr. Hancock's work-shop; both so much interested in the business being done there, and the parties who were doing it. Whatever had been instrumental in producing it, society or success, Goldsmith and Harvey saw with perfect distinctness the change which had taken place in each other within a few months, and a gladiatorial feeling intensified their observation.

Goldsmith had personal superiorities which Harvey noticed with a chill as he looked from him to Miss Hancock. He towered like a second Saul above this group of friends, and had a kingly look of beauty and of pride, if not of power. When one is overtopped by inches it depends on his philosophy and his genius whether he shall be overwhelmed by them.

Of his own personality it was quite evident that Hancock took no thought whatever. Could the same be said of Miss Agnes? That was the question Tom Harvey asked himself when he stood in the midst of this select company, and was conscious that when the miniature painter looked at Goldsmith she looked up—and down when she turned to himself.

The feeling of which the chemist became aware when he discovered the kind of sympathy existing between the three was, as I have said, not agreeable. Hateful feelings entered into it; jealousy, for instance. But if his faith in Goldsmith had been greater he would have trampled on this jealousy—he was man enough to do it.

As it was he held himself in silence, because in doubt, concerning his friend of old time.

If Goldsmith himself were under a delusion, jealousy avaunt! they stood then on equal ground, and the prize was for him who should win it. But if, in the deft exercise of any generally unknown law of physics, he was practicing on the loving and the credulous heart of another, tampering with the precious things of the Holy Place—do we remember what Andrew Johnson said in that famous speech of his in the old time of the war, when the question was what should be done with traitors?

The fire that sent these words booming over the land till the mountains of New England and Nevada echoed them, would have been an understood power in the heart of Harvey.

So he ascended into a Watch Tower.

"Man never is, but always to be, blest."

Success in his experiments, proved theories, the near prospect of a professorship should he desire it, ability to extend a helping hand to some who had smiled on him as he climbed on

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

his rough way—he had called himself, as he passed from step to step, content. Content! the nearest word to happiness. But now he was dis-content, the nearest word to unhappiness.

While he is considering how he, wretched man, shall deliver himself from his bondage, let us stroll down the pleasant path by which the photographer has ascended to his present commanding position. Commanding position—yes, surely! Such was David's when he stood where he could sling his stone at the giant; such was Samson's when he swung the jaw-bone of an ass; such was Aaron's when he lifted up his rod; such Cain's, indeed, with the club in his hand, and such John Hancock's with his photograph implements.

Freedom to breathe and to think; does not he who has fought his way to a place where it is possible to do both occupy a commanding position?

One afternoon a poor man stood before the counter of a village shop and meditated briskly.

Several small packages were lying before him, and he was doubting whether he should add to his stock of purchases the mechanical assistant which he had been expecting, and greatly desiring, to purchase all the past year, saving here and there by a pinch that cost a pang until he should have laid aside the necessary sum.

When he entered the shop this doubt had no existence; indeed, his very business in Durham was to examine and secure this most desirable assistant. But now, with money in his pocket sufficient for the purchase, behold a child playing behind the counter with a "crying baby," and a woman in attendance with a wife's ring on her finger, changed the course of his wishes and the current of his purpose.

He thought of the child at home; of the woman at home, and having begun his purchases in this variety shop on their account, he ended it also with a thought of them. The few chemicals he had bought must suffice. He inquired the cost of the "crying baby;" it was a novelty among toys, and the price was high. He shook his head, but finally, as one does a thing in a desperate, blind way, so he.

He walked out of the shop without looking to the right hand or the left when he had settled his account. He had done the thing he must, and preferred not to think about it—where was the use? How happy the little girl would be over the crying baby, in its coarse, white shirt and night-cap; and what a companion for her in her little bed! What would her mother think? He avoided that question. While he was busy avoiding it he happened to look back toward the shop-window he was passing; a sudden expression of relief enlivened his face; he went in and bought a plain gold ring; that done, he appeared again on the sidewalk, looked hurriedly about him, and then walked on to the dépôt at a quickened pace. He was none too soon. The conductor had given his final warning, the wheels were beginning their mighty roll; he jumped on board, found a seat for himself, and was a small thing to look at for one that could feel so much, when all was done. There are systems of worlds ignored by us which complete their cycles and fulfil their destiny; the microscope gives to them range, authority, dignity. If John Hancock, with his great name, was a microscopic man, the merest wayfarer, a citizen without the highest rights of citizenship, having no local habitation, a stranger and a pilgrim in the land, he had within the last hour given evidence of the justice with which he might lay claim to the Rights of Man.

Humanity had outweighed interest. Little Agnes was perhaps about to die. She had passed a restless, feverish night. He would not have left her on any account, but his business was at a stand-still because his stock of certain necessary chemicals was exhausted, and work was waiting; he dared not put off his patrons. Besides Mary had counseled him—and to whose care might a child be intrusted if not to that of her own mother?

Still he had his misgivings; and now that he had nothing to do but sit still and think of them, it seemed to him that the engine dragged itself along the road which passed through Yale. He had been from home, however, but two hours. The third would see him bending over the child again.

If Agnes was only on gaining ground he should to-morrow more than make up for the loss of a whole day, for a day given to aught besides work was a lost day to him—what right had he to rest? What right has an omnibus horse to drop down in the street and actually die, while a dozen passengers, having paid their fare, wait, astonished at the default? Death would need to take John Hancock by surprise, or he would never find him.

At Yale, a mere station on the line, he left the train, and without noticing the fact that he was the only passenger who did so, or even perceiving the quiet of the place as contrasted with the Babel of the small town he had visited, which must have impressed any person less preoccupied, he hurried down the road to a car drawn a short distance from the track—a long, narrow, yellow car.

As soon as it was revealed to him by a bend in the road he became easier in his mind, and did not walk so fast, but began to investigate the contents of his pockets to make sure that nothing was left behind. Then, as he looked at the brown paper parcel in his hand, he smiled a rueful smile, and his heart thrilled at thought of the dainty pink parcel inside of the coarse gray one. He seemed to see some resemblance between himself and the child in the external wrap and the interior beauty, for the doll had a most beautiful face, on account of which a blessing fell on the maker.

Ascending the step of the car he stood a moment looking through the glass over the door on his little world within.

John Hancock had even at this time passed

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google his youth. Many a turn, indeed, had he taken since. His sandy hair was getting white, and he was bald. It would seem that never, since in the pride of his youthful heart he bought him a swallow-tailed coat of green, had he changed the same for a more modern garment. You might have discerned on inspection almost every color of the rainbow in that coat.

He opened the door of the car cautiously, slowly, and when he had looked within he entered, closing it behind him. For the first time since he went away he coughed.

His cough brought the woman from the recess beyond the curtain.

"How is the little girl?" was his first question.

"Bad."

"Not worse?"

"Burnt up with fever, and splitting herself coughing."

"Is she awake?"

"Has he come back?" asked a quick, sharp voice—a child's, unnatural though the tone was. It thrilled the heart of John. He strode on behind the curtain without asking further questions.

"He's come, and somebody else—Aggy may guess who," said he, and down he went on his knees by the child's bed, a narrow shelf closely calculated in the dimensions thereof, and fitted to its place as a berth in a canal boat. As he spoke he produced the parcel.

"Somebody to sleep with Aggy—and won't take up too much room," said he. "That's a pretty good string," and he looked thoughtfully at the cord which secured the parcel.

"Cut it," said the autocrat on the shelf. The string was cut accordingly, and the gray wrap removed. There remained then the pink. Hancock looked as excited as the child, when, on giving it a pinch, it answered with a squeak.

"Here's another little girl come to live with us," said he, and he gave it into the hands of the marveling child. Oh, how she looked as he turned his eyes on her, and from her to her mother!

The little face was white as a lily—and worse than white—it was pale, and under her eyes were deep purple rings, and the brown curls on her forehead were heavy with baleful damp. The fever had now passed.

"I have given her a pleasure," said John to himself, and a soft light streamed through the gloom of his inner life; then seeing how impatient the trembling fingers were striving to remove the tissue, he assisted them.

The next instant Agnes folded her arms around the doll. She had hardly glanced at it when she hid its face and her own; it was plain to see nothing but death should part these two.

"So," said the mother, and she looked at John in a grave, surprised, and doubting way, touched more tenderly, it was evident, than she was often touched by any thing in life.

Her voice reminded him, his fingers trembled in his vest pocket, he hesitated a moment, but his will did not. He drew forth the plain gold ring he had purchased in town.

"Mary," said he, "here it is, and time you had it."

She had waited seven years for this ring, and now he who should have put it on her finger had not done so—only this man, John Hancock, her cousin, in some remote degree.

"You must be getting rich," said she.

Indifferent as her voice sounded, the woman's eyes flashed, and she did not look at John. She put the ring on her finger, however, and he breathed easier than he had for many a day.

"The doctor was along and looked in. He's sure Aggy will be about less'n a week," she said; and John looked so well pleased, and so grateful, that she seemed to be fascinated by the expression of his face. He was a study to her. At last she said, "Where is the instrument you bought for the picture-taking?"

He opened his empty hands, shook his head, and smiled.

"Couldn't you find it?"

He shook his head again. It seemed for a moment that she gave him credit for the statement. Then a change came over her, as over the rough hills when the soft mist envelops them. There was a relenting look in her eyes—a relenting tone in her voice.

"You ain't to be trusted out of sight with a sixpence," said she. "After all your slaving and hoarding you'll end where you began."

He made no reply, but secretly he winced at those words. She was only like the rest of the world, measuring progress by success, man by money.

He took an orange from his pocket, rolled it in his hands and laughed. He would not argue that point with Mary—he had fought so long with himself he felt too weary to proclaim war with any other creature.

"That's for Agnes," said he, gayly, looking toward the shelf on which the child was lying. But there came no response from that quarter. Agnes was sound asleep, still as the crying baby in her arms.

"I'd like a little something myself," said he, turning to the woman.

His words were an act of courtesy, for his impulse was to look into his cupboard and help himself. But if he did not allow her to serve him what excuse was she to give herself for continuing under his roof? broken bones and measles seemed to her insufficient.

She took the orange and laid it beside her little girl, and went into the rear of the car; but the next moment came back with a letter which she gave to Mr. Hancock.

He was exceedingly surprised thereat, as was easy to be seen; she saw it, and was perhaps also a little apprehensive as to what the contents of the letter might be, for she turned away from him immediately, and made herself busy preparing his supper.

When she brought a waiter a few minutes after and placed it on the stand with supper for

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

two, she saw John Hancock sitting at the foot of the child's bed, his legs crossed, his head bent, his eyes on the opened sheet, which was a telegraphic communication forwarded to him by his old friend in Scottsville, to whose care it had been addressed.

She stood still and waited till he should speak, and she wondered at him, for never had she seen him so cut down as now.

He gave the letter to her without a word. At last she said:

"So Aunty's gone! You will have to go to the funeral, John."

"Dead and buried," said he—"it was sent ten days ago—following me about."

"So it was," said she, consulting the date.

"I can't do any thing for her now. God knows I wanted to, and tried, and wasn't ever let."

His head sunk lower on his breast when the steady little fire of hope that burned in his heart had, by this reverse, been put out. The extinguishment left its marked result in his attitude, and in the entire expression of the man. His form looked older, sadder, more cadaverous; his eyes paler, his shoulders still more drooping. "Some men," said he, losing himself, that noble self to which he had desperately clung as he fared from bad to worse—"some men are born to this kind of luck; I've never had any other."

"It seems so," said she, with a good deal of feeling in her voice. At times, indeed how often, she had thought lightly of John! In her young and giddy days she had looked upon him as a weak, feeble man, but now in this time of his calamity and grief she considered him an angel. Her sympathy, it seemed, was not the best thing for him. He turned upon her in a way so unexpected that she was startled by it.

"I let another man have you," said he, "when I knew he wasn't my equal for knowing how to take care of a woman. He could talk better than I could, but he didn't feel more. That was a hard one. Then I let mother go with Larcom, because I was proud and mad at her in my heart for thinking that a son-in-law was better than a son. If I had been her I would 'a stayed by one that loved me, and helped to eat his last crust. But I know she was agin being a burden—only it looked as if she had a suspicion I wasn't equal to carrying out what I had undertook....."

"Have you any paper there? I'll write to Larcom and tell him the telegraph followed us round till it found me—too late as usual. By the time he answers it and asks for money for the expenses I shall have some, you know."

There was a mixture of simplicity, pride and pain, hope and doubt, in Hancock's face as he looked up at the woman before him. She turned away in haste from the contemplation of it as she had done before, saying to herself, "You poor old child—you are an angel, John, and no mistake!"

"Do eat something," said she to him. "If you don't I'll run away. I won't stay here and see you turning to a ghost before my eyes. What are you going to work on, if you don't eat?"

It was the only argument to which he would listen; he must eat to live that he might work.

"If it wasn't for you here, Mary, and little Ag, I would give it up; I would indeed!"

"I know that; but I don't know"—she stopped there.

"You don't know what?" said he.

"The end of it all."

"Who does?"

She could not say. Weak man that he was, Hancock had somehow conveyed to her mind a sense of mysterious strength and knowledge that was lodged within him, and now that he disavowed it she was lost indeed.

"Who does?" he repeated, as one should speak who had at last concluded to drop from his tired shoulders the burden of the world. "A day at a time is enough. I never thought so before. I've been in the habit of reckoning a long time ahead; I never expected any thing to come to me right away. It was always something far off. God knows I haven't put myself on Him for—"

"Where is God?" asked little Agnes from her shelf.

"I don't know, child, where He is."

"I want to ask Him something."

"Ask Him, then," said the mother. "He can answer from one place well's another. I've heard so," said she, in a lower voice to John. "But I don't know about it. They tell children so; and it's no harm to believe it."

"I believe it," said John, reverently; "but I am not a beggar. It's a different thing, a child's asking. We let them have their way pretty generally."

"I am going to ask Him to keep me here with papa, John," said Agnes. "I don't want to get well and go away."

"What'll you do about me then?" asked Mary.

The child looked at her mother with serious eyes that saw her in all her beauty of flesh and blood—strong flesh and fiery blood. She seemed to be studying the expression of the dark eyes underneath the straight brows, the broad chest, the grace of the figure that seemed to bend toward her. She saw her as she stood there in Mr. Hancock's car, and as she had elsewhere beheld her, on flying steeds encircled by gaping crowds of applauding men and women; these portraitures were in the apprehension of the conscious woman as well as in the vision of the reflecting child, and she waited as if for doom, until the little creature said:

"It isn't me that's going to do it, you know. If I ask Him maybe He will, and maybe He won't."

"You had better let all that alone," said the mother, hurriedly, and she dared not look at the silent spectator and listener opposite.

"Am I getting well?" asked Agnes.

"You are on your feet—just as good, and in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

every body's way, bothering John out of his life. He can't take his tea in peace, tired as he is, on your account."

John turned toward the bed: the child saw his face, and that he smiled.

"If any body sends another letter here it sha'n't come in," said she.

He felt a contraction of the heart; there was no use of trying to conceal any thing from Agnes.

"When I am up all the time may I help you make pictures?" she asked.

"You shall," he answered; "I'll teach you. When you're grown up you can make money for yourself and your mother—it's a good trade. I'll set you up in business myself," he continued, with more spirit; then he added, in a lower voice, looking at the child's mother, as if he would persuade her of so unlikely an event: "I've got a long while to do it in; it's another thing to promise for one that's young. Mother was growing older all the time; it's another thing to promise for a child."

So he had returned to life again with hope.

There was a good deal of work to be done in Yale; and, supplied with his chemicals, and consoling himself for the want of the improvement as only a philosopher could, Hancock went on with his business.

A letter reached him from Larcom just as he was beginning to talk about leaving the place, and the son had the satisfaction of paying the expenses of his mother's funeral. He had a terribly pleasing sense of proprietorship in that coffin under ground.

What effect had all this patience, humility, and labor on handsome Mary? As day by day she saw the working of heavenly graces in the storm-battered temple of Hancock's life, "awful was the watching-place"—"awful what she saw from thence."

Hancock missed her one morning. She was gone so long that at last he began to be troubled.

Agnes was playing about with her doll in the car, but, if he had noticed it, watching him with a feline narrowness meanwhile.

At last he said,

"Where's your mother, Agnes?"

She looked at him until her silence compelled him to look at her; then he saw a kind of intelligence in her face that made him shudder.

"Don't you know?" said she.

"Do you? Well, where now?"

"She has gone away."

The thing that he had most feared had fallen upon him. He felt that he could not ask another question.

"She is coming back," said the child, whose sport was suddenly ended when she saw the look of wrath and pain on Hancock's face. "She has gone to tend to something. She said she would come back pretty quick, and I wasn't to trouble you, but to help you." Agnes said all this because she had been charged to say it, but then she began to cry.

"How soon will she come? Don't cry. You shall help me. You don't trouble me. I couldn't get on without you." These consolations were uttered as the truths presented themselves to him, one by one. Then he asked again: "When is she coming back?"

"Pretty soon," she said; but Agnes seemed suddenly to understand how little comfort was to be drawn from this indefinite promise.

"How did she go?" asked John, his voice as heavy as that in which she had spoken the last words.

"In the cars, you know; we are to wait, she said."

"Wait! she knew I was all ready to start off; that I've only been staying on from day to day for a week back. I've taken every face in this county, I believe, and all the dogs and cats besides. That's what she said herself."

"She didn't mean wait here. She said to go on and she'd come too."

It was by no rapid operation that the next thought was evolved from the brain of John Hancock. Many an hour passed before he said to himself, "It'll be outlawed in a year, that marriage will be. She's gone to find him.. He's more to her, that ruffian is, than this child here. I'll keep the poor thing. It's the best of Mary. She may go. But she'll never get Agnes out of my hands—never!"

As he said that a sickening conviction that Mary intended to desert little Agnes entered his heart. The thought filled him with anguish. All the pitiful, gentle feelings the knightly spirit had cherished seemed to change. It was true! the worst that had ever been said about the silly girl. He had wronged his mother, his dead mother, who judged Mary, he now saw, with the wisdom of a woman, and not the folly of a man. He knew nothing—he had never known any thing. Idiots and knaves had taken advantage of him all his days. The poor, crushed spirit hated itself because of its weakness, despised itself for its humanity, and turned upon the child with stern determinations which were executed with gentlest loving-kindness.

Next, his impulse was to go in search of Mary—to fly in pursuit of her, bane of his life though she had been—and to save her—save her in spite of herself—save her from what? if he but knew!

In his far-off youth when he dreamed over her strange, wild beauty, seeking the while for work in a sphere above him where he saw rewards were, did he think of her love as of something also to be won? Perhaps not. People said that love for her had done him mischief—he did not feel it so; but when she ran away with a rope-dancer, who, in turn, deserted her, and justified thus the hard prophets among the elders, he discovered many things in regard to himself.

It happened about the time of her first flight that Hancock fell in with a man who called himself a photographer, and he was in need of an assistant. The man called himself a traveling artist. Hancock's native place had become

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google hateful to him; and so these two went up and down the country in their car—a sort of triumphal chariot it proved, in its way—and made pictures of living men and women. Hancock was the successor of his partner when he died.

He kept to the road and the business. Why? He followed in the train of circuses and traveling theatres, and was seen much oftener in such places of entertainment than might have been expected naturally of a man so grave and sad. Why? Thinking of Mary.

One day his long anxiety, his watching and waiting, was rewarded. He approached a tent in time to see a child brought out and laid upon the grass. Then a woman came and bent over it, and cried for help. The child was Agnes—the woman was Mary: help was at hand—John Hancock! It reads like a fiction, but truth is stranger than fiction, and this remark is not original with the writer.

Paint and tinsel could not so disguise this Mary that Hancock's eyes should doubt on whom they gazed. There was no surgeon at hand, and the child was seriously hurt. The car was near—its owner hospitably opened the door—the place was shady, and all outdoors was scorched by the midsummer sun. The woman herself took up her child, carried her into the car, and the little moaning sufferer, who had miscalculated distances in leaping through the hoops as the horses dashed around the arena, and had fallen and broken her arm, was laid in her pretty white gauze dress, now much tumbled and crushed, on a box over which poor Hancock had hastily spread his coat.

John had discovered Mary, and she was not long in discovering him.

It was evident that the little girl could not go on with the troupe, neither could she be left alone with the stranger who so suddenly found a woman and child on his hands. But the managers would have been less ready to supply their horsewoman's place had the photographer been less generous in buying off the performers. Mary and little Agnes therefore staid while the circus went on. Before the broken bones were fairly knit together Agnes was sick, in orthodox manner, of measles.

And now the mother had absconded; 'tis a bad word—but the fact looked bad.

How many times had she declared to Hancock that she hated the life she had lived, and vowed that she would never return to her dangerous business: he was convinced that its honors had no charm for her; but how was she going to earn her living? Long that thought troubled him. "I'll just go on," he said to himself at last. "There's no use of expecting or looking. She won't look for Agnes's father. She don't expect him to support her, and she won't let me. She has that ring on her finger. She knows what it means. It keeps her a wife, though I gave it to her. All she has been through will keep the poor dear safe. I don't feel afraid."

Then he did fear! The fact was confirmed by his apparent denial of it. But in spite of the fear a sense of rest fell upon him that was unknown before. He brightened up "sensibly"—he chose out for himself a route that should show the little girl fair summer scenes, and many a pleasant ramble did they take up the hill-sides, and along river-courses, and through the fields and lanes of the great garden of the country. Never did creature enter with more intelligent satisfaction, wisdom, love, into the life of another than Agnes into his.

Her mother had said to her when she went away, "Take good care of him till I come back," and the words having fairly entered into the girl's heart went no more out.

It was the most natural thing for her to wish to serve him—not only in housekeeping labors, which were not heavy: so like birds they lived, hopping, as it were, from bough to bough, finding here a worm and there a fly, and beyond sweet fruits enough—but in his heart also, she would help him there.

So he let her play with his colors, and she learned to use them, and, neither of them exactly knowing how it was done, she at last sat down to her work and was steady and patient in pursuing it as John Hancock himself.

Of course 'tis the old story over again. Patience made her a good colorist, Nature at the outset having bestowed upon her a discriminating eye, and her tints and touches gave John almost as much joy, and excited in him quite as much wonder, as the improvements he made in his branch of the business occasioned in her.

So they went their circuit, year after year—patrons became prejudiced in their favor, and their appearance was always hailed with welcome.

Children became young men and young women—then they brought in turn their lovers and their children for portraiture. It ceased to be a question with Hancock how long this would go on—it would probably go on forever.

But every summer when he began his wanderings—for in the winter they took lodgings in some large town, and opened "a gallery"—(no, my friends, it did not rival Brady's)—as often as he saw the birds building their nests, the trees in leaf, the flowers in bloom, the skies in summer shine, his hope revived, and waxed in solemn beauty, and he watched the maturing life of Agnes, thinking of the good God who had left her in his charge, and who would surely, surely in His own time, restore the lost darling to them again.

Inconstancy, distraction, division of heart, was with him a matter simply impossible. Am I singing a madrigal? Oh, ye poets of love and sorrow, this tale is true—too true, I almost think, to tell. The young artist was the old artist's daughter—the daughter of his spirit. He called her so when he spoke of her—when he thought of her the same. He had never loved but one, that one was her mother—he was bearing the Cross of Love!

There came a time, as the years rolled on,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

when it became impossible for these wayfarers to go about the country as they had done in blithe spring and summer time. Hancock was unfit to endure the fatigues of journeying. Agnes was first to discover this, and she persuaded him to hazard the loss of their country patronage.

He shook his head when she first proposed that they should remain where they were. More than one reason he had for his argument that such a course would be unwise; he left unspoken the most cogent—the loss that was hazarded by giving up the summer tour was to him not, in fact, a loss of patrons. He remembered that once he had found Mary as he went on from place to place. His experiences were in the habit of repeating themselves—this one had not yet done so!

But finally he yielded to the advice of Agnes. If there was to be a restoration, a recovery, a reunion, God would find out the way for achieving it, and the thought of rest, as Agnes developed it, had an increasing charm to him.

It was after the settlement of these crowned heads in their palace, "Home of the Wanderers" they tell us the word signifies, kings of old time having been nomadic in character as well as habit, that Goldsmith and Harvey, as business men, made the acquaintance of Hancock and Agnes. The kinds of friendship which had succeeded the acquaintance the reader understands. Each of these young men had by services rendered won the love of the guileless old man.

Goldsmith had come first. He had seen and admired some of the work done by Miss Agnes. He was able to instruct her in many matters concerning her art whereof she was in profoundest ignorance. He brought her an order one day—she was to copy on ivory a portrait he had painted for the parents of a lost child. The commission was given at a time when things looked dark to Agnes, and she was doubting whether she had given the right counsel in the matter of country travel and summer work on the road. She could never forget it. Mr. Goldsmith stood that day in so favorable a light that he might well congratulate himself, and he did; for he saw that he had served her, and he knew how such a woman is apt to regard the lightest deed of kindness.

The many and surprisingly remunerative orders he had since been able to procure for Agnes strengthened his influence, specially with Hancock, who moreover regarded him with an awe which no words could express; for to him had been revealed that vision which now brightened his heart and justified the fidelity of his heart—the portrait of Mary.

Harvey he saw in a light more human and homely; perhaps he was regarded more tenderly than Goldsmith, who was to be thought of with reverence and never dissociated from his work.

Never dissociated from his work! Harvey did not accept that decision. He was in an invariable state of wonder when he thought of Goldsmith, and he thought of him quite as often as it was well for him to think of a man in whom he had lost confidence. Wonder and doubt was not a state of mind in which he could quietly rest. He liked not that Goldsmith should consider himself a patron—he liked still less that he should be so considered. He wondered if Miss Agnes was the best miniature painter in town, and of that he had no doubt, of course—why the most important orders invariably came to her through Goldsmith. He doubted the spiritual business, as has been stated already, from beginning to end. Whatever the mystery undeveloped might be he was sure that Goldsmith had not reached the heart of it—he was not spiritual enough—not intellectual enough—not man enough—not angel enough. A man judged a man, and a man was found wanting.

Now and then a word or a look dropped from Harvey which made the heart of Agnes beat faster; or her nerves proved uncontrollable and were thrilled. Sometimes her eyes flashed with questioning, sometimes with displeasure. It was a discourteous word, a discrediting look: she never saw that Goldsmith winced under either—but she herself winced.

One day the chemist had been occupied with Hancock for an hour making experiments, and the latter had thrown himself on a lounge in his laboratory to await results.

He fell asleep in a moment, and this was by no means an unusual effect of a momentary cessation from labor. Indeed, it sometimes seemed to those who watched him with chief interest that he only needed to perfect his improvements, and he would instantly lay down his life.

The door between the laboratory and Miss Hancock's room stood open, as it usually did, and Harvey passed out of one apartment into the other, and had no sooner done so than she called him by a look to her table. As he came near she rose. Her face had a rare expression. If Harvey had eyes he would both exult and feel exalted when he saw it.

She had taken from a drawer as he entered a port-folio, and was opening it when he came and stood beside her. She wanted sympathy, and he was the one of whom she asked it, and not because he chanced to be nearest.

"There he is," said she, opening a thin drawing-book and pointing to the page.

See how human beings in the greatest hours serve each other! Harvey was not by nature obtuse, yet he said,

"Who is he?" belittled at the moment by a suspicion which he did not for a long time after forget and could only remember with shame.

"Do you ask?" she answered; and she would have closed the book if he had not forcibly laid his hand upon it.

"I do not ask;" and she had seen a battle and one slain while she looked on him for a moment.

The picture—it was in water colors—repre-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google sented a temple. All that white marble, polished, glistening, wrought into slender columns and arches, unadorned, may signify, was signified; all that climbing roses in perfect bud or glorious bloom, or passion-flowers, white lilies, ivy, fragrant blue violets, can symbolize in their pure types, was symbolized by them. The temple's dome was the blue sky without a fleck of cloud—the windows were free of stained interceptors of light, the soft winds entered freely—there was only beauty, purity, love here, and the Cross, Love's fortress, Love's tower, Love's impregnable defense, lifted up and to be seen of all. The temple had no visible occupant—Silence was there and the Unseen Spirit. No need that the artist should write, where she had not written, the Temple of the Holy One.

"You understand him? That is the reason I showed it to you," said Agnes; "and so—" she hesitated, "let him believe what he believes."

Tom Harvey fairly blushed as she, saying these words, closed the book and the port-folio.

"You are zealous for the truth," she said, perceiving his confusion—"so am I; but let him alone."

She had understood him then through the tormenting days and weeks past, and there was now no possibility of his misunderstanding her.

"I had rather be the idiot I should be if I did not understand you than have your confidence given me in this way," said he, "as if on compulsion."

For a moment Agnes stood looking at him in doubt and surprise; then she in turn blushed and said, proudly, answering something within herself as well as his words:

"I can not afford to anger his best friend and my friend. Are you going to take it that way?" You would not have my confidence if I did not choose to give it. I can protect him from impostors who have ill-will toward him; but I will not take away his great happiness.....except to give him a greater!.....He has had so much hard truth to deal with I am only grateful that the iron should be covered up.....But every thing that you have discovered in this business I can bear to know—yes, and should know."

Harvey was dumb.

"I can not bear that you should deceive me," she said, waiting still.

"I would no sooner attempt to deceive you than I would my Maker," said he, speaking with a difficulty that was apparent. "I could not, and I would not."

Because she could not command another word, Agnes sat down at her table and seemed to resume her work. If you had gone into her room just then you would have seen a diligent artist and a grave-faced visitor, who was probably ordering a picture—so much good would your two eyes have done you.

Harvey walked twice across the room—he stood at the window and looked down into the street; turning about he approached the table, all the heart of the man was in his eyes as he waited for a moment looking at Agnes; then he said, hazarding all on a word:

"Miss Hancock, I believe she lives. Do you wish me to find her?"

I leave the reader to consider what must have passed through the mind, heart, spirit of Agnes as she answered, "Yes."

"I will do it."

From that moment an agony of suspense that had in it quite as much of the fear and dread as the hope of success enveloped each. "Harvey is the best fellow I have ever seen," said old Hancock to Agnes that night, and as he said it, he looked at the girl with eyes that fain would have read her heart. The experiments had ended successfully; and thenceforth, he said, durable, time-defying pictures would be possible, and the discovery should be free to every man—it was one of general interest, and no one should pay a price for his labor in discovering a natural law. That was the way he reasoned, and Agnes never differed from him—least of all was she in the mood to do it now when her soul melted within her at the remembrance of the words which had passed between herself and Harvey that day.

Harvey's impulse, when he left Hancock's gallery, was to go to Goldsmith and say to him at once:

"Where is the woman you have painted? Talk sense. You know you have been humbugging—you have had a pattern to paint after; I want to see it."

But that was an impulse only a fool would act on. His next thought was: "All is fair in love and war—if I can get back to where I used to be—there was a time when I knew all that Goldsmith knew about his affairs."

But that was an impulse only a knave would indulge.

No; he was going to fight a battle with Goldsmith, and if he didn't hoist the colors of an enemy, neither would he give the Judas kiss.

He looked about for his old friend the next day in places where he thought he would be likely to find him, but he did not find him. He did not, thus incited, turn his seeking into a search; he preferred that the business should unfold itself as he now felt persuaded that it would do. But when day after day passed, and Goldsmith neither crossed his path nor was any where to be seen or even found—for he now began to look for him—Harvey went to his studio, and behold it was closed; a card on the door stated that the artist would be absent through the month.

"Goldsmith is out of town," he said to Hancock.

"Yes," answered the old man, "he has gone to the mountains, I believe; he got tired out in the winter, work was so pressing, and the change of season don't seem to have relieved him. But, Harvey, I tell you what," said the old man, in a whisper, "a man could afford to be worn out doing such work as he does."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Well, I don't know," Harvey answered; "it isn't pleasant to be worn out by any thing. I don't believe I'm a born worker, like you or Miss Agnes. Any way, if I were put to the test, I wouldn't choose such work as he does as a means of opening the way for myself out of the world. Honestly, I believe there's just as much supernaturalism in my art as there is in his."

Hancock looked very grave at that bold proclamation of heretical opinion.

"I hope you'll never know for yourself all I know about it," said he.

"The kingdom of heaven would open for you without his help, I reckon," answered Harvey. "Excuse me; I've no business to talk this way to you. I wouldn't if Miss Agnes were any where about. I didn't come here to talk any way, but to say good-by. I've had a call. I'm going to make an analysis for an old friend of my father's. He thinks I will discover the elixir of life, I believe, from the way he writes. I wish you were going with me—it's only forty miles. Come! say you will—you and Miss Agnes."

Any thing more improbable than acceptance of this invitation was not to be thought of; yet no sooner had Harvey uttered it than he seemed to see a necessity for the unpremeditated utterance, and to feel a determination that it should be accepted. It was getting to be dreadful in the town. There was no work doing, and no zeal for work. The thermometer varied between 90° and 100°. The very mention of hills and springs seemed to inspire one with fresh courage to go on breathing. And it was clear to Harvey that Mr. Hancock, at the word country, had seen a vision—the expression in his eyes, as he looked at Harvey, was what completely decided the latter.

"You will be running up there one day and back the next. I know how you make a journey. What will you do with such a stiff old fellow as I am for company?"

"I'll show you," answered Harvey. "We go all but ten miles by rail; there we meet a coach-and-four; fine road, ascending all the way; view fine—tip-top! We leave at five in the morning—arrive at seven. Capital baths there; and Mr. Boston is a man who never runs down nor flags a bit, even at 200°. He has failed three times in business, and has now a handsome fortune, and don't owe a dollar. He began by wheeling dirt on a canal embankment. Will be president yet, for aught I know—is now, I believe, of the Imperial Spring Company. You will live five years longer for the sight of him."

"We are getting to be pretty slow here," said Hancock, not insensible to the inspiration of Harvey's speech. "I know the change would be a good one for Aggy."

"For all of us. And we haven't had the trouble of thinking about the business; it has managed itself for us."

"Well, so it has," said Hancock; "and we'll go. When Agnes comes back I'll tell her that we are going to the country again." As he spoke those last words he seemed as joyful over the prospect as a child.

Distinguished good fortune awaited Harvey at the end of his trip, as well as attended him through it. Not the least of satisfactions was it that he should be associated in the mind of Mr. Hancock with his return to the country.

The party arrived at Ingham, congratulating themselves on the sudden exodus they had made, having dwelt on every feature of the scenes through which they passed with admiring eyes. It was a flat country indeed. The green fields were bordered in some instances with maples and elms; here and there on a wide flat a clump of chestnuts might be seen; milk-weed and elder-berry bushes were in bloom; fields of red clover scented the air; cattle looked content; the birds were busy flying about, and singing, neither Hancock nor Agnes could doubt, though they did not hear them—the rushing train and shrieking engine was all they heard; and through the entire trip they did not often attempt to exchange even a word with one another.

These simple country pictures, exposed one after another to their eyes, filled them more than once—sometimes almost to overflowing—with grateful moisture. How pleasing to Him who made the earth so fair must be the happy appreciation it always has of the purest and best hearts! So, in view of the trip, observing how his friends were affected by it, Harvey could not but consider it a success.

And then he found his father's friend awaiting him at the station, with a long face which he was destined to shorten.

A chemist of considerable reputation had taken his departure the evening before, having analyzed the new spring to the chief proprietor's great dissatisfaction—there was no iron in it!

It was indeed hardly reasonable to expect that there would be. There was no iron in the other pools around which the miserable of every age were thronging; what sensible business man would indulge the hope that a fourth should contain all the healing properties of which minerals are known to be possessed?

The good fortune in store for Harvey was, that, applying his tests within ten minutes after their arrival, he declared for iron. Mr. Boston's face seemed to hint at a miracle-worker, as he stood looking at Tom and waiting his word.

He had met the lad, as he called him, at the stage office on his arrival, and disburdened himself at once by saying that he had come too late, for the convention was over; but when Harvey understood by this that Mr. De Wolf had merely gone away, he answered, "I've had one bout with Mr. De Wolf already. Where is the spring?" meeting squarely by his question the wish of Mr. Boston, who, when he saw how he came attended, had begun to calculate the number of minutes it would probably take to dispose of the old man and young lady, and set Harvey free to go about his business.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

You and I would have been more thoughtful of others. We would have been influenced by the necessity, which even Mr. Boston had calculated upon, of securing a room and refreshment for our fellow-travelers, whom we had enticed from their beds to endure the heat and dust of forty miles. But Harvey had at present but one idea; he knew it was but seven o'clock, he saw that his companions looked refreshed and happy; and so he asked, with an inconsiderateness some women would doubtless have remembered long against him, "Where is the spring?" For he knew, of course, that Mr. Boston being Mr. Boston would lead the way to it at once, and not content himself with merely making a geographical report.

In fact, Harvey need not disturb himself about his companions; they seemed to be as much interested in the spring as he was, and followed Mr. Boston with quite as much readiness as he did, through a grove of chestnut-trees between two hills, where, from a cleft in the solid rock, welled the new fountain of life.

"De Wolf is a fool," said Harvey. Those were his first words after sipping the waters of which Mr. Boston had given him an overflowing cup.

"I knew that," said the proprietor. "I as good as told him so. I think he understood what I meant."

"There's hardly any thing but iron in that spring," said Harvey.

"Look at those stones!" responded Boston. "I wish you could have heard his way of accounting for that rust. Such a damned rigmarole. I hope you may be cut off, Tom, before you know as much as he does, if you do have to go in your prime." Mr. Boston looked at Miss Agnes and nodded, and laughed at his remark till the chestnut-wood seemed making merry along with him. Then he gave her a cup of his elixir, and served the old gentleman, and smiled all around. He was a stout, active, cheery man, with the roundest face and the bluest eyes, and the reaction from his recent disappointing interview with the great chemist was evident in every inch of him.

Harvey's friends as well as himself were his guests, of course. It now occurred to him that they might not share his enthusiasm in regard to springs, or at least at the termination of their morning trip they might need other refreshment besides mineral water. "Come down to the house and I'll see Mrs. Jones," said he, and then he began to talk the spring over again, saying that after breakfast they would proceed to business in a regular scientific way; have the water amply tested, so that some statement might be prepared (at once!) for the public. He believed in advertising. Meanwhile as he talked he led the way to "the house," which, being reached, proved to be one of the great mammoth inns of Ingham.

"Tell Mrs. Jones I must see her a moment," he said to the first waiter they met, as they entered the hall.

They sat down and waited; after that they stood up, and walked about, and waited; to him it seemed that the delay was unconscionable, inexcusable.

"If she knew about that iron in the spring she'd come fast enough.

> 'For though on pleasure she is bent
> She has a frugal mind,'" said he. Still she did not come.

Another servant was presently hailed and dispatched on the same errand, with the same result.

"The house is running over, you know," said Mr. Boston. "Fifty people were sent away from here yesterday. They have crammed in till they couldn't do it any longer, fact! You might have sent for Mrs. Jones all day without seeing her, being strangers; but I thought I'd have better luck, perhaps she thinks I have a trap set for her. Come, follow me; we can't wait all day. I'll see what can be done."

As he spoke he started for the hall with the air of a man accustomed to walk over obstacles and have his way. Tom followed him. Agnes and Mr. Hancock, of course, did remain behind.

There was the great drawing-room with its gay carpet, its piano, its lounges and easy-chairs, its many windows, its chandeliers, and its innocent, peaceable preparations for terrible mass-meetings; there were the long passages and the little bedrooms filled to overflowing—they passed through and beyond, Agnes silently beside Mr. Hancock; Harvey chatting with his father's old friend, and not one of them knew whither—not even the leader. But Mr. Boston seemed to know; for after they had passed through a corridor which connected the upper story of a small detached building with the great house, he knocked at a door which stood half open and said, laughing:

"This is her own room. She will see that she can't get rid of us when she finds us here in force."

A step was heard crossing the apartment in response to his knock, and then they all saw something standing before the door. It was not difficult for Mr. Boston to discern that this something was a young gentleman, who looked as if he had been disturbed in some work by these invaders, and was not altogether well pleased thereat.

But the others—it was easy for them too, after a moment in which dust seemed to have been thrown into their eyes, to discover that this something was a somebody—in fact, it was Mr. Goldsmith.

The amazement on all their faces was responded to by the more than confusion, the terror of his.

Mr. Boston was going to say, "Is Mrs. Jones within?" and indeed did say it, but nobody seemed to hear him, for Harvey exclaimed:

"You here, Goldsmith!" with an astonishment in his voice that seemed to express much more weight than the wonder that was in Han-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

cock's recognition and that of Miss Agnes. He was, indeed, the last person they had expected to meet in that place; but it was nothing so very remarkable after all that he should be there.

Goldsmith met his friends with less cordiality than might have been expected.

Mr. Boston, who knew him, said:

"I can't find Mrs. Jones, and these friends don't know where to rest the soles of their feet; so I have brought them over here, hoping to find her."

"She has given up this room to me," said Goldsmith, "the house was so crowded."

"Well, it's her parlor yet," said Boston, not well pleased by the young gentleman's manner of conveying information—"let us in;" and without more ado he walked in, and Harvey followed him.

Goldsmith stood looking at them in mute dismay for an instant. He then turned about, saying that he'd look for Mrs. Jones, and went off; and he did not come back again.

When Boston thanked him, and began to look about h[illegible], he felt his arm grasped with a kind of force by Harvey, which made him conscious that something had happened or was going to happen.

"You go after him and find her, or we may wait here all day. He won't send her, you may depend."

Harvey said this on the authority of the single hurried glance he had cast about the room, which evidently Goldsmith had been using as a studio.

He had glanced around him as the other occupants of the apartment also were doing; but they did not see quite with his eyes, and he perceived that also. He was in a strait then, he wished that they did—if they had though, what would he have done with them?

His first impulse unquestionably was to hurry his party out of Mrs. Jones's parlor; but it was too late for that. Having come in, having crossed the threshold even, the consequences must follow. On one wall Agnes saw her miniatures, hung upon a back-ground of crimson cloth; on another, Mr. Hancock saw his portrait and that of Agnes. These last were evidently the work of Mr. Goldsmith—portraits, not of spirits but of mortal flesh, and well executed.

It was a surprise to the old man to see them there—that Goldsmith should have painted Agnes was not a wonder; but how could it be possible that any mortal should want his face portrayed and hung up within daily sight?

Agnes was more than astonished or amazed—she was terrified by what she saw. Her patrons were not many, it seemed, but one. Goldsmith, of course!

Goldsmith! she looked at Harvey. She remembered the occasions on which some of those orders had been brought her; the times when they had proved a release from anxiety, when fortune was proving fickle; the honesty, the frankness with which she had expressed her gladness to him that her work was considered desirable; the gratitude she had acknowledged to him for the generosity of his praise to others, of which, however, she felt herself to be wholly unworthy.

If he had taken all this trouble, incurred all this expense, merely that it might be easier for her father and herself to meet the cost of living, she was ready to sink under the weight of obligation thus ignorantly incurred.

With this sense came indignant self-accusation that she had accepted these orders—trusted his mere word, been content to know nothing further concerning her work than that it satisfied those for whom it was done.

Harvey must have guessed the course her thoughts would take, for he came to her where she stood fronting her work, and said:

"He was employed by one person all along. It seems to me that I can guess who that person was. We must know soon. I am glad the secret is coming out."

He spoke so loftily, with such strength, so courageously, that Agnes felt her own spirit buoyed up and sustained, even at the moment when all things seemed about to fall into confusion around her. The strength of their hearts was as the test so suddenly proposed to them—in a moment all their thought was for Hancock; and when the next instant they heard the strong, cheery voice of Mr. Boston talking with Mrs. Jones in the corridor about De Wolf and the spring, Harvey exclaimed, "The Lord help us!" in a way that was certainly answered.

Hancock was looking toward the door—so were they all—as she came. Mr. Boston had paused at the threshold for her to enter, and she entered; but, having done so, she stood and gazed on the group within, as if her eyes were never again to be withdrawn from them.

Probably by no gradual process could the mind of John Hancock have been enlightened, as now by a flash it was enlightened, without justifying in the last degree the anxieties of those to whom the work was committed. Harvey would not have dared the danger of this moment, into which he had so unwittingly introduced his friends, but there they were; there was no retreat; and, indeed, who would have thought or wished for retreat in that great moment when the rewards of a lifetime of manful hoping fell thus unexpectedly into the hands of John Hancock?

Mr. Boston stopped in the midst of his speech and looked from Mrs. Jones to Harvey. The single word—the exclaimed name which broke from the old man's lips—the suddenness with which the strong-headed business woman, whom he had considered as the best manager he ever met, was surrounded by tenderness, homage, tears, and made to blossom in her desert life as a rose, effectually silenced him.

Harvey, after the moment of astounded observation in which Mr. Boston stood looking from one member of the little group to another,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google managed to draw him one side, and they found themselves in the corridor.

"Your Mrs. Jones is the young lady's mother and the old gentleman's cousin, I believe," said Harvey; and he said other things besides, not so afraid to trust his own tongue as to let Boston find his. It wasn't possible, however, to prevent that finding long.

"You astonish me!" said Mr. Boston. "You don't tell me so! It's a miracle—nearly. Well, Sir," he continued, more composedly, "there was some occasion for all this mystery, I expect; but if your old gentleman is a saint I can tell you she's one. I never thought of it before, but she is. I expect it explains a good many things—a family turning up. I've thought her a pretty sharp reckoner sometimes, to tell the truth, being a widow, and no expenses of any 'count. She's as honest and clear in her accounts as the sun is in his. There isn't a lazy hair in her head. I've known her ever since I was a young fellow working on the canal. She kept house for a set of us in the Bush. I got her here when this house wanted a head. Lord bless you! she might have changed her name a dozen times, and was a fool, I told her often enough, for not doing it. But she's rich enough, now that there's iron in that spring. I made her invest in it; tried to get her to take more shares, but she declared she'd put in all she had. I didn't half believe her; but it made me trouble enough to think she had done so much when De Wolf said there wasn't iron. That young artist—that Goldsmith—where is he?"

Mr. Boston had now for the first time noticed his absence. "He ought to be here. She took care of him through the small-pox. I always wondered what she made so much of that long-haired chap for. He was a good enough fellow too. I like him. We're all humbugs, more or less."

A hand touched Harvey's shoulder while he stood and let Mr. Boston run on, occasionally enlightening him where he was least patiently in the dark. He turned and saw Agnes.

"Come and speak to my mother," said she.

Harvey followed her. There was great joy in the heaven of those true hearts that day. The old gentleman, Hancock, did not die of it; neither did he say, "Lord, now let thy servant depart, since my eyes have seen thy salvation." He lived; lived to rejoice over the best of all his improvements; lived to see young Harvey Mary's son; and he believed, in dying, that between him and Mary and Agnes the separation would be no more real than it had been while living.

His large charity regarded Goldsmith, who had gone out from their presence to return to it no more, with friendly kindness, and he believed him to be, to the last, neither in art nor in religion, an impostor, but simply an agent who had rendered service—as let us hope that we do also, all of us (alas for us if we do not!)—"better than he knew."

GILBERT CHARLES STUART.

AN English embassador by the name of Jackson, a short time before leaving home, called at the studio of Benjamin West.

"I am going abroad," said Mr. Jackson, "and wish to have my portrait painted—what artist would you recommend?"

"Where are you going?" inquired Mr. West.

"To the United States," was the reply.

"Then, Sir," responded West, emphatically, "you will there find the best portrait painter in the world, and his name is Gilbert Stuart."

A man of eccentric genius was this gifted artist—who was christened Gilbert Charles Stuart, but is commonly known as simply Gilbert Stuart—a man whose superior talents, generous disposition, extraordinary colloquial powers, and thorough acquaintance with his art, command our admiration, however we may regret the imprudences of his life.

A few years before the death of Stuart two artists from Philadelphia visited him at his residence in Boston. While sitting with him, engaged in conversation, one of the artists asked him for a pinch of snuff from his ample box, out of which he was profusely supplying himself.

"I will give it to you," replied Stuart, "but I advise you not to take it. Snuff-taking is a pernicious, vile, dirty habit."

"But your practice contradicts your precept, Mr. Stuart," returned the somewhat chagrined artist, rather stiffly.

"Sir, I can't help it," retorted Stuart. "Shall I tell you a story? I was once traveling in an English stage-coach; it was full inside and outside, and an extra passenger packed into a sort of basket behind, which contained the baggage. The night was dark, and coachee contrived to overturn us all. We scrambled up, and finding, on examination, that our own arms and legs were whole, some one thought of the poor creature in the basket with the baggage. He was found, apparently senseless, and his neck twisted awry. One of the passengers, having heard that any dislocation might be remedied if promptly attended to, seized on the supposed corpse with a determination to untwist the man's neck, and set his head straight on his shoulders. Accordingly, with an iron grasp, he clutched him by the head, and began pulling and twisting by main force. He appeared to succeed miraculously in restoring life, for the dead man no sooner experienced the first wrench than he roared vociferously, 'Let me alone! let me alone! I am not hurt! I was born so!' Gentlemen," added Stuart, taking at the same time an enormous pinch of snuff, "I was born so—I was born in a snuff-mill!"

And this was substantially if not literally true—his father being a manufacturer of snuff in Narraganset, Rhode Island, where Gilbert was born in 1754.

This habit of snuff-taking clung to him through life, and was indulged in to a very injurious extent. He was accustomed, at times, to carry

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google with him two enormous boxes of this fancied luxury. A friend meeting him one day, Stuart offered him a pinch from each.

"What is the difference?" inquired his friend, hesitating before the open boxes.

"Oh," replied Mr. Stuart, "one box is common, and one superior; the first is for common, everyday acquaintances, the second, for particular friends; therefore, take you a pinch of the best."

One day a gentleman, having engaged to dine with Stuart, went early to his house and found the artist had not returned from his morning walk. As he sat waiting for him in his studio, suddenly Stuart entered in a state of great agitation, and passing his guest hastily, without taking any notice of him, he went to a closet and took out a bundle. From the bundle he took some tobacco, a grater, and a sieve; and with trembling nerves succeeded in manufacturing some of the precious article, of which he hastily took a large dose. His nerves seemed to be quieted immediately, and turning to his guest, he greeted him cordially, exclaiming:

"What a wonderful effect a pinch of snuff has upon a man's spirits!"

Alas! he had become so enslaved by this habit that, having forgotten that morning to replenish his snuff-box, he was wholly unmanned by the loss of his accustomed stimulus.

The following anecdote, related of Stuart, finely illustrates his flow of spirits and his conversational powers. He was traveling in England in a stage-coach with some gentlemen, who were strangers to him, but all were sociable and lively. The party stopped to dine at an inn, and after dinner, the conversation being animated and various, Stuart became conspicuous in it, not only for his wit and humor, but for his correct judgment, rapid thought, and apt phrases. The curiosity of his companions was aroused, and with Yankee-like inquisitiveness, they desired to know who and what he was.

Mr. Stuart, with a grave face, and in a serious tone of voice, replied that he sometimes dressed gentlemen's and ladies' hair.

"Oh! you are a hairdresser, then," returned one of the company, with a somewhat derogatory stare.

"What! do I look like a barber?" demanded the incognito artist, sternly.

"I beg your pardon, Sir," replied the subdued cockney; "but I inferred it from what you said. If I mistook you, may I take the liberty to inquire what you are, then?"

"Why sometimes I brush a gentleman's coat or hat, and adjust his cravat."

"Oh, you are a valet, then, to some nobleman."

"A valet!" retorted Stuart, with mock indignation; "indeed, Sir, I am not. I am not a servant. To be sure, I make coats and waistcoats for gentlemen."

"Ah! you are a tailor!"

"Tailor! do you take me for a tailor? I'll assure you I never handled a goose other than a roasted one."

By this time the joke was beginning to be fully appreciated, and the whole company were in a roar of laughter.

"What in the world are you, then?" demanded another gentleman, taking up the office of interlocutor.

"I will tell you," said Stuart, with great apparent sincerity; "be assured all I have told you is strictly true. I dress hair, brush hats and coats, adjust cravats, and make coats, waistcoats, and breeches, and likewise boots and shoes, at your service!"

"Oho! a boot and shoe maker, after all!" contemptuously returned the questioner.

"Guess again, gentlemen," continued Stuart, good-humoredly. "I never handled boot or shoe but for my own feet and legs; yet all I have told you is true."

"We may as well give up guessing; it is of no use."

The fun-loving painter, checking his own laughter, which was on the point of bursting forth, and stimulating a fresh flow of spirits by a huge pinch of snuff, said, gravely, as if bringing the matter to a satisfactory conclusion:

"Now, gentlemen, I will not play the fool with you any longer, but will tell you, upon my honor as a gentleman, my bona fide profession. I get my bread by making faces."

He then screwed up his countenance and twisted his features in a manner the most skillful clown might have envied.

When the loud peals of laughter had subsided the company, with one accord, declared that they "had all the while suspected that the gentleman belonged to the theatre;" they all "knew he must be a comedian by profession." But when Stuart coolly informed them that he never was on the stage, and very rarely inside of a play-house, their chagrin and astonishment equaled their previous merriment.

"Gentlemen," said Stuart to his companions, as he was about to leave them, "you will find all I have said in regard to my various employments is comprised in these few words: I am a portrait painter. If you will call upon me at York Buildings, London, I shall be ready and willing to brush you a coat or hat, dress your hair à la mode, supply you, if in need, with a wig of any fashion or dimensions, accommodate you with boats or shoes, give you ruffles or cravats, and make faces for you."

While taking a parting glass at the inn the gentlemen begged leave to inquire of the artist in what part of England he was born. He told them he was not born in England, Scotland, Ireland, or Wales.

"Where then?" persisted the English Yankees.

"I was born in Narraganset," replied Stuart.

"And where is that?"

"Six miles from Pottawoone, and ten from Poppasquash, and about four miles west of Connonicut, and not far from the spot where the famous battle with the warlike Pequots was fought," was the instant reply.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"In what part of the East Indies is that, Sir?" inquired a pompous Englishman.

"East Indies, my dear Sir! It is in the State of Rhode Island, between Massachusetts and the Connecticut River."

And with this novel lesson in geography Gilbert Stuart took leave of his traveling companions.

When the youthful painter found himself friendless and penniless in the great metropolis of London his musical abilities, which were of a high order, afforded him temporary means of support. By chance he obtained the situation of organist in a church, and thus was enabled to pursue his studies as a painter.

Benjamin West, then in the midst of his successful career, received him as a pupil and took him into his own family. Stuart always regarded him as his benefactor, though he was not blind to his defects as a portrait painter.

"My old master," said he, "never could paint a portrait."

On one occasion an order having been received for His Majesty's likeness, West was busily employed upon another picture.

"Stuart," said he, "it is a pity to make His Majesty sit again; there is the portrait of him you painted; let me have it for Lord ——; I will retouch it, and it will do well enough."

"Well enough!" indignantly thought the young artist; "you might be civil when you ask a favor;" but he only said, "Very well, Sir," and the picture was carried to West's room, and he commenced working upon it. He painted all that day, and Stuart saw that he was puzzled. The next morning he said:

"Stuart, have you got your pallet set?"

"Yes, Sir," replied Stuart.

"Well, you can soon set another; let me have the one you prepared for yourself; I can't satisfy myself with that head."

In the afternoon the pupil, on going into his master's room, found him still hard at work,

"Stuart," said he, "I don't know how it is, but you have a way of managing your tints unlike any body else—here, take the pallet, and finish the head."

"I can't, Sir," replied the younger artist.

"You can't?"

"Indeed, Sir, I can not as it is; but let it stand till to-morrow morning, and get dry, and I will go over it with all my heart."

"The next morning," said Stuart himself, in relating this incident, "I went into his room bright and early, and by half past nine had finished the head. That done, Rafe, Mr. West's son, and I began to fence. I had just driven Rafe up to the wall, with his back to one of his father's best pictures, when the old gentleman, as neat as wax, with his hair powdered, his white silk stockings, and yellow morocco slippers, popped into the room, looking as if he had stepped out of a bandbox. We had made so much noise that we did not hear him open the door. 'There you dog,' I was saying to Rafe, 'there, I have you, and nothing but your background relieves you.' The old gentleman could not help smiling at my technical joke; but soon, looking very stern, he said:

"'Mr. Stuart, is this the way you use me?'

"'Why, what is the matter?' said I; 'I have neither hurt the boy nor the back-ground.'

"'Sir,' returned West, 'when you knew that I had promised that the picture of His Majesty should be finished to-day, thus to be neglecting me and your promise! How can you answer it to me or yourself?"

"'Do not condemn me without examining the easel,' I said. 'I have finished the portrait, Sir; please to look at it.'

"He did so; complimented it highly, and I had ample revenge for his 'It will do well enough.'"

On one occasion, when Stuart was painting at his easel, he amused a friend who stood by, watching his magic touch, by relating the following incident:

"I used very often to provoke my good old master, though, Heaven knows, without intending it. One day Trumbull and I went into his room, and little suspecting he was within hearing, I began to lecture upon his pictures, particularly upon the one then on his easel. I was a giddy, foolish fellow then. He had commenced the portrait of a child, and he had a way of making curly hair by a flourish of his brush, thus, like a figure three.

"'Here, Trumbull,' said I, 'do you want to learn how to paint hair? There it is, my boy! Our master figures out a head of hair like a sum in arithmetic. Let us see—we may tell how many guineas he is to have for this head by simple addition: three and three make six, and three are nine, and three are twelve—'

"How much the sum would have amounted to I can't tell, for just then, in stalked the master, with pallet-knife and pallet, and put to flight my calculations. He had all the while been in the color closet adjoining his room.

"'Very well, Mr. Stuart,' said West—he always mistered me when he was angry—'very well indeed.'

"You may believe that I looked foolish enough, and he gave me a pretty sharp lecture, without my making any reply. But when the head was finished there were no figure threes in the hair."

While Stuart was a pupil of West's, the famous Dr. Johnson called one morning to converse with Mr. West about American affairs. After a while Mr. West remarked that he had a young American studying with him from whom he might derive some information, and introduced Stuart. The conversation continued, the young artist being invited to take a part in it; when suddenly Dr. Johnson, observing to West that the young man spoke very good English, turned to Stuart, and rudely asked him where he learned it.

"Sir," replied Stuart, promptly, "I can better tell you where I did not learn it; it was not from your Dictionary."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Johnson seemed aware of his own incivility, and was not offended at the answer.

As a portrait painter perhaps none stand higher among American artists than Gilbert Stuart. In London he became popular and successful. But he was a stranger to prudence, and lived in splendor. It is well known that Stuart painted a portrait of General Washington, which is regarded as the standard likeness. It was his admiration of this great man, and his earnest desire to paint his portrait, that drew him to his native land in the midst of his successful career abroad.

The artist was not satisfied with his first attempt. He was accustomed by his conversational powers to draw out the minds of his sitters, that he might catch their best expression to impress upon the canvas. But Washington's mind was busy within, and it was not easy to draw it out. Yet the second effort was eminently successful. The original portrait, of which only the head is finished, is now in possession of the Boston Athenæum. A full length of Washington was soon afterward painted by Stuart for the Pennsylvania Academy, and later still the one which now adorns Faneuil Hall.

The circumstances which caused Stuart to be employed to paint this latter picture are amusing, though possibly exaggerated by the artist, who himself gave publicity to them.

"A little, pert young man" called on Stuart and addressed him thus:

"You are Mr. Stuart, Sir, the great painter?"

"My name is Stuart, Sir," was the quiet reply.

"And my name is Winstanley, Sir; you have heard of me?"

"Not that I recollect, Sir," was the cool rejoinder.

"No?" exclaimed the self-important visitor. "Well, Mr. Stuart, I have been copying your full-length Washington. I have made a number of copies. I have now six that I have brought on to Philadelphia. I have got a room in the State-house, and I have put them up. But before I show them to the public and offer them for sale I have a proposal to make to you."

"Go on, Sir," said Stuart, stiffly.

"It would enhance their value, you know, if I could say that you had given them the last touch. Now, Sir, all you have to do is to ride to town and give each of them a tap, you know, with your riding-switch—just so, you know."

Stuart, who had been profusely supplying himself with Scotch snuff, here shut the box and deliberately placed it on the table.

"And we will share the amount of the sale," continued Winstanley.

"Did you ever hear that I was a swindler?" sternly demanded Stuart.

"Oh! you mistake, Sir," returned the astounded visitor. "You know—"

The painter drew himself up to his full height, his athletic figure and sarcastic face adding force to his words:

"You will please to walk down stairs, Sir, very quickly, or I shall throw you out of the window."

The would-be speculator, seeing that the action was likely to be suited to the word, chose to make a hasty retreat by way of the stairs.

Sometime afterward Winstanley borrowed of a wealthy Boston merchant five hundred dollars, leaving as security one of his own full-length portraits of Washington, which he represented as having been painted by Stuart. The borrower never made his appearance again; and the merchant, who was really no judge of painting, offered the picture for sale; but finding no purchaser, presented it to the city, and it was hung in Faneuil Hall. Not long afterward a public meeting was held there, and a political opponent of the merchant, knowing the story of the painting, related it, to the great amusement of the audience. The news spread through the city, and the chagrined merchant scarcely escaped public ridicule. His friends suggested that the only thing to be done now was for him to get Mr. Stuart to paint a Washington for the city. A delegation waited upon the artist, inquiring if he would undertake the work.

"Certainly, gentlemen," replied Stuart.

"Will you do it immediately?"

"Yes, immediately."

"And what will be the price?"

"Six hundred dollars," was the reply.

In a few weeks the portrait was finished and placed in Faneuil Hall, where it still remains.

The last head Stuart ever painted was that of John Quincy Adams; but even in the midst of his work death laid his hand on him—then an old man of seventy-four—and it was never entirely completed.

Stuart remarked in regard to his own artistic studies, "I will not follow any master. I wish to find out what Nature is for myself, and see her with my own eyes." To a young artist who was studying one of his portraits he said: "Elevate your mind as much as you can; but while you have Nature before you as a model paint what you see, and look with your own eyes."

It was by following out such principles that Stuart painted portraits worthy of the praise once bestowed on his portrait of a Boston gentleman:

"It is a living man, looking directly at you."

VINE LANE.

I

PRESENCE of Diana! what a gush of delicious odors saluted the passers-by! Frank Oaks had inaugurated the summer-time in old Custom-house Place.

That was a most unique spot—that same Custom-house Place. Was, I say; for it has taken its place among the memories of long ago. It seems a little odd, though, to talk about the "long ago" of any thing man's hand built, in the heart of a young city like Chicago. But Mr. "Festus" Bailey says we should count time by heart-throbs; and while time is in fact counted in that city by a clock in the court-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

house steeple it does seem to my heart as if a half-century had gone by since that quaint and picturesque and bustling nest of little old buildings vanished from the scene. A huge brick building—a commonplace monster with a Mansard roof—stands on the spot where those two or three dozens of wooden houses in former times grew gay with the spring sun, and the daily crowd from the post-office and to the post-office streamed through the narrow passage hour on hour. There is also a dry, everyday Custom-house Place, so-called, somewhere in that vicinity, I am told, but it is not the old place where Frank Oaks had his flower-store years ago; it is not the Custom-house Place of story.

Frank stood in the open door of his little store, this bright morning in the latter part of April, and looked out. Across the way (it was perhaps half a dozen paces across that narrow way, spanned with arching sign-boards) the luxuriantly mustached and brilliantly breast-pinned door-keeper of the fat woman and the skeleton man was bawling his seductive speech amidst his flapping pictures. The blear-eyed oddity in the broad-brimmed hat was sleepily crying his "morning pa*purze*." Up and down, on either side the way, flowers, fruit, quaint images, and specimens of stock-in-trade were displayed out-o'-doors. Every shop-door was open to let in the balmy air. The two news-rooms had their wonted throngs. The rival jewelers tapped away at watches in their rival windows; the engraver plied his tools in his; the auctioneer was already shouting himself hoarse over his petty wares; the two beer saloons were alive with custom; from the two cigar stores came the voice of lounging; the hatter was busy with his blocks; an old gentleman lingered at the book-stall; the female dealer in hosiery and the female dealer in gentlemen's linen stood in their respective doors and chatted, woman fashion; the painter's wife was singing at her housework up stairs; the bookbinders whistling at their work; the shoemaker's hammer rattled upon his last; the proprietor of the shooting gallery was industriously practicing upon his own targets—

"Stop, stop! are you cataloguing the town?"

No, my dear Sir, or Madam, I am merely naming a small part of what Frank Oaks saw and heard within the hive-like limits of that narrow place, less than two hundred feet in extent (I have been on ships twice as long, to say nothing of the Great Eastern), through which flowed the steady tide of people in the early morning.

Who could pass Frank Oaks's bower of bloom and perfume unconscious? All day long the tide flowed past, and people stopped to smell, to admire, to ask questions, to buy. Ladies carried away pots in triumph, and our young friend's flowers found new homes in all the four quarters of the town, bringing blessing wherever they came, as flowers always do. Throughout the day Frank was as busy as a bee in his scented bower, and the roll of bills in his vest pocket biggened and bettered. The boy Bill, who was his only assistant in the little store, nearly walked his weary legs off in going of errands with pots. And the six o'clock hour brought a fresh throng in home-going artisans and work-women, who must take the post-office in their way, for some of them got a letter once a year or so.

Happy six o'clock hour, which releases so much weary humanity from its long day of labor! Happy hour for many a broad-breasted man who goes home to wife and children, and whom the tenpenny flower-pot makes thrice welcome there. Happier hour for many a worn, wan woman—many a pale-faced girl, come out from noisome work-rooms like prisons. Work-rooms under-ground, dark and dank, where thin fingers stitch upon rich cloaks for rich buyers; work-rooms in garrets, where scores of young girls sit in the enforced silence of a prison-like discipline, with curtained windows to prevent them from looking out, as if they were so many felons. There are such work-rooms in that city, for I have seen them.

And what pale face among them all but brightens at the sight of flowers?

"What is the price of this?" asked a weary girl, pointing to a large rose-geranium glorious with blooms—a queenly plant.

Frank Oaks looked at the questioner, and with the one quick glance saw that she was a poor working-girl, and that she had a face of wonderful loveliness. He answered by taking off a third of the price, and was glad he had done so when he saw the girl draw out a little porte-monnaie and extract the precise change, leaving emptiness behind.

She took up the pot and started to go.

"Let me carry it for you," said Frank, "as far as I go in your direction."

"Oh, I live quite near," said the girl, hesitatingly.

But Frank had the pot in his hand and was moving off. What possessed him to go off with that pot the boy Bill could by no means tell. He was not wont to be so polite to strangers.

The two walked down Madison Street, down Clark, across the bridge, and the girl, at every street-crossing, looked to see her companion turn off and give her the pot. He walked resolutely on, however, talking cheerfully, and wondering in his soul how far off the average sewing-girls considered "quite near." But at last she stopped before a rusty-looking house in the north division, and said,

"Here is my boarding-place."

So he surrendered the pot, got a sweet smile and a musical "Thank you" as his reward, and turned back toward his little store, whistling as he went. Apparently he did not whistle for want of thought; for, as he turned into Madison Street again, he said to himself, as if in winding up a long train of reflection,

"I'm my own master, and I'll marry whom I please."

Could it be possible that Frank Oaks had tumbled headlong in love with a pretty face?

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

But then, it was such a remarkably pretty face!—not the face of a girl with a vapid, inane soul—the face of one who could do and dare something, for all it was so gentle a face, and there was such a plaintive light in the brown eyes—a face with its sweetness hallowed by sorrow and suffering, and speaking of a soul whose beauty was the beauty of inborn holiness.

Perhaps Frank Oaks could not have expressed all this in words; but he felt it. He could not have expressed, perhaps, what it was in a rare and beautiful flower that touched his heart and won him; but he felt it just as positively as you or I. His was a broad, candid, generous nature, which could not love unworthily, if left to itself to love where it would; and when he felt the sunshine of that matchless face he was warmed by it to his heart's core.

The six o'clock hour of the following day found Frank Oaks watching with eager interest for the passing of the owner of the face. He did not watch in vain. She came; and what was better still, she looked at the young florist with the eyes of recognition. Frank moved forward as if to speak, and the girl stopped.

"How is the geranium?" he asked.

"It was pretty well, thank you, when I left it this morning," she answered, cheerily. "I gave it its breakfast before I went away—dew, sprinkled from my finger-tips—and I shall feed it again when I get home."

"I think it's a pretty good one," said Frank. "I'll replace it if it dies. Here is another just as handsome."

"Yes."

She bent over it lovingly, and then ran her eye over the other plants.

"What a beautiful lemon-tree!" said she.

"Splendid!" said Frank; and breaking off the finest blossom that grew upon it he offered it to her.

She took it with delighted thanks; and the young man's face glowed with a peculiar satisfaction as he saw her put it to her lips before she had turned the corner of the place. But she did not imagine he was gazing after her, of course.

At the six o'clock hour of the next day she came again and got another flower, and the scene was repeated day after day. In fact, six P.M. soon got to be the most important hour of the twenty-four with our florist. The single flower became a knot of flowers after a little while; and the knot of flowers gradually crept into a bouquet as the days went by; and by the middle of June the bouquet had increased to the most magnificent proportions.

Love grew as rapidly as did the bouquets between these young people. Frank had occasionally walked as far as the bridge with her at first. Then she asked him to come some time and see how beautifully the geranium throve. He went one evening, when he found she had a room-mate—a woman whose erysipelatous face was not fair to look upon, and did not please our fastidious hero somehow, though he said nothing. He went again and again, and the pimpled face looked ever more sour and forbidding, and he could not like it, and did not. And, by littles and littles, he found out all about the owner of that other face—the face he loved; how she was an orphan, the daughter of respectable New England parents, who had brought her here, and died and left her penniless; how she made paper-boxes in a shop in Lake Street; and how her name was Lovina Lane. This item, which I put last, was one of the earliest he learned.

"Father and mother used to call me Vine," said she.

"May I call you Vine?" he asked.

"I shall be glad if you will," was her unaffected answer.

At last the bouquets got so very big that they could get no bigger without getting ridiculous; and as this matter of constant growth in his gifts seemed to be necessary to Frank's happiness, he saw no better way to get out of his quandary than to some day offer her his hand as an adjunct of the inadequate bouquet.

He had no doubt at all that she would take his hand, you see. Firstly, he argued, Did she not love him? Yes, he was quite sure of that. Secondly, Was she not poor, and alone in the world? Yes, save that she seemed to have a too intimate companion in the pimpled Miss Scratchley, her room-mate, whose face, as has already been recorded, Frank did not like—and just because he did not like, he never felt at liberty to make a subject of conversation with Vine. Thirdly, Was he not well-to-do, and himself an orphan, with a pleasant home on the edge of the city, where his nurseries were? Yes, again—

But while the offer still lingered unmade, the passings-by of sweet Vine Lane ceased suddenly.

One dreary hour of six o'clock came and went—another dreary hour of six o'clock came and went—a third came and went; and, without waiting for a fourth, Frank armed himself with a perfect haystack of a bouquet, and started that very evening for the cheap boarding-house in the north division.

"Poor girl!" he muttered to himself as he walked along, "I noticed there was something wrong with her for several days gone. But she wouldn't tell me. And now she's sick, poor child! What if she should die?"

A tug came screaming down the river with a ship at that instant; the bridge whirled on its centre; and as he thought "What if she should die?" Frank's head seemed to whirl faster than ten thousand bridges, and, I believe, he would have tumbled headlong into the sudden yawning abyss had not a friendly hand caught him and steadied him.

"That big bouquet nearly threw you off your balance, didn't it, my young friend?" said the rescuer, jocularly.

"You're very good," said Frank, wiping his forehead; "I'm very much obliged to you, Sir."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Oh, not at all."

The bridge closed, and he rushed over with the crowd. Half walking, half running, he made his way to the boarding-house; knocked; asked for Miss Lane.

He had debated whether he should be refused admittance to her if she were so sick as to be confined to her bed; and he had resolved to dispute the point strenuously if it were made necessary, for he felt in his heart that Vine would never refuse to see him; and if he were refused by any one else it should go for nothing, or for some of Miss Scratchley's work.

But the reply to his question was this:

"Miss Lane is gone."

"Gone!" He steadied himself against the door-post. "Not dead?"

"Dead? No, Sir. She's gone away. Went last Thursday."

"Where to?"

"I don't know, Sir. Perhaps Mrs. Morey 'll know. Would you like to see her?"

"Yes."

He went in and sat down, and Mrs. Morey came.

"Oh, you're the young gent as sells flowers," said Mrs. Morey, a red-faced Englishwoman. "Mr. Hoaks?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Miss Lane left a letter for you. I was to have delivered it; but re'lly we've been so busy —I'll fetch it."

She brought it, and he took its meaning at a sweep of his eyes:

"DEAR FRIEND"—it said—"dearest friend: you have been so good to me! How can I forgive myself for going away without telling you? But another was interested in the secret—and though it has often been very near my lips, very heavy on my heart, when I have been with you, I did not tell you, because I had promised not to tell. Even now I can not tell you much, for the promise still in part binds me. But I can tell you this: I am gone away to enter upon a new career of existence—in one of those spheres of action where only there is promise for me—one of the few where women can rise to honor by virtue of industry and talent. Our friendship has been very sweet. I can never forget it, nor you; but as I bid you this long good-by I feel as if duty urged me away from you—and urged me besides to say, what it breaks my heart to say—forget me.

"Kind, true friend, I shall bear you always in my heart—I shall pray for you, and never forget you while life is mine. Farewell. VINE."

"Is Miss Scratchley here?" asked Frank.

"Miss Scratchley and Miss Lane went away together," said Mrs. Morey.

"Ah, they did!" said Frank, a flood of light breaking over his mind—not the light that cheers —only the light that shows.

Poor Frank! he picked up his big bouquet, and started for home.

When he got to the river he leaned over the hand-rail of the bridge and dropped the flowers down into the darkness, where the slimy river-water crawled and stank.

"To think that she should leave me so! Oh, my Vine, my Vine!"

One big sigh heaved like a billow off the broad breast, and he walked away with sturdy footfall homeward.

The summer passed, the little flower-store in Custom-house Place was closed, and the winter came in with prairie-sweeping storms. Frank Oaks lived alone at his home on the edge of the city, and his heart ached more than was good for it.

It is a man's duty to get over a thing like this. Admitted freely. It is also a man's positive duty to get over the consumption. But how if a man can't? Sometimes he can't. If you pish at that, and say he always can get over a love-born ailment, I say I give you credit for trying to tell the truth, and failing to tell it for want of proper data.

II.

The primary reason why Vine Lane had run away without telling Frank Oaks what she was going to do was, that she had determined to go upon the stage. Even the surprising craft of Miss Ann Scratchley would hardly have been able to extract such a promise from Vine, I feel satisfied, had the new sphere she was entering been one which is less severely estimated by the respectable world generally.

She had built an air-castle that was very grand, had this little Vine; and no tongue can tell the facile readiness with which Miss Scratchley helped on the erection of that structure.

Miss Scratchley had once been a supernumerary at M'Vicker's Theatre in Chicago, but had been dropped from the list because her face was so extraordinarily pimpled, and her figure so ungainly, that she was fit for nothing but the witch-scene in Macbeth; and Western theatres do not serve up Macbeth every night. But Miss Scratchley's stage-fever was a chronic affair, apparently, and would not be cured. Looking upon Vine's pretty face, and learning the yearning ambition which dwelt in the girl's heart to rise in some sphere of high endeavor, Miss Scratchley perceived her clay ready to her hands, plastic, needing but skillful manipulation to be converted into untold gold. So she began dextrously to fan the flame in Vine's breast, and to lead her by slow but sure degrees to that point where she could be trusted to accept Miss Scratchley's proposal. Miss Scratchley's proposal was this:

"A theatrical partnership between us two. You to contribute your beauty, your talents, and your education; them is your capital. I to contribute my theatrical experience, my acquaintance with the secrets of the profession, and my little all. We will take theatrical names—half the actors has fancy names—and will procure an engagement together."

"Not here!" cried Vine.

"No—not here; and every thing must be kep' a secret. You mustn't tell a soul. I won't either. And whatever salaries we get we will divide the money equal between us. I do not say I any ways expect to get as much salary as you will. You will rise rapidly, for you have

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

got talent and an air, and your pay will soon be bigger than mine. But it is no more than fair we should share equal, for I am embarking my little all in the speculation—all I have saved up in ten scrimping years—and if we lose I am ruined. But we won't lose, and we shall both be made. And this partnership betwixt us to continue, fast bind fast find, for five years."

I do not say that Miss Scratchley uttered all this at a single speech. It was brought forward little by little; and little by little the clay was moulded into the required shape—until at last the two left the city in the way they did.

One loving look at our little Vine before she goes. It is a rough way she is venturing upon; not of the cleanest. But it will not be an easy thing to tarnish the fine gold of that nature—not an easy thing to profane the pure shrine on which Frank Oaks has laid his love. It is well that the girl already loves; for sore temptations enter by that road when the heart is fallow ground. This and her innate purity are Vine's armor. She may not be the wisest in her judgment—not the best calculated in any such way to deal with a cruel and a wicked world; but her repulsion of vice is as instinctive as her repulsion of vulgarity.

For the rest Miss Scratchley is at her elbow.

They went to Cincinnati. There Miss Scratchley sought an engagement for this histrionic firm. The manager of Pike's Opera House was pleased with Vine's face, and magnanimously put her on his list of supernumeraries at a salary barely sufficient to pay her board.

"Always have to commence at the bottom round of the ladder in our profession, Miss," said he.

Miss Scratchley he would none of. The disappointed Ann was forced to accept this dispensation in lieu of a better, and meantime kept her faculties on the alert for that better.

Poor Vine! What a position was this for a girl who had been reared as she had been—whose heart was so pure, whose modesty so genuine! How she blushed—clear to her fingertips—when she found herself on that first night—her grand début into that new "sphere of action!"—standing with naked shoulders, and a dress that fell only to her knees, in the broad glare of those thousand lights! If the stage had opened and swallowed her then and there she would have been glad. Should she rush off?—should she fly from the spot forever? Alas! she dared not do that! A surly man stood in the wing watching her, among the rest of his supernumeraries—the captain of those cohorts. So she remained—hid herself and her exposed feet as well as she could behind her neighbors—and suffered nameless tortures in her soul.

Poor, proud Vine! She would not let Miss Scratchley see her tears as they walked together to their boarding-house through the lonely streets at midnight, and the young girl shrank in terror at every strange noise that broke the silence.

Miss Scratchley understood pretty well what Vine's manner meant. She thought it best to ask no questions.

This went on a week or two. The unemployed member of the firm counted her dwindling funds with trepidation.

"Good news, Maude!" cried Miss Scratchley, one night as they left the stage-door of the theatre to walk home.

Miss Scratchley called her Maude because that was the name under which poor Vine was hiding: Maude Montmorency. Miss Scratchley thought it beautiful, and Vine deferred to her superior judgment. Miss Scratchley had provided herself also with a name; one was as cheap as another, she reasoned, and she chose that of Imogene De Courcy—partly because it sounded a little like Scratchley, she said.

"I have found a better engagement for you," she went on, "and for me too. Salary for us both together equal to four times what we're getting now."

"At what theatre?"

"At the Jupiter Hall."

"Oh, no, no!" cried poor Vine, in terror at the fate before her. "Not there, Ann! I can not go there!"

However, Miss Scratchley succeeded in talking her into it. Vine would be a lady there—not a poor, trodden-on "supe."

"You will have your own way there, and be the admiration of all eyes. Nobody sees you at all at that big theatre."

"Enough see me," murmured Vine, who had not yet accustomed herself to the scant apparel.

"You will be the leading lady in all the pieces," Miss Scratchley continued. "They are not very heavy, and you can do it. And I shall be on with you in every piece. After all what does it matter where you play? Talent will make a hovel a throne!"

And with this concluding sentence Miss Scratchley felt that she had said a thing that would have awakened tremendous applause among the critical gods of the Jupiter Hall.

Vine did not yield until she had suffered a deal of talking to; but as she did yield at last the amount of it was the same.

"It may prove a stepping-stone," said the unhappy girl.

To tell the truth, Vine was unhappy continually. She could not help feeling a certain sense of degradation; she had not been bred in this atmosphere, and the tutelage of the theatre was rough. How much she thought of Frank Oaks, abandoned so unkindly, who can tell—how much her heart ached on that account? As much as his, perhaps.

Yet in that air-castle that she had built with Miss Scratchley's assistance Frank's place had been by no means left out of the plans. "He will be proud of me some day," Vine thought; and if he married her (and if he did not marry her the castle tumbled in ruin headlong!) he would not be marrying a penniless orphan who could bring him no dowry.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

As if the heart that beats purity with every pulsation—the sweet spirit "that bends but does not break"—and the beautiful face, on which health set its rose and alabaster seal, were not dowry enough for a florist's wife! Or for any man's wife.

So Vine went to the Jupiter Hall—I beg pardon—Miss Maude Montmorency went there.

After a week or two the manager of that intellectual resort found he was giving his patrons too large a dose of the drama. They wanted more warbling and more pirouetting. He communicated his troubles to Miss Scratchley—pardon once more—Miss De Courcy—and told her Miss Montmorency must either sing or dance.

"If she can dance now," said the manager, "I'll raise her pay."

Miss Scratchley's heart almost stopped its beating. Vine dance! Vine!

"Oh no!" said Miss Scratchley, gasping; "she wouldn't dance."

"Then she must sing," said the man.

"Perhaps she will sing," Miss Scratchley answered.

Another struggle—Vine's march to fame and fortune seemed to be little else than a series of shovings forward at the hands of the determined Miss Ann Scratchley—and Vine made her début as a cantatrice. She had had no special musical culture—sang as well as your daughter or mine, perhaps.

But as a cantatrice Vine was a great success. Her voice soared in a cloud of tobacco smoke, it is true, but tumultuous expressions of joy arose from the unwashed who were under that cloud. Miss De Courcy was in ecstasies, and Miss Montmorency became a star.

Engagements were soon made with the managers of similar entertainments elsewhere, and the artistes traveled. Eastward, from city to city, they wended their way, and in the following winter they reached New York, where Miss Montmorency sang an engagement at a formerly well-known resort in Broadway. Her success was less marked there, for some unknown reason—perhaps her face was too pure and too grave for New York's unwashed (Vine never let a smile wreathe her lips when she sang)—and the westward march was taken up. Miss Scratchley, of course, arranged the engagements. At Detroit she announced to Vine that their next place was Chicago.

Vine resisted feebly, but there was no help for it. Truth to tell, the savings of this artistic copartnership were yet in the future. Between cheating managers and heavy expenses in thus gadding about there was barely enough in the exchequer at this time to defray expenses to Chicago.

During all these months poor Vine had been steadily losing health—steadily fading. The roses still bloomed in her cheeks under the hateful gaslights of the nightly-dreaded concert-room, for Miss Scratchley insisted upon paint; but the once round shoulders were sadly thinned, the face was grown peakish, the eyes had lost their old lustre. The manager of the Chicago establishment was dissatisfied with the personal appearance of his new star, but he trusted to the voice. Alas! at this juncture the voice failed. The cantatrice had wholly lost her power over the souls of the unwashed. The engagement was canceled, and the two professionals were back at their starting-point, no richer than when they left it.

No richer? Ah, if that were the worst! Miss Scratchley's "little all" was swallowed up, and Vine was a helpless invalid.

III.

With the spring sunshine again Frank Oaks threw wide the door of his little flower-store in old Custom-house Place. Again the gush of perfume greeted the tide of passers. Again the boy Bill watered the pots and ran weary lengths of errand. But Frank, who last year whistled like a bird all day among his flowers, whistled no more. His heart had not done aching yet.

Daily as the hour of six o'clock came the young man went inside his store and hid himself behind his lemon-tree, looking out upon the passing throng in silence; while the voice of the court-house bell, booming the hour from its steeple-hung height, fell like a knell upon his ear.

How he watched through his lemon-tree the faces of the workwomen as they passed! But no sweet Vine strayed that way.

One night, at that hour—or rather later, for the bell had long ceased striking, and Frank had come out from behind the lemon-tree—a woman, in a rusty shawl, and with a lunch-basket on her arm, stopped at his stand and priced a rose-geranium. Frank thought he knew the face, but he did not immediately complete the recognition; for it was Miss Scratchley's face, and it was not so pimply as of yore. Besides, he had never seen her with her head covered by a bonnet.

She took out a porte-monnaie to pay for the geranium, and handed Frank a dollar bill. A quick flush ran over our hero's face. It was the porte-monnaie he recognized—Vine's old porte-monnaie—and recognition of Miss Scratchley followed.

"Come inside, ma'am," said Frank, "and I'll make the change. Right in here, ma'am;" and he motioned her into his little back room.

She went in. He shut the door and locked it, and put the key in his pocket.

Miss Scratchley sniffed her nose and rubbed it, but was otherwise outwardly calm.

"Where is Miss Lane?" demanded Frank, with the air of a man who stood ready to do a dreadful deed if he were trifled with.

"She is at Mrs. Morey's," said Miss Scratchley.

"What!" cried Frank. He had not expected that. "Then she has come back?"

"Yes, Sir; been back nigh two months."

"She has never passed by here," said he, incredulous.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"No, Sir; she's too sick to be out."

"Sick! Vine sick! Why haven't you been here to tell me before?"

"I was expressly forbid, Sir. I didn't come here to tell you now, but you has locked me up in this little back-room, and what can I do? You wrung it from me, Sir."

Frank looked Miss Scratchley steadily in the face a moment, as if he suspected her of lying. Then he opened the door and let her out.

"Is that for her?" he asked, pointing to the geranium.

"Yes, Sir."

He gave her back the dollar bill unbroken.

"Take it to her, and tell her I shall be over to see her to-night—inside of half an hour—as quick as I can leave the store."

Miss Scratchley took the pot, thanked him, said she would obey, and then departed. Frank immediately followed her. He by no means trusted her yet. He kept her carefully within sight, following her down Clark Street, over the bridge, and never missing her till he saw her enter Mrs. Morey's boarding-house. Then he pulled out his watch, and gave her ten minutes in which to deliver his message and prepare the sick girl before he entered the house too.

Disdaining the offices of Mrs. Morey's maid-servant, he went in without knocking, strode up stairs to her well-remembered room—which in the summer that was gone he had kept blooming like a bower with his bouquets—and rapped upon the door. It was opened by a German with a monstrous pipe in his mouth.

Frank stood aghast.

"Isn't this Miss Lane's room?" said he.

"Nein, 'sist mein room," said the hearty Teuton, with an air that seemed to say, You're just as welcome, though. "Miss Lane," he said aloud, "dat be's de sick voman, eh?"

"Yes."

"Das ist oop stair, somevere. I dunno vich room. I know'd dere vas a sick voman oop dere some-vere, 'cause de oder voman—vas ist?—de Miss Scratch—she ass me not play on mein tr-r-rombone so moch."

Frank was half-way up the stairs before this speech was ended; and behold Miss Scratchley stood at the head of the flight. She motioned him to an open door, shut it after him as he entered, and took herself off down the stairs.

Poor Vine sat propped up by pillows in her bed—paler than ever, thinner than ever—her brown eyes filled with the excitement of his sudden coming. She had been asking herself before he came in, "What shall I say to him? what shall I say?" and when her eyes fell upon his face she said "Frank!"

The next moment her arms were about his neck, and she was murmuring, "Dear, dear Frank! I am so glad to see you!"

"Two months!" he uttered, looking in her eyes, "and no word to me!"

"I could not let you know, Frank. I felt too guilty. I did not deserve to see you again. How can you forgive me, after what I did?"

"I would forgive you if you had torn my heart out," said he.

She put her face against the heart, and kissed the cloth that covered it.

A half-hour later Miss Scratchley rapped at the door, and came in, being bidden. She glanced once at Vine's glad face, and then went and sat down by herself, with the air of a culprit.

"Miss Scratchley," said Frank, "Vine has been telling me all about it. She wants me to forgive you, and I do it; for though you led her wrong, you've proved yourself a true friend when she needed one."

"I should have died but for her," whispered Vine.

"But she is going to change her habits now, Miss Scratchley. She is going to live in the country, in the capacity of a—of a wife. Country air will right her."

"Oh dear, I am so glad!" uttered Miss Scratchley, and pulled out her handkerchief and began to cry.

"It will be rather lonesome here for you, won't it?" said Frank, who thought Vine somehow necessary to the happiness of any one who knew her.

"Dreadful!" said Miss Scratchley, simply, and very much in earnest.

"But you'll get used to it, I dare say," said the wretch.

"Never. But I'll try to," was the unhappy woman's response; and then she added, "Never!" again.

"Yes, I tried to get used to it," said Frank, "when you took her away from me. I should have got used to it in forty or fifty years, I dare say."

("Don't, dear Frank!" murmured Vine, her hand in his.)

"Well, there, cheer up, Miss Scratchley," said he. "I couldn't have the heart to take her away from you. It makes me feel bad to see you cry. Please stop it. We'll fix a place for you at our house if you'll take it."

"Oh!—oh!—dear! Will you?" cried the little woman, every pimple on her face shining with joy.

"Will you take it?"

"I will, Sir," said Miss Scratchley; "heart and soul I will. I'll work my legs off to be by her."

The pure air at the nurseries, and the love that, like mercy, blesses those who give and those who receive, did their own work for Vine. There is no happier wife—there are no rosier cheeks—in all the Western country, than those which Frank Oaks loves so well. A curly-headed youngster with big brown eyes toddles about the premises, and picks the flowers, and gets his pudgy little feet into the beds, and does all manner of mischief; but Miss Scratchley, who adores the urchin, never tires of standing between the little Frank and his proud father's wrath; and the mischief somehow ends with

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google kisses and quiet laughter, as pretty much every thing does in that house.

Some very estimable people insist that all stories should have a specified moral. I should think the moral was plain enough in this case.

Moral: Don't mix flowers and love; it is apt to superinduce heart-ache.

GOOD LOOKS.

PEOPLE'S notions of beauty differ. Tamerlane's wife, who had no nose, was thought a belle by her contemporaries. A patrician of Venice had a scurvy little proboscis, and that was held of itself a sufficient disqualification for the doge's cap and ring. Cicero admired the squinting eye, such as Greek sculptors often gave to Venus; and Minerva was sometimes figured with a complexion as dusky as any gipsy wife. Some of the Greeks held blue eyes to be hideous, and Dioscorides tells us they had an art—the same practiced, perhaps, centuries afterward at Donnybrook fair—of making them black. Hunchbacks have had their admirers, who contend that the dorsal curvature is the true line of beauty, and that the hump, so far from being a deformity, "as dull fools suppose," is in itself a graceful ornament, seeing that, in its outline, it approximates the figure so many illustrious objects in nature assume—to wit, the sun, the terrestrial globe, the span above us of aerial blue, the head of man, seat of his intellect and organ of his will.

Still, however much men may differ in their conceptions of the beautiful, certain it is that whatever they esteem beautiful invariably engages their affections and provokes their desires. They invariably recognize its claims to consideration, and, by the very constitution of their minds, are prone to associate its presence with every thing that is good, pure, and virtuous. Suetonius tells us that, at all periods of his life and health, Augustus was beautiful, and owed to his good looks his uniform good fortune. We know that he took unusual care to preserve his personal appearance; for, to guard himself against the deteriorating influences of atmospheric changes, he would clothe himself with such a vast variety of garments as that it was popularly said he carried the wardrobe of a family upon his single back. Alexander Severus was so anxious to delay the approach of decrepitude, with its attendant crow's-feet and wrinkles, and retain as long as might be the bloom and beauty of youthfulness and vigor, that, although free from all gluttonous propensities whatever, he would devour a whole hare daily; for the consumption of hare's flesh was, in his days, accounted a sovereign antidote for the withering effects of time, and an efficient prophylactic against the damaging consequences of old age. The warlike emperor was well aware how much his outward man contributed to his influence, and acted a wise part accordingly in seeking to preserve in its freshness what Shakspeare irreverently enough calls the "muddy vesture of decay." These are antique examples; some may be cited belonging to more recent times, in which the possession of beauty is esteemed a kind of merit.

Without referring to the well-known anecdote of Baptista Porta having dedicated one of his first works to the Cardinal d'Este merely, as he says, because the Cardinal was a good-looking fellow, we find a Parliament of Edward IV. thinking it neither unbecoming their dignity nor that of the king, in an address of both Houses to the throne, to advert to the "beauté of person that it have pleased Almighty God to bless you (with);" and we also find the grave Lord Burghley, himself comely even in old age if he be limned aright in the canvas which has descended to us, in writing to his son Robert Cecil, then Secretary of State, respecting some new judges about to be made, observing, "As for choice of Baron (of the Exchequer), I think Serjeant Heale able both for learning, wealth, and strength of body to continue, being also a personable man, which I wish to be regarded in choice of such officers of publick service." And the queen, his mistress, was of exactly the same mind, as Sir Robert Naunton, a contemporary writer, remarks. "The queen," he says, "in this had much of her father; for, excepting some few of her kindred, and some few that had handsome wits in crooked bodies, she always took personage in the way of her election, for the people hath it to this day in proverb, 'King Harry loved a man.'"

Like her father, Elizabeth was careful to admit into her household none but those, says Osborne, of "stature and birth," and positively refused the services of a gentleman in these respects well qualified to attend her only because one of his jaws was deficient of a tooth! Her successor, James I., as Lord Thomas Howard once wrote from the court of Sir John Harington, "dwelt on good looks and handsome accoutrements. Eighteen servants," he adds, "were lately discharged, and many more will be discarded who are not to his liking in these matters." The celebrated Lord Derby too (the one who was beheaded at Bolton), in his "Advice to his Son," is careful to remark: "It is very handsome to have comely men to serve you." Of slender build himself, James disliked corpulency in others. He would say of a stout and burly divine that "fat men were apt to make lean sermons," while he would certainly have promoted Dr. Bennet to the episcopal bench, had he not already attained that honor, on account merely of his agreeable exterior, remarking of the Doctor that if he, the king, "were to choose a bishop by his aspect, he would certainly choose him of all men he had seen for a grave, reverent, and pleasing countenance." There is a story told of the Emperor Henry IV. of Germany going once into a church where a remarkably ugly-looking priest officiated; so ugly was he that the emperor wondered within himself whether God could possibly accept services rendered by so ill-favored a ministrant. The im-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

perial meditations were, however, interrupted by the priest's boy mumbling, almost unintelligibly, the versicle in the 100th Psalm, "Ipse nos fecerit, et non ipsi nos (It is He that hath made us, not we ourselves)," whereupon the priest reproved the acolyte for his indistinct and defective enunciation, and repeated himself in a clear and sonorous voice the Psalmist's words, which the emperor took as a real if undesigned rebuke to his own uncharitable thoughts; so when the service was ended he made himself known to the priest, on whom some time afterward he conferred the honors of the mitre and crosier. Still, however unprepossessing the aspect of this priest may have been, the Church of Rome, as is well known—following therein the spirit of the Mosaic law (Leviticus, xxi. 17)—invariably refuses her orders to such as are physically deformed or exhibit any outward hideousness.

Indeed, throughout the Middle Ages it was a prevalent belief that the ugliness of the wicked—and the wicked were ever ugly—was in precise proportion to their wickedness, and so the Spirit of Evil himself was ever pictured as abominably hideous and revoltingly frightful; very unlike the "not less than archangel ruined," as his outward presentment is portrayed by Milton. "As ugly as sin," "diabolically hideous," are phrases to be found in other languages besides our own. In the same way virtue and goodness, the attributes of the saint, the characteristics of the angel, are habitually linked, both in idea and expression, with either majestic charms or enchanting loveliness. "As beautiful as an angel," "seraphic beauty," are modes of expression familiar to our lips; and furthermore, it is usual enough, when the desire is to convey approbation of a certain line of conduct, to say such conduct was "decidedly handsome." Hereby we discover the connection which unconsciously, perhaps, subsists in our minds between things which are true, honest, and just, and things which are lovely.

The Thracians, we read, were accustomed to shed tears on the birth of a child; and if we are to credit M. Bouchet, a learned etymologist, the child itself exhibits no less regret on its appearance in a world of which yet it knows nothing. Indeed, according to M. Bonnet, its first articulate expression is a reproach on our first parents, but for whom its birth would have been impossible; the boys, as he says, crying A, A, indicative of their indignation against Adam, and the girls whining E, E, their feeble invective against Eve. The tears of the Thracians are, in our opinion, susceptible of easy explanation, bearing in mind the innate repugnance of mankind to ugliness. The Thracian wept with apprehension that the red-faced, flabby, dabby baby might possibly in its growth exhibit itself as unattractive and uninviting as it was at its beginning; and the squalls of the newly-arrived innocents may be referred to their consciousness that they are making their début into life with an exterior decidedly unbecoming, if not actually repulsive. Madame de Bourignon is said to have been so hideous when born that the notion was seriously entertained of smothering her, and thus spare her a life of contempt, of scornful pity, and crushing humiliation.

Of course, people who set up for philosophers, especially those to whom Nature has acted the part rather of the step-mother than the nursing mother, affect to underrate the importance of a shapely figure and agreeable visage, and have many a well-worn proverb, such as "Beauty is but skin deep," "Handsome is that handsome does," and the like, to vindicate their opinions, or console them in their misfortune. Mr. Hay, however, a wealthy Sussex gentleman of the last century, who wooed the Muses without much success, and had a seat in Parliament to boot, was as misshapen a dwarf as any that of old made sport in royal or baronial halls. In his Essay on Deformity he frankly admits, while he ingeniously palliates, the disadvantages which belong to an uncomely exterior. "Bodily deformity," he says, "is very rare; and therefore a person so distinguished has ill-luck in a lottery where there are a thousand prizes to one blank. Among the 558 gentlemen in the House of Commons I am the only one that is so. Thanks to my worthy constituents, who never objected to my person, and I hope never to give them cause to object to my behavior. They are not like a venal borough, of which there goes a story that, although they never took exceptions to any man's character, they once rejected the best bidder because he was a negro." The sarcasm here is unmerited, inasmuch as the negro owed his rejection to the opinion, well-founded or not, that nigritude was only a synonym for intense ugliness; and the venal borough, although in its immorality it bent a good deal too much to the virtus-post-nummos doctrine, and was less solicitous about a candidate's principles than the state of his purse, still was not so deeply plunged in iniquity as to believe quærenda pecunia primum, for they scorned the bribe when it was tendered them by uncouth hands. True that Fuller had before this affirmed that the black man was God's image, only cut in ebony instead of ivory; but the constituency Mr. Hay would stigmatize with illiberality thought the negro an ugly-looking fellow, and so, in spite of his "yellow persuaders," declined to have aught to do with him.

When Job Ben Solomon, an African chief, was in England, he visited Dr. Watts, who, with more curiosity than politeness, inquired how it chanced he and his countrymen were black, when, in common with Europeans, they were descended from Adam, a white man? The retort was immediate and incisive: "Adam white! How know you Adam white? we tink Adam black; how came you white?" Now, there are writers on æsthetics who, in defiance of popular prejudice, maintain that black is the normal hue of men's complexion, and that the "pale faces" of Europe must have passed through some process of degeneration before they acquired the pallor they now exhibit. Ethnologists teach

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 that in the course of time, and when exposed to certain climatic influences, the dusky races of mankind generally become fairer, while of the reverse no instance is known. There is a strong presumption, then, that our first parents had more of the sable than the brunette in their complexions, and, for aught we know, might have rivaled Sambo himself in the depth of his ebon hue. To no imputation of a lack of beauty can the negro, on account of his color, be fairly held obnoxious, while it becomes doubtful whether we of the white families of humanity have not ourselves degenerated from the original condition of the species as it existed "when Adam delved and Eve span." It is doubtful, then, whether, with all his good intentions, Dr. Beddoe was not attempting to do his blackamoor servant an actual disservice in endeavoring to bleach his dingy "pickers and stealers" by steeping them in a strong solution of muriatic acid oxygenized.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The glory of man, says an authority not to be disputed, is in his strength, and we may safely affirm that the glory of woman is in her beauty; and just as a man, when natural strength is denied to him in the fullness he desires, resorts to artificial means for supplying the defect, so does woman endeavor to redress the injustice and counteract the parsimony of Nature by a recourse to the ingenuities of art—the innocent deceptions of the toilet-table and the wardrobe. Of course there are some who, on one ground or another, will object to this practical mendacity, not the less real because it finds no expression in words; but such cynicism may be dismissed with contempt. It arises, in nine times out of ten, from that base and wretched jealousy of woman's influence which too often haunts the masculine heart, and whose bitterness can only be exceeded by its impotence. Could there be any thing more contemptible than the bill of indictment which Euripides preferred against Jove for having sent woman into the world only to reduce man to bondage with her charms; as though the poor hen-pecked deity was not himself as much a slave to beauty as any terrestrial mortal, and did not pass his miserable days under the thumb of all the pretty goddesses in Olympus? Milton did not hold it unbecoming the dignity of manhood to pen the puling lines, and Aristophanes—that scoffer at excellence, that contemner of virtue—while in his Lysistratus he affirms that there is no living with woman—palpably because of her caprice, adds, with unwonted candor, that there is no living without her—plainly because of her charms. A like sentiment, if we may credit Aulus Gellius, was given expression to in a speech of the censor, Metellus Numidicus, one of the duties of whose office required him to persuade the citizens to marry for the benefit of the commonwealth. Yet do we find him indorsing the vulgar scandals to which woman had been long exposed at the hands of those who had been struggling against a yoke from which they could not release themselves. "If, Romans," quoth the mordant orator, "we could do without a wife, we should all be free from that source of vexation; but as Nature has so ordered it that we can not live without them happily, or without them at all, we had"—for that is his real meaning—"best take our physic like sensible men."

> But yet I see the tenor of man's woe
> Holds on the same from woman to begin;

Men of these convictions are, of course, averse to every thing that tends to enhance the power under whose oppression they groan; and perhaps Mrs. Dorothy Tearsheet never displayed more palpably the depth of her affection for her corpulent lover, when on parting she exclaimed, "Prove that I ever dress myself handsome till thy return!" The looking-glass, one of the choicest pieces of artillery in woman's arsenal, was loudly denounced by Clemens Alexandrinus. The old father—if we may with propriety ascribe that title to a celibate—asserts that every woman who looks in the glass violates a divine commandment, for she makes an image of herself for idolatrous purposes. But the Egyptian mistakes the matter widely if he supposes it is the woman that is the idolator. Take it at the very worst, woman commits no idolatry herself: she does not worship her own reflected loveliness—she only gives opportunity for others to do so; she is but the occasion of idolatry to others, but does not herself share in the sin. One of Lalage's tresses wandered astray, and Lalage, luckless damsel, knew naught of her misfortune until she had consulted her glass, and ascertained a recalcitrant pin falling from its rightful place had disturbed the position of the ringlet. So although, by-the-way, Martial might just as well have kept the matter to himself, Lalage, in a moment of not unnatural vexation, cast her polished mirror on the floor, which shivered into a thousand fragments. The act was foolish enough, but Lalage well knew what important weapons a woman's hair supplies her in her career of conquest; how much it contributes to those good looks which compensate her in the lack of physical vigor on which man founds his title to dominion. Indeed, there was a time when feminine tresses were supposed to possess certain strange magical qualities: pluck (if you dare) some hairs from the head of a pretty woman when her coiffure is in process of arrangement, and consign them at once to the fire, and from out the flame will crawl noxious, noisome adders, ready no doubt to avenge on you "the rape of the lock."

There was no portion of their toilet on which Roman ladies bestowed more pains than the disposition of their hair. Gray hair was with them, as with others, an abomination, and a sort of soap, called pilæ mattiacæ, was imported from Germany by way of remedy for this disfigurement whenever it occurred. False hair of a light hue was also imported from the same country for such as nature had dealt stingily by in the matter of "capillary attraction;" but, as is the case with the belles of modern Italy, la

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

chevelure rouge, or what, in allusion to the old tradition respecting Judas's hair, Rosalind calls "the dissembling color," was the hue the most in vogue.* Perhaps, however, there is some exaggeration in this, and that a deep shade of auburn was that to which preference was given; for while Martial compares beautiful hair to the color of the golden field-mouse, he classes fiery-hued locks with cloven feet and blear eyes, inquiring, in the true spirit of one who detects the harmony of good looks and good deeds, whether such as are thus endowed can possibly be honest? To be without hair was of old ever esteemed a ground for reproach, and learned doctors tell us that the origin of the priestly tonsure was derived from an insult passed upon St. Peter at Antioch when they shaved his head "like a fool's."

Baptista Porta, who fills an honorable place among the early physiognomists, demonstrated that, great as the difference which subsists between mankind and brute-kind, the relationship between them is nearer than is generally suspected, and that beauty is nigher akin to the beast than most people suppose. In most of our species, especially in such of them as in any way had rendered themselves conspicuous among their fellow-men, he detected certain facial characteristics which they possessed in common with the lower animals, tracing, for instance, a close resemblance between the lineaments of the divine Plato and the countenance of a setter dog. "Many human faces" (Baptista Porta thought that almost all) "have a striking resemblance to particular animals," says Francis Grose in his Rules for Drawing Caricatures. "Hogarth has given some instances of these resemblances: one in the 'Gate of Calais,' where two old fish-women are pointing out their likeness to a flat-fish; another in the portrait of the 'Russian Hercules,' where, under the figure of a bear, he has preserved the lineaments of his poetical antagonist"—Charles Churchill. Le Brun, the painter, adopted Baptista Porta's physiognomical doctrine, and gave it practical expression by preparing a series of studies of human heads with their corresponding types in the bestial creation, and from a comparison of the two he believed a general law could be deduced, whereby it would be possible to determine, at sight, the disposition and temperament both of the man and his representative among the brutes. Were either of them timid or audacious, savage or placable, he thought it could be ascertained without difficulty at a glance. He considered the token of courage to be the little protuberance over the nose; in proportion to its size, small or great, was the animal daring or fearful. All great men, and all great animals, he believed to be eminent in the matter of nose—the eagle and Julius Cæsar, to wit; and a fine swelling proboscis was, in his mind, the invariable accompaniment of elevation of thought and grandeur of conception, and thus did both Aristotle and Baptista Porta also think of the straight nose blunt at its termination, "tower-shaped," as Sir Thomas Browne phrases it. Noses, we know, are of all varieties: Grose divides them into the angular, the aquiline or Roman, the parrot's beak, the straight or Grecian, the bulbous or bottled, the turned-up or snub, and the mixed or broken; each of which supply the indication of its owner's character, as, by some persons, the chin is supposed to do. But the better opinion is, that the chin affords a far less reliable index to character than the nose, being less marked and less numerous in its varieties. Indeed, with the exception of the double, the nut-cracker, and the cucumber chin, there is nothing specially remarkable in this feature of the face. Far otherwise with the nose, of which Napoleon Bonaparte was accustomed to say that he generally found a long nose, such as that we have been mentioning, associated with a long head, an admission the more singular as his own nasal development was a striking contradiction to his rule.

When Le Brun propounded the theory, of which he was rather the expositor than the author, the inquiry grew current in Parisian society, Who is your beast? Flatterers said there could be no doubt, especially having regard to the nose, judged by Le Brun's standard, that the Prince de Condé had for his congener nose a beast of the very first rank, at once strong, fierce, gentle, placable, terrible in power, but withal full of amenity, courtesy, and graciousness. Mirabeau, on the other hand, with his amplitude of hair, his expansive and expressive countenance to which the small nose had lent a singular appearance, his massive jaws and shaggy eyebrows, all suggestive of both Power and Will, what inferior (if inferior) animal could he recall to the mind but the lion of terrible paw and deep-depending mane?

Putting aside all fanciful speculations, there is no doubt that in every age the belief has been common that the inward and informing spirit of man has found expression outward in the peculiarities of his corporeal structure, and that in a large measure the body images the moral and intellectual qualities of the immaterial essence with which it is instinct. Madame de Staël thinks this was the case with the ancients in an eminent degree—that with them "there was a more intimate union between the physical and moral faculties than at present." This will be a consolation to some of us to whom the mirror exists as a perpetual reproach. Had we lived in heroic times the world, which knows nothing of us but our outside, would have been

* Writers who profess conversance with the subject affirm that, for men, chestnut or a deep shade of blonde are the most becoming, as these are ever found associated with intelligence, sagacity, and the possession of high moral qualities. The best of brothers, Castor and Pollux, the kindest of husbands, Menelaus, were ever depicted with hair of either hue. As far as men are concerned, Aristotle thinks the color of their hair is of little consequence; any color will do, provided the hair be not straight, for that is the sure indication of timidity and cowardice. Ajax had curly locks, and so had Cimon, and Augustus's ringlets are well known.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google enabled from that to detect those esoteric excellences with which, alas! none are acquainted save our familiars and intimates. Good looks are, no doubt, good things, but even in looks which require another adjective than good a difference is observable, as is well expounded by Grose. "Ugliness," he says, "according to our local idea, may be divided into genteel and vulgar. The difference between these kinds of ugliness seems to be that the former is positive or redundant, the latter wanting or negative. Convex faces, prominent features, and large aquiline noses, though differing much from beauty, still give an air of dignity to their owners; whereas concave faces, flat, snub, or broken noses always stamp a meanness and vulgarity. The one seems to have passed through the limits of beauty, the other never to have arrived at them."

THE TWENTY-THIRD OF JULY.

FRITZ HEINTZELMAN, at the age of sixteen, was seized with the epidemic of emigration; and gathering together what few kreutzers he might, he left his native hamlet in the heart of Germany and sought the western shores of the New World.

The fates used Fritz unkindly from the first. He had lost both parents in his childhood, and had scrambled up the height of his present years by whatever chance stepping-stones presented themselves; he had been forced to leave his fatherland through sheer wretchedness of condition, and on his way across the ocean he suffered shipwreck—shipwreck from which he escaped, as the sailors said, by the skin of his teeth, and with very little, be it said, beyond that skin. He had, fortunately, nothing left to lose at Castle Garden. But what of that? This was the country where you picked up great silver half-dollars for the stooping; he stepped on shore, from the gangway plank of the ship that had rescued the passengers on the wreck, far more lightly than he would have done if he had jingled a hundred guineas in his tattered pockets.

But once in the busy thoroughfares he found no place to look for the half-dollars on the pavement; and, moreover, the throngs there before him must have already picked them all up; and for a week, living on what he could catch, he rambled through the streets seeking work.

There was, of course, then, in the true Fritz luck, no work for him to be had; he knew barely a word of English; he failed to find any one acquainted with his own dialect. When people, by gesticulation and stray foreign sentences, made him understand that if he wanted work he must go into the country, he mildly showed them the bare palms of his hands, signifying that he had not the wherewithal to go; then they would look at his stout, long legs and stalwart body—and Fritz would look too, in a kind of pride to think only how well he could labor if he could but find the labor to perform, but as to getting out of that great city with them it was the last thing in his head.

Matters went on in this discouraging way till Fritz was very hungry—he had found no friends, no employment, no money, no food; he had condescended to beg, and had been repulsed. Footsore, and heartsore, and famished, he was stumbling on his way across a bridge, when the idea seized him that since he could not sustain life he was not bound to endure it: the dark water flowed so pleasantly under him — how sweetly it would sing him to sleep! His heavy heart would sink him quick like lead; and then the dear rest, and no waking to pain and hunger and despair.

But Fritz was young, and life looks fair to the young in spite of every ill, they have such treasures of unexhausted strength with which to meet it—tears sprung to the eyes of Fritz as if in pity of himself. He was going; he was determined now upon that—in a few moments those dark waters should flow on singing above his head; but, just for this last breath or two, he leaned his head upon his arms there at the bridge-side and sobbed aloud. There were not many passers-by at that time; if there had been, so little notice had Fritz ever received that he would not have expected any of them to accost him or perceive him. He was alone and wretched, and going out of the world.

When, therefore, a hand was laid upon his broad shoulder, not heavily—for it was a slight hand though a man's, but lingeringly—Fritz started as though he had been discovered in attempting the life of another than himself.

"What are you doing, my lad?" asked the stranger. And on being answered by a grumble of Teutonic gutturals, repeated his question in a kind of German which, if not the native dialect of Fritz, was one whose import he could gather with but little difficulty. His country's tongue once more! Listening to it, broken and disguised though it might be on the stranger's lips, was like stepping on the shores of the dear fatherland at last after all this foolish exile and trouble. In a transport he turned suddenly, and seizing the hand that had lain upon his shoulder kissed it again and again, and wet and covered it with tears.

"There, there!" said the stranger, recovering his property, with a shyness unused to such expression, and hesitating as he spoke, that he might furbish up whatever foreign speech he had. "My name is Isaiah Thornly. I live in Barkburn. There's a German settlement near there. You're out of work? A stranger here? About giving up? I see. You come with me." And taking Fritz's shoulder again, he broke loose from the constraint of his few German scraps by exclaiming in pure American: "Come along now. I'll fix your flint!"

And Fritz, provided that night with a good supper and a comfortable lodging, on the next day started with Mr. Thornly for Barkburn, to become a laborer upon his new friend's farm in consideration of board and clothes, and a small

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google monthly stipend that in his unaccustomed eyes resembled the riches of the East.

Once established, then, in his lately found home Fritz worked with a will the whole day long, as if, full of gratitude, he would show his deliverer that he not only had not lost by his goodness, not only stood as well by it, but that he had gained immeasurably—gained by the sum of another hand, another head, another heart! So industrious, skillful, and capable of turning his hand to every thing, he plodded along by day; and by night amused himself with the children, carved them toys, nursed little baby on his arm, and drank his mug of lager beer, and went to bed in peace with all the world—only to be up with the day, and to resume the same routine, to all appearance happier than a king.

But not content with helping on the farm, Fritz was ambitious of more distinction yet; he aspired to assist Mrs. Thornly upon her indoor labors. In the nooning, when another would have lain on his back in the sun, Fritz was in the dairy taking the dasher out of her tired hand and bringing in ten minutes the butter for which she had churned an hour; or just when the pan of apples seemed to be as interminable as the widow's cruse, Fritz would come along, and whipping out that sharp and wicked-looking knife of his, would put his hand in with such vigor as soon to leave nothing but a pile of parings before her; or when the warm, inviting evenings came, and one might like to take a little stroll along the lanes, or go into the village a half-mile away for a trifle of shopping, or run over to a neighbor's for a bit of gossip to warm one's heart with—then Fritz himself would go and hunt up her bonnet and shawl and present them to the mistress, and take Stephen and Jack off and hear their prayers, or pretend to hear them, and put them to bed, and rock little baby in his cradle afterward till long past the time for his mug of lager and his heavy, happy slumbers.

If Fritz had not a great deal of English, he had a modicum of common-sense; and though it may have been that the desire to be of service to his employer entered largely into these voluntary house-duties of his, yet there must also have been a motive in the purpose of averting Mrs. Thornly's evil offices; for doubtless he had perceived on first entering the house that Mrs. Thornly made him an unwelcome guest, disliked his foreign speech, his harsh voice, feared his great frame, his sturdy limbs, his sledge-hammer fist, objected to him altogether with whatever force her feeble nature held.

But let Fritz do what he would, Mrs. Thornly was not to be appeased, and at last a fancy took shape in her weak little head that grew insupportable to her; she believed that in all these apparent kindnesses Fritz had ulterior purposes, and she saw in every thing he did the nefarious design of winning her favor wickedly.

One night with tears Mrs. Thornly uncovered this notable discovery of hers to her husband. Mr. Thornly laughed at her. That enraged her. Then it was either Fritz must leave the house or she should. In vain her husband ridiculed, argued, expostulated—either Fritz must go or she should. Of course Fritz went.

But before Fritz went a little scene took place. When the young man understood what had been done, and by some keen sense or other divined who had done it, he turned upon Mrs. Thornly with blazing eyes, and, seizing hold of her wrist, said in broken and confused language: "You turn from me the heart I love, the man who saved me, I adore. If it was not woman, woman, I do kill you!" He was terrific, with his great heaving shoulders, his bearded, darkening face, and the blazing eyes. Mrs. Thornly screamed and hid her face, and Mr. Thornly wrenched away Fritz's hand, and in sudden, thoughtless anger struck him. The dark color left the face of Fritz in an instant; it was white as ashes; he caught the hand in the air, swung Mr. Thornly round about like a feather, and flung him into a seat across the room. Then he went. But pausing at the gate at foot of the little garden, he bowed his head and wept as he had wept that night upon the bridge, and called his master's name aloud with all endearments, and cursed his mistress. He was like some great, faithful dog; the blow had only made him love the man better; but then, every time that he thought of that man's wife tearing from him his only friend in all the broad, lonely, desolate land, the one he loved so well, he snarled and snapped his teeth.

After this the face of man was a hateful thing to Fritz. As to going among his compatriots of the German settlement, he would remain silent, with his native tongue unheard forever, first. So, in the course of events, Fritz settled down as hostler of the village inn, where the face of man did not trouble him much, and where he became tolerably familiar with the face of beast. Here, too, with nothing to occupy his poor mind, with no ambitions, hopes, or pleasures, he sought consolation in his mug of lager, and filled it oftener and drained it deeper than he had ever done before, so that night after night he faltered off to bed on his hay-mow, stupid and sogged, and lay till morning stretched in drunken sleep. Still this was hardly habitual as yet. Once or twice, though, when the beer was more potent than usual, or, brooding on his wrongs, his brain was in a more excited condition, he had flourished round the house in a furious fashion with the improvised weapon of an axe or pitchfork in hand, occasioning the liveliest terror to every spectator, and much subsequent disgrace to himself. It was during such a paroxysm that Mr. Thornly was sent for to pacify Fritz, and having come once, as if no more reconciliation were needed, he after that dropped in occasionally and brightened the days for his old servitor as much as might be; and as Fritz's services were cheap, and these more troublesome escapades were seldom, he was not so unfortunate as lose his situation a second time in consequence of them. Nevertheless, it was in these stages of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 madness and fierceness that Fritz was heard to utter fearful threats upon Mrs. Thornly, indulging his imagination with the atrocities that might be perpetrated upon her. He was not of sufficient delicacy of character to recognize that whatever injured her injured her husband. He desired simple vengeance; and when the raging fit was on him he wreaked it in direct imprecations of evil for her personally, through her children, and through every other avenue by which she might be reached that his angry and vindictive spirit could imagine. The broken, blundering speech in which he avowed these fell designs added a double portion to their horror in the hearer's ears.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

But notwithstanding such mischances poor Fritz was no more of a wretch than he had ever been. Many a time when the Thornly children had appeared in the village had he treated them to sweets, to long drinks of soda-water, to rides upon some sober steed from his stalls, at whose bridle-rein he walked himself. To be sure, in relation to the latter he had been known to declare that he had hoped the horse would throw the child and put an end to him, so that his mother should kiss him no more; but any one might have believed him or not as they chose, who had ever seen him meet the one he had always called "little baby," now grown large enough to toddle out of sight of home in neglected moments, take it up in his arms and caress it, saying, tenderly, "Mit you fader's ein, mit you fader's ein," and carrying it within sight of the garden gate, when he would set it down and skulk away as if he had committed a deed worth being ashamed of.

Once in a while, however, as has been said, Fritz experienced a satisfaction such as some lover feels at the seldom sight of his mistress. This was when Mr. Thornly, happening to be in the village, and coming round the inn-yard, spent half an hour or so in chatting with him while he groomed his horses, for he and Fritz had established a kind of lingo easily understood by one another. Lately, too, Mr. Thornly was seen there more than had been customary with him; he had business at the Barkburn Bank which some time since had lent him money on a mortgage of his place—a mortgage whose term was just about expiring; he looked haggard, his clothes were shabby, and he refreshed himself at the bar as had not been his wont. Mrs. Thornly complained to her intimate neighbor of this—that "Thornly had got some ridiculous notion into his head about coming to want, or dying in the poor-house, or something of the kind—she didn't know!" One day Mr. Thornly, sitting on the horse-block in the inn-yard, and all alone with Fritz, exclaimed, "There, there, Fritz, make haste and tie up that white horse! The beast makes me feel as if I looked death in the face. Death and the White Horse. I feel, Fritz," added he, in a little while—"I feel as if I should take my life!"

"No, no, master mine," had ejaculated Fritz, "the good God forbid!"

"When I look at my wife, when I look at the children," said Mr. Thornly, "the innocent little children, and wonder, wonder what is going to become of them, I feel as if I must take my life!"

"This arm," said Fritz, "this right arm shall take care of them."

But Mr. Thornly only shook his head disconsolately. Thereupon an idea dawned over Fritz, an idea which must have been born of more wit than he had exercised of late. He comprehended what was the trouble with Mr. Thornly, and suggested to him that he should do no less than brush himself up, look gay and prosperous, and borrow money of any wealthy acquaintance he might have in the city not very far away—then he could pay the Barkburn Bank, which so much preferred hazardous speculations to safe investments on poor men's lands, by which means he would save the farm that was to pass out of his hands unless redeemed at the specified time, and could then execute a new mortgage to the benefit of his supposed friend in the city, one running for such a term of years as would give him time to pay it off in full. This, or rather something that suggested this, was what Fritz proposed to Mr. Thornly, who brightened at first, then grew doubtful, but finally mounted his horse. It was a long ride to the city there; if he went at once he could not get home till all the family were in bed and asleep. So he struck spurs to the gray—an ancient edifice of bones, looking as if it had become the color of a ruin by reason of long usage and much weather-staining—and galloped away.

On the edge of that evening, it was the 23d of July, as he had afterward cause to remember, Fritz left the inn-yard and the village, and with a little basket in hand sought the wood upon the outskirts in order to pick a kind of berry growing there. He sauntered along, gathering and eating, and between whiles listening. It had rung nine, and still he sauntered there in the bright moonlight that fell through the open spaces of the wood; and still he listened, when at last the soft tread of a horse's hoofs on the dead leaves and fallen pine needles reached him in a measured recurrence, and before long he saw Mr. Thornly pacing his horse along and bewildering him with a jerking hand on the bridle and a reeling weight in the saddle. He stopped his horse at sight of Fritz, and asked him in a loud and angry tone why he was dogging him in this way through the wood, accompanying his question with such objurgations as may have alarmed Fritz for his master's safety, it is possible—supposing that now he had money about him and that by some accident he had been drinking.

Fritz was right in both suppositions. An old friend, who had won more of this world's prizes than he had done, relying on Mr. Thornly's honesty, had furnished him with the required sum of money upon his note, no great affair to him, though all the world to Mr. Thornly; and having sealed the bargain with a bumper, the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

new and happy debtor had taken another by way of stirrup-cup on his departure, and at the half-way house, where he had staid to feed and water the gray, stimulated by the previous draughts, he had fortified himself with one or two more, which, however harmless in effect on another man, had wrought his already fevered and enfeebled brain to an unnatural tension. Fritz, however, succeeded in calming him somewhat, and when he had effected this, he asked Mr. Thornly how successful his journey might have been. For reply Mr. Thornly brought forth the great envelope containing the bank-bills, and, snatching them out, proceeded to flaunt them before the face and eyes of Fritz like trophies, in a wild and triumphant way. The wind caught some of them from his loose grasp as he flourished them, and frolicking in the edges a minute bore them away, so that with difficulty Fritz could regain them, and perhaps would not have done so at all but for the twigs among which they caught after he had trodden and retrodden the spot where they played with him. "Thou art not fit to be trusted with them to-night, master!" said Fritz, gently. "Give them to me, that I may take them to mistress for you!" With a glimmering of sense in his half-crazy head, Mr. Thornly did as he was bidden, and Fritz walked on at the gray's head, quieting his master still as best he could. Nor after Mr. Thornly had entered and bolted the door, and left the horse to be put up by Fritz or to stay where he was, did Fritz go away at once, but hung around the place uneasily and like a rambling ghost, till the wheeling moon had fronted the arc of morning. But when he did go, a swifter creature never ran, a whiter face never saw moonlight, wilder words never disturbed midnight air.

That next morning, when it was time for all the inmates of the inn to wake from their slumbers, Fritz was found with his face buried in a mug of lager beer and making himself furious as he had sometimes done before, though at a different hour.

"Haven't you been asleep to-night, Fritz?" asked one.

"Nein, nein!" he answered.

"What, then, what have you been doing? Drinking?"

Fritz took another draught in response; it finished his business, he inaugurated his rioting around the place from garret to cellar straightway, and raged and raved madly with half-intelligible utterances that it froze one with horror to hear, if hearing haply any understood. It was too much for mortal flesh of landlord to bear—Fritz was dismissed the house that day. In half-awaking remorse, and all in a strange, hot agitation, recalled by many afterward, he made up his little bundle and left the town, and by daybreak was twenty miles to the west of the place, entirely sobered, and walking still as if he wished to put the breadth of the continent between himself and Barkburn.

Three mornings afterward a neighbor, not having seen any thing of them, on going over to inquire concerning the Thornly's, at their house, found his feet and his voice alike failing him. Mrs. Thornly and the three children were all dead in their beds, murdered and butchered, while the murderer had reserved for the husband and father such more dreadful death that he had been disposed of in a hidden place.

The whole town was up in arms. The teeth of all Barkburn chattered. Who could have done such a deed? What demon was there in the midst of them? What enemy had Mr. Thornly? Who in the world was safe henceforth? Was there any justice in the land or any God in heaven if the murderer remained undiscovered? Each man, each woman, each child, felt it imperative to aid in searching the mystery; every detail of the Thornly house and housekeeping was known; the least scratch, or crease, or wrinkle in the dead children's hands was noted; the very cattle starving in the sheds were objects of interest; the old gray, still unsaddled and neighing round the yard, had a story to tell; the mother murdered as she slept, with one arm across her youngest child; the little children dreaming with smiles upon their lips that had not time to leave them before the surprising knife drew its red way through their throats—all these things were rehearsed and dilated on, till, as if the horrid deed were insufficient in itself, the garniture of surmises, and kindled feeling, and burning indignation became more horrid yet.

It was finally agreed upon, before that sun had set, that Mr. Thornly had been waylaid and robbed and murdered in the wood, where the trampled moss and grass and broken twigs gave their testimony to that effect, and that the monster had then finished his brutality upon the helpless sleeping household.

It would be impossible to say of the early suspicion who first breathed it, how it spread abroad, or why it was ever hazarded at all; but, as if by simultaneous action of mind, it grew to be that there was not a soul in all Barkburn but believed, by the weight of insurmountable evidence, that Fritz Heintzelman, and he alone, could tell the truth about that dark night's deeds.

The telegraph had aroused the country too, and wherever a newspaper was unfolded the dreadful details were published to the day, and vengeance demanded on the guilty wretch. Fritz Heintzelman's name became "common in the public mouth," and the poor facts of his appearance were familiar to the stranger a thousand miles away. Had Fritz himself been able to read one noon, when, bent with fatigue, he limped into a way-side tavern, and took his seat, and called for beer, pushing away the paper that lay on the table before him, his eyes might have started from their sockets, and he could well have cursed that day when Mr. Thornly saved him from the restful death of the river.

"Have you heard of the horrible affair at Barkburn, Sir?" asked the host of the little tavern, bringing the beer.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Hein?" asked Fritz, looking up stupidly.

"The horrible murder at Barkburn! They say that one Fritz Heintzelman—"

But here Fritz rose with an oath, and setting down the untouched beer, stalked out, leaving the host with gaping mouth behind him. And when Fritz had quite disappeared the worthy host shook his head once or twice at such a singular proceeding, as if he wished to shake up an idea to the top where it could be gotten hold of, snatched the paper to peruse the items of the fugitive's appearance, and with eager eyes read that the supposed murderer stood some six feet in stature, though his broad shoulders were bent as if with labor; that his face was nearly covered with a dark and heavy beard; that he had deep-set gray eyes under bushy brows that made one line across his face; that these eyes had the appearance of a slight cast, owing to a transverse scar across the cheek; that his hair, a shade lighter than his beard, curled closely to his head; that he had an air at once stupid and ferocious; and that when last seen he wore a blouse of blue, and overalls, and a linen cap.

The host re-read all these items; recalled the stupid stranger, with his dark beard and lighter curling hair, as if the sun had blanched it; with the slight cast in his eyes that, however vacant they might be, made them seem sinister in expression; compared the description of costume with the stranger's blue blouse and linen cap; above all, recalled the staring scar, the mark of some severe cut; and within an hour news was darting through the wires that Fritz Heintzelman had stopped at the wayside tavern of Rocheville, and had taken the turnpike to Dunbury City.

As, white with dust and lame with travel, Fritz entered Dunbury City that night, a little tatterdemalion was crying his news in a voice worthy of larger lungs:

"Yere's y'xtra five o'clock! Last 'counts of the Barkburn murder! P'lice on track of Fritz Heintzelman, murderer!"

"Was ist dat you say mit me?" asked Fritz at last, stopping the urchin in a kind of imbecile terror, aware of something terrible, but unable to get it through his brain.

"Paper, Sir?"

Just then a hand from either side was laid lightly on Fritz's arms, closing down like a vice; before he saw them two handcuffs were upon his wrists, and he was arrested for the murder of Mr. Thornly and the Thornly family.

If any proof of his guilt had been wanting it was supplied by the search, when the money lent to Mr. Thornly on that 23d of July was found intact upon the person of Fritz himself.

It was of no use for Fritz to aver, as he did, when he saw the gleaming of the officers' eyes while they handled the parcel, that he was no thief—that he had forgotten he had it; the more he said the more certain seemed to grow the evidence of his guilt. "He gave it me to take care for him der night little baby was kilt. Ah, mein Gott! dese eyes saw them." The officers counseled him to hold his tongue, and roughly hustled him off, conscious that no treatment was bad enough for such a wretch; and fast as feet could travel they carried their murderer back to Barkburn and the scene of his crimes.

It was just as the funeral cortége of the unfortunate beings so suddenly thrust out of existence defiled along the highway to the barren village church-yard that the wagon containing Fritz and the officers drove into town. By what was intended for a refinement of cruelty it was drawn up beside the way until the four sable hearses should pass by in the full view of Fritz. He bore it stolidly at first, but when the wind partially lifted the heavy, sombre curtains of the last one, containing little baby as he might suppose, he broke down with choking sobs. "It becomes you! becomes you!" muttered one of the officers, with difficulty keeping his hands off him.

"Only four," said another; "only four. They haven't found him yet, then."

"Who? Mr. Thornly? Our friend here will tell us where to look when the lawyers once get foul of him, I reckon." And thereat they drove on, turning down a lane, lest the people should scent the game and tear it from them. But with these words Fritz looked hurriedly up at them.

"They do not then find the master?" he asked, in his half intelligible way.

"No," vouchsafed one of the men. "They will, though, with your help, lad."

The troubled, clod-like face was all perplexed for a moment with thought; then it brightened—if any one had taken the pains to look at it they would have seen—with a strange light of devotion, of love, of determination; but it was growing dark, they were driving through the unfrequented by-ways, no one cared for any expression his face might have this moment, nor so much as glanced at it; and in a few minutes he was safely lodged in Barkburn Jail, and the populace, among whom the news had spread like wild-fire, were howling outside the gates as wolves howl for their prey.

It so happened that a Court was to sit at Barkburn immediately—in fact, the Court was the sole importance of the place, a stagnant little hole enough except when lawyers and ladies, judges and clients, showmen and ground-nut vendors stirred its surfaces. And thus, without the delay of a single month, while the feeling was still at white heat, the prisoner, Fritz Heintzelman, was brought to trial. It was no easy task to fetch him into the court-room, so fierce was the crowd outside, so wild to take justice into their own hands; no easy task to get him away—the throng, or another, still there and clamoring. Fritz surveyed them without a shudder, in a coolness that seemed some sheer beastly stupidity. "Got to die," said he. "They only kill."

The Court, of course, had awarded counsel to Fritz; but even to his legal advisers he did not deign a single further word. They could not

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

but take his guilt for granted; for however much they might assure him that they wished to befriend him—that it rested with himself to prove an alibi by telling where he had been on that fearful night of the twenty-third of July—he still remained silent. Even when they found interpreters so that they could make sure that the prisoner comprehended them, the event was the same. The only defense they could establish was, that Fritz Heintzelman was devoid of human instincts, incapable of moral discrimination, a mere brute, no more amenable to human and moral laws than a chimpanzee. On the other hand, the evidence against him was satisfactory to those most revengefully inclined. He had been known to go out, with a basket for berries, into the woods through which Mr. Thornly was to pass; he had brought home no berries; but his voice had been heard in loud altercation later there in the wood—his voice being peculiar and unmistakable. It was testified that a certain sum of money had been loaned that day to Mr. Thornly; Mr. Thornly had been traced as far as the half-way house that night, with the money still in his possession; there were the appearances, though slight, of a struggle in one spot of the woods, slight struggle being necessary to overcome a man of Mr. Thornly's size and strength; the horse would seem to have subsequently wandered home from that place without a rider, being found grazing in the yard, but still saddled and bridled. Fritz Heintzelman had not returned to the inn till long past midnight, and his blouse had next day been observed to be somewhat stained either with blood or juice of the berries; while his wild, half-incoherent ravings under the influence of liquor during that morning had become quite intelligible by the light of the discovery of the Thornly murders. When to this was put in evidence the fear and detestation that Mrs. Thornly, feeling for him, had expressed to various acquaintance, and there was added the fact of the fearful threats that the prisoner had so many times been heard to utter against Mrs. Thornly, and the fact of his flight, and that of the money found upon him, and his unguarded exclamation to the officers showing that he had at least seen the murdered family—joining all this to his determined silence, not a doubt existed in the mind of any as to his guilt.

Fritz sat there looking listlessly about the court-room, perhaps partially understanding what was said and done, perhaps not at all, but apparently aware that death was his doom, and as he could not avoid it, it made no matter. One reporter mentioned his brutal look, another his stolidity, another rehearsed the item that he breakfasted in his cell of mornings with a wicked appetite; no one saw any thing good or noble in his poor face, nor any spark of the fellow-feeling that makes us all akin. It would not have been strange if, overlooking all these hostile faces, and remembering the rubs and knocks that had forever fallen to his share, a hatred of mankind had at that time filled the heart of Fritz Heintzelman and gazed out of his eyes upon the throng beneath him—the throng no less murderously disposed toward him than they believed him to have been toward others.

When all was done the Judge summed up the testimony in an able and elaborate statement, which, so potent seemed the bare facts, was after all full as much an argument as any thing said by the attorneys—so much an argument, indeed, that, as a great advocate said, he might have been successfully indicted for it. Fritz heard it all as if it concerned another person—nay, as if it were an imaginary case concerning some cipher. The room was filled to overflowing; an audience had even scrambled up without and heard a portion of the proceedings through the open windows, whence more than one wrathful citizen had shaken an angry fist at the careless wretch who murdered and gave no more thought to his atrocity than if he had crushed flies.

The jury were just rising to go through the form of retiring when another stir in the place attracted the attention of first one and then another, until the whole court-room, judge, jury, counsel, audience, turned and stared aghast; and women shrieked and fainted, and men held their breath as if they confronted one returning from the dead.

It was the sheriff himself who, having been called out a few moments before, now cleared the way; and behind him were men bringing in a chair and carrying it to the witness-box, and a white, cold, little shrunken thing, shivering away from the light of day, was reclining in the chair among its pillows—still more dead than alive; but every one who saw the face knew the man. There was the silence of death in the great room.

After some legal preliminaries the testimony of the new-comer was admitted to be given as he chose to give it; and, on being sworn, he essayed to speak. His voice was little more than a husky whisper—an articulate death-rattle—but you could have heard a breath in that still place.

In all this time Fritz, sitting there indifferently, with his hanging head, had not once looked up.

"My name," whispered the witness, "is Isaiah Thornly.

Fritz started as if stung by an electric shock, turned to his master, and would have sprung to him had he been able, with a wild, joyful cry. But at a glance of his eye he grew silent as a statue.

"I once rendered the prisoner, Fritz Heintzelman—in whose place I myself should stand—a great service. He has followed me faithfully from that day—he would have died here, in my stead, if I had not come. But I was ill, and knew nothing—till just now; then I heard them as they talked beside me; I told the good woman who took me in my name—and here I am."

The Judge seemed about to interrupt him here; but, apparently, on second thoughts, deemed it

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

necessary to let the feeble breath whisper out its story as it could. Mr. Thornly continued: "I have been in trouble of late, my farm was mortgaged—I saw no way of meeting the payment whose term had expired. I saw my family—soon to be—reduced to starvation—my little children suffering—beggars." He paused, and could not go on until they had given him some cordial drops. "I say I saw all this. It was with me night and day. It was my haunting thought. I feared I was getting mad. When I heard my boys saying their prayers at night—" He stopped again as if he would have cried out, but did not. It was pain to listen to the pants that broke up his words as he resumed. "When I heard them, it rose before me like a ghost up out of a grave, what was to become of them—every terrible chance of life seemed possible for them—I felt their poor little feet treading bare over snowy roads—I saw them blue and pinched—and aching—with hunger. Oh! when I lay down at night, when I rose at morning, the sight of my wife's eyes cut me to the heart and made me wild, as I thought of—every thing lost—the farm—perhaps even me—and she outcast—cold charity—temptation and trial. More than once I looked at them all—and thought—how kind the hand that should release them from life and evil—want—woe. Fritz Heintzelman knew my state of mind; he suggested to me to borrow money. I did so. He walked out to meet me that night—in the wood. Perhaps I had—drank—a little, I don't know. He found me half-crazed with that, or with the reaction from my long torment. I had a dim idea that I was wrong—I gave him the money to keep. He led me home. I think he must have staid round the place then still. I went in. They were all asleep. I went and looked at them—feeling so glad. At my wife with the baby on her arm. At Jack and Steve. I was so glad that they were safe once more, and had a home. Then I felt for the money; it was gone; that made me furious a moment—but directly I remembered that—I had given it to Fritz to keep for me. And then I looked at them again—and the old fear and terror rushed over me. I could not get away from it. And I thought if things should ever come to such a pass again—and having been once—why not again? And it seemed as if I could not let them live to meet it—as if I could not live myself. Only a moment—no pain—and then eternal rest. I suppose I was insane—I suppose I was insane—only I remember it all. A drawer was open. I saw something glitter there. It was my razor. I took—took it up—and drew the edge—finer than a hair—it could not hurt them in the least—and no more trouble. I remember lifting my arm, I remember the shudder she gave, opening her blue eyes; but I had done that; the rest must follow. Then it seems to me I was just touching myself, something warm was spurting over me, when I heard Fritz's voice, and saw him breaking through a window. I made haste—but he seized my arm—he snatched the razor—he turned to the children—and I leaped from him, and ran out of the house along the field and up the river-bank. A widow woman who lives on the farm of Low Acres, an untraveled spot, found me—she knows little of what goes on in the outside world—it was only last night—waking from a stupor—that I heard her talking of this trial, concerning which she knew but little—and with his name it rushed over me—and here I am. You can hang me if you choose. I hope, I hope you will. For, unless you do, I shall have lost them here and hereafter too! Only make haste—for, as you see, I am dying."

He was indeed. When he ceased speaking, and abandoned the unnatural exertion he had made, his eyes wandered idly round him as if he could no longer direct them, his head fell a little upon one side, and he was dead.

Nobody could have held Fritz Heintzelman then if any body had tried. He had broken all bounds, and was kneeling at his master's chair imploring him to look up, to speak. But in a moment he rose calmly as of old. They had called it brutality before; now they called it phlegm. "No," said he. "It is the best. It is the best."

The ceremony of the law had long since been abandoned there—it could be no otherwise in listening to that man's recital breaking through all rules of testimony. Now there was only such brief return to it as was required to pronounce the prisoner Not Guilty.

They carried Fritz out of the court-house in their arms. The crowd cheered him till the ringing heavens were hoarse. They would have spread his way with flowers, have feasted him, have lauded him, have endowed him, have given him any ovation. But as he had repelled them before so he repelled them now. For months and years it seemed as if his heart were broken within him; but youth is elastic, and time, in making him an American citizen, and bringing him other loves and ambitions, bridged over this black gap and chasm in his life. And then he could no longer hinder the generous atonements that were loaded upon him, and rising degree by degree, to-day there is no more respected an individual in that region—an overseer of the poor and director of the Barkburn Bank, to which a poor farmer or struggling mechanic never applies in vain for discount on his paper—than this same Fritz Heintzelman.

JONES'S IMPUDENCE.

I PROPOSE to consider the case of—yes, my friend Jones. Jones troubles my mind much. I like him, and yet I am of those who judge "a man should know his place and keep it." By all his intimate acquaintance, indeed, Jones is highly esteemed. The man's sole fault appears to be his extraordinary impudence. I can think of no one who has a finer sense of honor than he. Meanness is altogether foreign to his nature. His integrity is beyond question, his simplicity truly admirable. His generosity of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

temperament is highly praised by many upon whom he has conferred unasked favors. He would be famed amidst his circle for his entire want of selfishness did he not wear his virtue in his sleeve. It has yet been brought to light that he has deprived himself of what most would call necessaries in order that luxuries might be provided a feeble mother. With such rectitude as this is rarely found united such charity for the failings of others.

In the more manly virtues, fortitude, courage, energy, he— But I weary the reader with my enthusiastic praise, and I omit further extension of the catalogue of his noble qualities. I have said enough to show he is worthy of any man's friendship. He has, moreover, wit and intelligence. His conversation often charms me.

Jones is an artist by profession. My purchase of one of his pictures made us acquainted. It was a small and unpretentious work hung below the line at the Academy exhibition. I descried in it, nevertheless, a sincerity of feeling and conscientious painstaking that commended it to me. In the painter I found a middle-sized man, of a homely cast of features, in which a keen gray eye was alone attractive. He was extremely ill-clad. Every thing about him denoted that his struggle with life was a hard one. His age was seemingly twenty-four or five.

I respect much encouragers of youthful talent, and like to consider myself one of them. I have patronized not a few young artists. I smiled benignly upon Jones, and declared that I saw signs of great promise in his production. To my astonishment he did not treat me with that degree of deference I was accustomed to receive from such as he. He looked me frankly and fully in the eyes, as he replied he himself considered it his best work. There was not a particle of awe in his manner, no timid shrinking as if he had a doubt of pleasing me. He seemed to regard me purely as a man and a brother. That a mere poverty-stricken aspirant for fame should so act toward a capitalist did not, I must confess, impress me favorably toward him. I am always, however, inclined to pardon much to artists. They are a class of men who are obliged by the nature of their profession to do their own thinking, and eccentricity is to be expected among them. I was only led, therefore, to resolve to exalt myself more greatly in his eyes, and forthwith spoke of my desire to give him a commission or two. I was answered simply that he would be happy to see me at his studio, and straightway invited me to visit him in the sixth story of the building 999½ Broadway.

Thus was Jones's extraordinary impudence first manifested to me.

I was rightly indignant. I, a man of fifty, a merchant of high standing in the community, whose real estate alone was worth some hundred thousands, the father of four of the finest girls in the city, I to be treated as a mere equal by the lean, threadbare youngster before me! As to years alone he might have been my son. I, whose wife was a leader of fashion on the Avenue! I, the favored guest of the proudest circles, invited by an unknown dauber to visit him in his garret! The fellow was of a verity ignorant of his place. I could, of course, afford to be magnanimous. I smiled internally at his presumption, and, being really interested in such an abnormal specimen of humanity, contented myself with no other rebuke than a sarcastic bow, and the intimation that I would do myself the honor of calling upon him at his earliest convenience. Jones never winced, but making a respectful bow departed from my side. I saw him a moment after conversing with a long-haired brother professional, as seemingly unconscious of any condescension I had paid him as if I had never existed.

Now how would my head book-keeper have behaved under similar circumstances?—a man, too, whose salary is three thousand dollars per annum, while Jones, I know, realizes scarcely seven hundred. Binks—an estimable man he is—would have been agitated in every feature with pleasure, and, meeting a fellow-official, would have assumed an arrogant air befitting the occasion. I had it; Jones was conceited—all artists are—he imagined himself a great painter. Again I looked at him. I like to study human nature, and am also a literary amateur. Letters are my pastime. To my fondness for them is due this account. I looked at Jones again, I repeat, and his manner unsettled my conviction. Jones was unquestionably a puzzler! I determined to act upon the sarcasm with which I had concluded our conversation. I would visit him.

A small room, with discolored walls, hung all over with studies of foliage, of rocks and mountains, of skies and river-scenery, presented itself to my gaze. Here and there was a canvas which bore as yet no mark of the brush, while others showed skill in composition, and exhibited all the appearance of a finished painting. Three common wooden chairs, a tattered lounge, and a cheap easel comprised the remainder of the furniture, with the exception of a dingy green screen, which, like the walls, was profusely ornamented with sketches in oil and lead-pencil. Jones, clad in a ragged dressing-gown, outstretched his hand as I entered.

His confounded impudence again! Such was his manner, however, that in a dazed state, forgetting the rebuke due his insolence, I extended my own digits. It was astonishing that the ill-clad fellow before me could so impress a man of the world, used to all varieties of the human family. As with awkwardness, arising from a consciousness of defeat, I seated myself in a proffered chair my countenance underwent a series of expressions before the calm gaze of Jones. I was at first impelled to a stern look of dignity. The frown had, however, scarcely begun to contract my eyebrows before I felt myself acting ridiculously—Jones seemed so unconscious of any offense rendered. My bewil-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

derment now made me avert my eyes in a hesitant look about the room, and I suppose my agitation must have manifested itself more absurdly, for I saw an irrepressible smile hovering over Jones's lips. My emotions were perhaps similar to that of a lover before his mistress when upon the eve of proposal. That such a conceited youngster should so affect me was too much! That hardly-concealed smile!—why, I actually amused him! I determined at once to establish myself on my proper footing.

"You have often wealthy visitors, I suppose, Sir?" was my harsh remark—it seems now to me a contemptible one.

"No, Sir. I believe you are the first gentleman answering to that description my poor studio has seen. A frame-maker occasionally calls; and, like all Bohemians, I see sometimes a dun. I do my best, however, not to be ultra-Bohemian as to that." Thus responded Jones, mildly and courteously.

Courteously? Was it so? Would not his proper courtesy have been rightly shown by signs of humility? I so judged.

"Well, Sir, I must say that, for a man—" I was desirous of giving him a savage declaration of his inferiority to me, but I could not finish my sentence. Jones looked up at me with such a peculiar expression in his eyes that I was compelled to stop. In what consisted the power of that expression? Was it rage?—was it surprise? I could not declare. I tried afterward to analyze my own feelings. It really appeared to me that I was oppressed by a sense of my own inferiority—the conviction that I stood on infirm ground, and that I would assuredly meet with a conqueror should I offer battle.

It was all to no purpose my determination to put Jones down. Jones was triumphant; I must so consider him for the moment at all events. The fellow was a fool; did not know any better; was placed in an unusual position, and did the best his ignorance allowed. Answer a fool according to his folly. No one was looking on whose ill opinion could injure me. Instead of leaving (my only other resource) I would humor Jones.

Of course it was easy for me, in view of the object of my visit, to ask to see the artist's portfolio of sketches, and it as well as his productions on the walls were examined amidst an animated conversation. The man's mind was wonderfully full for one so young. He had read much and thought deeply. I could not consider him a fool. In fact, I was continually contradicting myself in all opinions concerning him. I had never met before such a man as he. He did not seem conceited—and I tried him severely then, giving my sentiments on his work in a caustic style, which I rarely indulge in. Often, when my denunciations were loudest (I still remembered his impudence!), he, without attempting the faintest excuse, would chime in with my remarks, and acknowledge he was ashamed of the subject criticised. When by extravagant praise I tried to draw him into vain expressions, I was always foiled by his simplicity and knowledge of his profession. He was just to himself, and merely wanted justice from others as to his artistic ability.

It is usual with me to find among painters the greatest ignorance on matters not directly connected with their profession. Theirs is an absorbing pursuit; to achieve success in it is to be a one-idead man: Jones was an exception to this rule also. I commented upon it to him, and he observed that he doubtless would have been a better artist had his mind run more in one channel; but that he had felt that higher than mere professional matters claimed every man's attention. A man himself among others, the consideration of various relations was of greater value to himself than worldly success, and he was by nature compelled to regard his practice of art as secondary to his own manhood. I thought him somewhat transcendental in his views, but was exceedingly interested in them, and not a little astonished by certain of his observations. He propounded many puzzling questions to me, and I was so puzzled in every way that I now remember little of our conversation but its effects.

Well, my visit ended in my giving him three commissions—a noontide effect, a moonlight effect, and a marine view. As I bid him good-day he had the impudence to say he would be most happy to see me again soon; that he enjoyed my society much. Before I knew what I was doing I had expressed my satisfaction at the amount of pleasure I had received, and ended by inviting him to my house—a picture-gallery, etc.

As I descended the sixth flight of stairs the thought of what I had done burst upon me. What would my wife say? I shuddered, and yet I laughed. Jones's impudence was magnificent. I had been fairly enslaved by it. I brought to mind Cæsar and Napoleon, and wondered if impudence were not genius.

Three days after, at half past eight in the evening, Kalves, my footman, threw open the door of my drawing-room and announced "Mr. Richard Jones!" Was it possible? Had I really set no time for the visit of that indomitable painter? Had I actually extended to him a cordial and general invitation to call upon me, the same as I would to Chancellor Allgreek or Professor Oddman? My wife was totally unprepared for his appearance, I had entirely forgotten my friend of the sixth story by the time I had reached home. Circumstances had shut out all memory of his eccentricity ever since. My four accomplished and fashionable daughters would be shocked by his vulgar impudence; and present with us, too, was the celebrated Oleander, whose last volume of poems were the world's talk. How would his refined nature endure such odious contact?

In the hurry of the moment I ejaculated to my companions, "A young artist who will make his way yet!" when the figure of Jones was presented, arrayed in the usual threadbare coat,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and furthermore adorned by a pair of cheap gloves.

Jones advanced smilingly and easily up to me, and my intention of requesting him to sit in the back parlor for a few moments until I could attend to him was at once abandoned. With him came his influence. I succumbed. It was his first visit, I was convinced, into "good society," and curious to see how great his "genius" was, I introduced him to the assembled party.

Any other man in his position, gifted with the ordinary sentiments of humanity, would, I know, have exhibited some hesitancy as he saluted the brilliant, and in part scornful, circle. He surely could not but feel that he had made a mistake, that he was not entirely welcome. Not a trace of embarrassment was visible in his manner, and he seated himself on a chair near my eldest daughter. When unobserved she threw a look at me which made me pity Jones. His mistake, however, was in some degree mine, and as a gentleman I could not forbear rendering him all the assistance I could to make him feel comfortable. Yet I supposed, of course, that he would act as though he knew himself more fit to be an observer than the observed. His conduct for the first few moments justified my opinion. He was quite silent, and after a few pleasant remarks passed him by my wife he was left to himself.

Oleander is a gentleman of fortune as well as a poet. He is a decided aristocrat. He is one of many Americans on whom the traditions of the Old World have greater influence than the noble spirit of progress which characterizes our own institutions. In an imaginative being, however, such as he, I consider this less reprehensible. The past must ever have a halo which the present has not. He was mounted on his hobby as Jones entered the room, and, I could perceive, was intensely disgusted at his appearance and the air of equality with which he shook hands with him. Jones must have seen it too, but it was altogether insufficient to disturb his serenity; and yet Oleander is a "great" man. He has been addressing many of his late poems to my eldest daughter, whom he regards with the most refined affection. To this, somewhat, I attributed his manifestations of impatience as Jones seated himself beside her, and, apparently unconscious of the poor figure he cut, made some pleasant observation.

As soon as sufficient civilities had been paid "the painter," Oleander, ignoring his presence, saw fit to take up his discourse at the point where it had been broken off, and launched into a glorification of the feudal ages:

"In that bright star of olden time the people held their proper place. They were the rightful slaves of their noble masters. That deference was paid station which its merits accorded. Nobility was transmitted from father to son, and no aspiring demagogue could seat himself beside it. Churls were churls then—by themselves and all others so regarded."

Jones here interrupted the flow of eloquence by saying, "You forget, Sir, that in that 'golden era' all the more noble professions were degraded beside that of arms; the physician was but an apothecary; the learned man of science despised or dreaded as a wizard; poets themselves, instead of divinely-inspired teachers, were looked upon as mere servants."

This was outrageously impudent of Jones. Confound the fellow! who was he? A miserable dauber, who could hardly support himself! My wife gave me a supplicating look. My eldest daughter frowned and bit her lips; my youngest laughed softly to herself. There was an awful pause, and then Oleander, without reply, in calm disdain proceeded. I could yet see he was enraged, and knowing his sarcastic power, felt sure the presumptuous Jones would at length be brought to his proper level.

The system of caste was further lauded. Oleander went more remotely into history and extolled the ancient Egyptians. "Among them," he observed, "was carefully studied the natural fitness of things. The carpenter's son must be a carpenter, the plowman's a plowman. Among them were not seen parents toiling hard and depriving themselves of comforts in order that their children might reach another and a higher position. No children despised their parents in that their education, their accustomed circumstances, unfitted them for the circle in which their offspring moved."

He talked splendidly, and we all thought Jones completely annihilated. Every word uttered was a stab at the youngster's insolence. How elegantly it was done too! Oleander had never impressed us more favorably. My wife and daughters interchanged looks of ill-concealed satisfaction. No one of us glanced in Jones's direction out of pity for his extreme discomfiture. Imagine, then, our astonishment when, in a firm and dignified tone, that individual again interrupted our esteemed friend's oratory:

"As a philosopher, Sir, you are, I must suppose, inclined to honor those who love the truth. You will oblige me by throwing more light upon what you have just uttered. It appears to me that the laws of God are higher than those of man; that where He gave talent He meant it should be used. No one, I believe, can deny that the common people have produced the greatest geniuses. What would not mankind have lost had they been compelled by law to devote themselves exclusively to the parental profession!"

Jones spoke well—there was no question of that. But then what impudence! I never saw the gentlemanly exterior of Oleander so discomposed. He turned pale with indignation and bit his lips before he responded, in a frigid tone:

"I know of no better illustration, Sir, of the truth of my remarks than yourself. I bid you good-evening." He glanced at the clock upon the mantle, and added, gayly: "Yes, ladies, your pleasant converse has delayed me many

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 minutes beyond the time set for an appointment elsewhere." And bowing himself out of the room he was gone.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Jones, the indomitable, had, however, opportunity to declare to him that a gentleman did not know what a verbal insult was; he cared merely for the truth concerning himself. My youngest daughter now asked him for his opinion on a book of engravings just published, and he seated himself beside her to examine them.

I was lost in a reverie for some moments, and then invited Mr. Jones to visit my collection of paintings. My daughter Emma accompanied us. I had intended to give the young man some fatherly advice, but her presence prevented it. Would I have been able to do so had she not been with us? I really doubt it, so self-possessed was he with all his impudence. Had Oleander maintained his supremacy? or had Jones—? I looked at his ill-clad figure. I thought of his position in society. I wondered—and well I might. My enthusiasm for art, however, soon absorbed my mind. In an animated and learned conversation with my protégé (?) I again forgot myself, and, bidding him good-by, cordially invited him again to visit me.

"Why, George, how could you?" asked my wife, indignantly.

"The impudent little wretch!" exclaimed my eldest daughter.

"He's shockingly vulgar!" declared both Elizabeth and Matilda.

"Oh, pa, I think he's so funny!" laughed Emma, my youngest.

How could so much impudence be joined with such good sense was that which puzzled me.

I saw Jones two or three times after this before I felt in myself the ability to speak to him as I desired, and as my natural kindly feeling prompted me. At last the occasion came. At the private view of the National Academy I was so inspired. A friend was about to present Jones to the great Splatterdash—an historical painter of renown. That worthy bowed stiffly and contemptuously as Jones advanced, whereupon he incontinently turned upon his heel and walked away, leaving the famed artist in a state of rage too gigantic for description. I saw the whole scene, and meeting Jones instantly after addressed him:

"My young friend, you will surely not refuse advice from a man like me, old enough to be your father."

"Certainly not, Sir. I have every reason to respect you. Your opinions will be listened to gladly. If I prove them correct I shall be happy to adopt them."

"Well, I have observed what has just passed. It appears to me you do not sufficiently study what is customary. No one knows better the worth of your heart and mind than myself, but from a man in your position—you have no name, you are poor—the world expects greater deference. It adjudges impudence the absence of that deference."

"I know the world, Sir, only when it is right. I have long ago convinced myself I should not know how to act should I yield myself to the opinions of others. It would be making of myself a shuttle-cock to innumerable battle-doors. Study, reflection, the exercise of reason, are guides that alone have helped me in my onward course through life. Should I give them up I would be compelled to consider myself a fool. I would be a fool. I honor distinction and I honor wealth, but only as they should be honored. Possession of those advantages often proves ability, but possession of them does not necessarily exact servility from others. A great man, Sir, does not wish the marks of respect so much as respect itself. A great man respects others. It is the duty of a gentleman to prove himself one. That Splatterdash did not regard me in my proper light. I took the only course I knew to make him acquainted with his error. I could not have respected myself had I acted differently. He may be a great artist, but he is not a noble man. I no sooner saw his manner toward me than I perceived I understood the gentlemanly character better than he did. I, exalted to his station, could not so act toward a poorer brother. Such pride as his is meanness of soul. The nobility of a man is much greater than the nobility of a painter He is above me in small things. I am above him in great."

What could I say to such a tirade as this? His impassioned manner, his flashing eye elevated his stature and gave dignity to his ill-clad form. The man before me was not the man whom five minutes before I had accosted. I had no advice to offer him. Luckily for me a mutual friend came up at this juncture, and my reply was not necessitated.

All this happened two years ago. Yesterday I had another instance of Jones's impudence. With a bland smile, a firm yet respectful manner, he solicited of me the hand of my favorite, my youngest daughter Emma. She it is to whom the only heir of the great Crœsus has been paying the most impassioned addresses—my most beautiful, my most loving!

"Well, Jones, really I—"

"Sir, I have a certainty now of three thousand a year, and I—"

"Oh, pa, I love him so much!"

That magnetic eye was upon me. How could I refuse?

"Well, well; bless you, my children, bless you!"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE VIRGINIANS IN TEXAS.

CHAPTER I.

MOVING TO TEXAS.

THIS gentleman whom we see riding toward us along this forest road is Mr. Morton McRobert, late of Virginia. He wears, you see, a broad-brimmed woolen hat, that is to protect him from the sun, and because no amount of crushing in traveling will injure it. As he rides nearer to us you can see under the rim of his hat enough of his face to read therein cheerfulness, sincerity, and quiet determination. You can know that it is not to preaching that he is going, by the copperas-colored clothes he wears—worn for hard service and not for show. Yes, the horse he rides is a good one, as you notice—strong, spirited, with small, sharp-pointed ears in incessant motion. Black Bob is his name.

But let horse and rider pass on, for we hear the sound of coming wheels behind him, and we want to see who it is. And while the sound draws nearer along the winding of the sandy road among the trees, just a word or two about Mr. McRobert. It would have been in strict accordance with Texas usage if we had stopped him when we had first met him and proceeded thus:

"Good-morning, Sir."

"Good-morning," he would have replied.

"Moving, I reckon?"

"Yes, Sir, I believe so."

"What State are you from?"

"Virginia."

Then if you happened to be from Virginia too you would instantly ask, "Ah, indeed! What county?" And if you happened to be from the same or bordering counties there would be no telling where the conversation would end—not until you ascertained the degree of your relationship to him, if it took three hours. If you were not from Virginia you would only ask, taking less interest in him, "I say, stranger, what did you leave for?"

Nor in the early days of Texas would a mover to the State have been astonished, scarce displeased, at the question. Many came then to Texas on account of frauds or murders committed by them. Of these some continued their evil courses in their new home, and soon perished by intemperance or the bowie-knife. But very many turned over a new leaf altogether, refunded ultimately all they owed, and lived many a long year afterward prosperous in cattle and lands, respected and happy. Criminals rarely fly to Texas now. They are more certainly caught and carried back than if they had concealed themselves in the cellars of their own city. Emigration to Texas now is larger than ever before, but of a character, in general, entirely different.

Now if Mr. McRobert had been one of the refugees from justice, in answer to any such question he would have said, "Oh, well, yes, I had some difficulties in the neighborhood where I lived." The word "difficulties" embraced every thing—theft, forgery, assassination.

However, I hardly think any one would have questioned Mr. McRobert as closely as was usual in the case of strangers. It is astonishing how much of his character, good or bad, a man carries in his face; and there was an aspect of dignity and self-respect in the very countenance and bearing of this gentleman that would have repressed all impertinence. If he had answered, however, he would have told that he had been once a wealthy planter in Virginia. I do not think he would have detailed to any one the manner in which he had been swindled out of his property by the base treachery of one whom he had greatly esteemed and loved. This was a part of his past experience which he never alluded to, hardly even in his own family; which he thought of even as little as possible. It is not necessary to enter into any detail just here. The result was, that Mr. McRobert had been rapidly reduced from wealth to almost poverty.

His coming to Texas happened in this way: Years before, his brother Frank, warm-hearted but wayward, had gone to Texas, had fought in all its early wars with Indians and Mexicans, had settled there, and had become extravagantly attached to the country. Remaining, so far as was known, unmarried, all he seemed to care for was Texas and his brother Morton's family. "A letter from Uncle Frank!" by any one returning from the post-office, was an announcement always hailed with special pleasure.

Now, it so happened that very soon after his heavy loss such a letter was announced one morning in the family. Uncle Frank had often urged his brother to move to Texas. In this letter, though he had heard nothing of his brother's loss, he urged the same thing with more force than ever before. He even made a special offer. He had "located"—that is, had picked out and legally secured—a league of fine land on the Colorado River, which he offered to his brother as a free gift in case he would move to Texas. To show how much he was in earnest, whole-souled Uncle Frank had actually inclosed the patent to the land, with its broad red seal and the transfer indorsed on the back of the broad parchment.

The morning the letter came Mr. McRobert had risen from a night of sleepless anxiety as to the future. At family worship he had besought Divine direction as to his plans, and it was when the family were at breakfast that Hark, the black man, brought in the large letter in its huge brown envelope, and laid it on the table. It really seemed a providence, a direct reply to prayer, a flash of light upon a dark spot.

Venable, the eldest boy, read the letter aloud. It was full of descriptions of the health, fertility, beauty, prosperity of Texas, and urgent were

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Uncle Frank's entreaties that the family would come out. He even spoke very disrespectfully of Old Virginia, in comparison with the "New Dominion," as he styled Texas. He offered, from his large herds, to give his brother "a start," as he called it, of cows and horses; offered to help him build a cabin; offered him "any thing and every thing" if he would only come out. No one of the family had ever had such an idea. Texas? As well move to Kamtschatka! But the first thought of father and mother was a providence! Just as they were cut to the soul by the treachery of a friend, here was the warm heart and hand of a brother; just as their estate had slipped from them and they knew not what to do, another and much larger estate lay there upon the table among the breakfast things in that parchment, if they would have it! And this is the blessed case of the child of God. Here was their Father in Heaven, with his left hand permitting them to be so afflicted in Virginia, but with his right hand, at the same instant, touching the heart and prompting the hand of Uncle Frank far away in Texas, and all to bring about, as I think we will see, the greater good and happiness of the family than if He had permitted events to roll on in their usual channel. Christians read, in their own experience as well as in Scripture, that "all things work together for good to them that love God."

The same divine hand that laid that letter on the table that morning touched, at the same instant, the heart of the family to accept his providence thus manifested. When Venable had finished reading the letter it was a settled matter that they would remove to Texas. No one said so, but all felt that it was settled. William was only six years old—eight years younger than Venable—yet he expressed the feeling of the whole table when, at last, he burst out, the first to break the silence: "Oh, I am so glad we are going to Texas!" Bessie did not say any thing, of course, as she was not yet four years old; but whatever delighted "Brother Will" delighted her.

One person, however, did speak about it—in fact, speak about nothing else henceforth—and that was Rohamma. She had just brought in a plate of hot batter-cakes. She did not wait to hear any thing said after the letter was read. Hurrying into the kitchen she caught Hark, her husband, somewhat roughly by the shoulder, and exclaimed:

"All done now! we gwine to Texas, you nigger! What you bring that letter for?"

Her opinion of the matter Scip, too, well knew long before night. A more thoroughly spanked negro child was not in all Virginia. For some days she waited on table with solemn, silent protest on her face. In addition to her perpetual bewailment of the matter over her wash-tub and ovens, she ventured once, and only once, to utter her sentiments and all her sentiments one day when with her mistress engaged in packing.

Poor Rohamma! Texas was to her Indians and Mexicans and wild beasts and poor white folks, and all that was horrible to imagine. She would almost rather have died than go. And, the fact is, so felt her mistress too, although she endeavored to conceal it. Rohamma did not look at her "Miss 'Manda" as she expressed all her horror and protest against Texas. But when she had finished her mistress turned to her from the trunk over which she was kneeling, and said, quietly:

"Rohamma, we are going to Texas; that is settled. But if you don't want to go, very well; your Mass Morton will leave you and Hark and Scip here. Colonel Jones is anxious to get you all. You needn't go if you don't want to."

The "girl" glanced up at the pale, anxious face and tearful eyes of her mistress, laid down the folded sheets she was handing, and burst into tears; they had been babies together—never apart.

"Law! Miss 'Manda," she sobbed, "you know I won't stay. Texas is drefful, but if the fam'ly must go, I go too!"

A long, long time it took; weeks of confusion and getting ready and leave-taking. It was only at the last day that Uncle George made his appearance on the scene. A wealthy planter, and living in an adjoining county, he had held himself hitherto aloof from his brother in his misfortune. When he found him actually starting for Texas—driven partly by feeling and a great deal more by what people would say, for, to the neighborhood, going to Texas was the falling down a tremendous precipice—he endeavored to interpose. It was too late.

"But, at least, don't take the children with you to such a country," he urged. "It's no place for them, at any rate. Leave them on my place for a time, any how; they'll be at home with their cousins there. You are certain to come back to Virginia. Don't take them. Amanda had better stay too. If you must go, why go and see how you like the country by yourself first."

No; Mr. McRobert's mind was now made up. The offer, which once would have been gladly accepted, was made too late. And so, before the neighbors could fairly believe it, the McRobert family were gone.

They could have gone by sea to New Orleans, and so to Galveston; but Mrs. McRobert had a peculiar horror of the sea, and so the journey is made overland.

All this time Mr. McRobert has ridden on past us, and we are waiting to see what follows him. Here they come toiling along in the deep sand. An open barouche first, drawn by a pair of strong mules. That is right. Never take horses to draw on a long journey; mules are far the best on every account. That is Venable you see on the front-seat driving. That is Bessie beside him. She insisted on sitting there, rather than by her mother on the back-seat, that she might see every thing. Let the carriage roll by. Here comes a wagon with four mules behind. That is Hark walking and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

driving. To keep up with the carriage is his business. The wagon is strong, blue, well covered, and packed with trunks and camping things. I see Rohamma and Scip are riding inside; they walk sometimes, but ride when tired. After the wagon comes William, on his white pony; "Slow" he calls him, just because he thinks he is the fastest pony, when put at it, that ever trotted.

And this is the order of travel ever since they left Virginia, and now here they are entering, after several weeks of travel, upon Western Texas. Mr. McRobert rides before to buy corn, or to fix upon a good camping-place for the night, or to have the ferry-boat ready when a river is to be crossed. Will rides behind to pick up any thing that may be dropped from the carriage or wagon, and to bring up the rear generally. Scip by himself, or Rohamma with Bessie, in walking, are very apt to loiter behind, and Will's business is to keep them up. Sometimes Venable changes with Will or with his father. Mrs. McRobert often walks, or even rides on horseback or in the wagon for a change.

Twenty miles a day is all they aim to make; sometimes it is less, sometimes more than this, as the camping-places happen to fit. Grass for the animals, wood for the camp-fire, water for cooking and drinking, are the requisites. Arrived at such a spot about sundown, the carriage and wagon are arranged to the windward side, both to escape danger from the sparks and to keep off the wind. The animals are unharnessed and fed with corn, and afterward well rubbed down by Hark, and tethered out to graze —all night if they will. Meanwhile Mr. McRobert and Venable have taken the tent out of the wagon and put it up—on sloping ground, if possible, in case it should rain. Then a huge log is cut and rolled to the mouth of the tent, and an enormous fire built against it by Scip.

All this time Will has attended to his pony, Slow, and assisted his mother. As to Rohamma, by the time all are ready for it, she has supper ready on the roaring fire. The fare is far coarser than was ever placed on their table in Virginia; but appetite? not one but eats with a relish never known before; not one but seems twenty pounds fatter since starting. Two members of the family enjoy it especially—Duke and Snap—the one Venable's big mastiff, the other Will's pet terrier; they were trotting under the wagon when we first met the family, and this is the reason we did not see them before.

But all are tired enough when supper is over; so Mr. McRobert reads a passage from his pocket Bible, and all kneel down while he thanks their heavenly Father for the events of the day, and commends the beloved little group to His unsleeping care during the night. Then to bed. The boys always sleep in the tent, their parents in the wagon; while the servants sleep upon the ground on their blankets, with their feet to the fire, the soundest of all. Notwithstanding their travel, Duke and Snap seem to be up and around all night, seeing that all is right. Often enough Hark is roused at night by their furious barking to drive off some intruding hog or cow. Once or twice Hark found that they had treed an opossum near the camp, and next morning it was broiling on the coals for all who would partake.

By early dawn all are up and dressed, refreshed by their sleep in the open air, that sweetest of all sleep. A rapid breakfast, a quick stowing away of every thing, a crack of Hark's whip, and soon the smouldering camp-fire remains the only memento that the spot had been the family's home for a night. At noon there is a short halt for an hour or so, for a hasty snack upon the grass beside the grazing mules.

On Saturday afternoons an early halt is always made, the camp fixed with more care than usual, and the Sabbath spent in rest according to the commandment. Pleasant Sabbaths, too, upon which all looked back long after with pleasure as they had anticipated them during the travel of the week with joy. The animals are well rubbed and fed, and permitted to graze all day. In the morning there is family worship, and the singing of sweet, familiar hymns beneath the forest trees, the elder children memorizing hymns or verses from Scripture, or reading as they reclined upon the clean grass. None enjoyed the day more than the servants—singing together their camp-meeting songs, or carding their heads with wool cards, or sleeping soundly beneath the wagon. It was a day of enjoyment, of rest to all; even Duke and Snap appreciated it, lying at their ease in the sun.

And so day succeeded day, and week succeeded week. Every day something new. Now the harness would break in some severe tug up hill, or a swingle-tree would snap in two, or a particularly bad stretch of road would occur where all would have to walk, or it would rain, or a halt had to be made at the road-side shop while mending was done, or a village was passed through, where small purchases had to be made and innumerable questions had to be answered.

It was on the 3d day of March the family left Loiterwater, the name of their place in Virginia; and on the night of the 6th of May Mr. McRobert told them at supper that by that time next day they might reach the Colorado River, somewhere near their future home. Next day all were up before light, and an exciting time it was, as, indeed, it had been for a week past.

The whole aspect of the country since they had crossed the Brazos was entirely unlike any thing they had ever seen before. Only occasionally would they pass through a belt of post-oaks or a bottom of pecan-trees. For the most part the hard, smooth road wound over the rollings of the prairie. Bessie fairly screamed with joy when she beheld the vast expanse actually splendid with innumerable flowers, especially blue and red, set off in deep green grass as the sky is with stars. A buoyancy of spirits, an excitement, a positive exhilaration possessed every

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

one. The pure, clear air was inhaled like the drinking of wine. As Mr. and Mrs. McRobert said to one another, the singular feeling experienced was more like a return of the exquisite joy of childhood than any thing else; and even the children thought their parents seemed younger and happier than they had ever known them. Venable could hardly attend to his driving. Will was almost wild, darting now to the right, now to the left of the road, to gather some particularly bright flowers for Bessie.

When the first drove of deer was seen grazing off to the left, even Venable shouted till he was almost hoarse. But when a huge rabbit jumped up almost from under the hoofs of Black Bob, ran a few steps, and then stopped and sat looking at them with such droll ears, nearly a foot long, even Duke and Snap were too much astonished to pursue. As to Will, off he shot after it on Slow, calling on the dogs until recalled from the hopeless chase by his father. And so on all day; for there was too much eagerness to stop to dine.

About the middle of the afternoon a range of blue mountains hemmed them in upon the left, one peak towering above the rest, and at their base was a dense valley of timber, through which they could catch the silver gleam of the Colorado. But the attention of the family was now diverted by seeing a horseman galloping toward them across the prairie from the mountains. It was a singular, alarming object. A heavy wool hat came almost entirely over his bearded face; a buckskin suit heavily fringed, a gun before him on the saddle, where hung a coil of rope; a wild, rough pony under him completed his appearance. And it increased their alarm when they saw him gallop right up to their father on the road before them in the distance, rein up his horse, leap off, unhook the coil of rope from the pommel of the saddle and throw it on the ground, then actually seize hold upon and tear their father from his saddle! In the midst of the consternation of the family little Bessie, who had been looking eagerly on, lisped out, "I expeth thath my Uncle Frank!" The alarm was changed to joy; and from every lip rang the cry, "Oh, Uncle Frank, Uncle Frank!"

CHAPTER II.

GETTING A LITTLE FIXED.

It was Uncle Frank sure enough! He had received his brother's letter announcing their coming, and for two weeks past he had been watching out for them from the top of Pilot Knob. By dark he had them safe and sound inside his house. "Harkal," he called it, meaning thereby the Spanish "jacal"—the Mexican name for a "cabin."

The children long remembered this as by far the most exciting night of their lives. They could not realize it. Only a little while ago in Virginia, which now seemed far, far away; now in Texas, and actually seated under Uncle Frank's roof, around the huge fire-place. They could hardly talk for looking around. There were the rough log walls, with near a dozen guns of various sorts supported on wooden pegs along them, while all kinds of twisted powder-horns and shot-pouches made out of spotted skins hung beside. Then there was the queer "puncheon" floor and the odd wooden chairs and stools; singular-shaped gourds hung by a thong around the middle with a cob stuck in the mouth; spears with curious iron heads, which they afterward learned were to "jig" fish with; nets to trap partridges; large knives in skin sheaths, and dozens of other things new to them.

Then there was Francisco, their uncle's Mexican servant-boy, blowing at the coffee-pot on the hearth and baking flat cakes, which Uncle Frank called "torteyas"—a name which they afterward found was spelled tortillas. He was the first Mexican they had ever seen, and they eyed him suspiciously.

Above all there was Uncle Frank. Such a beard, and such a dress, and so radiant with joy and welcome. They were almost afraid of him except Bessie, and she had climbed upon his knees as soon as he sat down, and, with a child's (and above all a girl-child's) instinctive knowledge of character, loved him dearly from the start. Henceforth papa and mamma might almost bid good-by to her, she was "Uncle Frank's girl."

Such cups and saucers too when they sat down to table—no two cups or plates or dishes alike. And the broiled venison—shot that day specially for them, Uncle Frank said; and the great dish of wild honey beside it; and the nice fresh butter, and the buttermilk in a big wash-pitcher; and the hot, crisp tortillas—the children, and their parents too, hardly ever made so hearty a meal. Only they could hardly eat for talking, asking, and answering a hundred questions. Only Bessie kept silent, watching Uncle Frank. She saw him drink one cup of coffee and then another. But when Francisco brought the coffee-pot, boiling from the fire, to fill his cup a third time she could hold in no longer:

"Oh, Uncle Frank, you'll be thick, you drinkth too muth coffee!"

All laughed, and Uncle Frank said, "Why, Bess, coffee is what I live on. Folks in Texas drink coffee all day when they can get it. The pot's always on the hearth, and it's never cold when any body's on the ranche—ranche means here, at home."

In fact, all were happy; but no one more so than their host. He seemed overflowing with joy. When they first sat down to table his brother had said: "If you please, brother," and had asked a blessing.

"That's the first time a blessing has ever been asked in this house," said Uncle Frank. "It seems like Virginia itself. Don't you remember, Morton, how father used always to ask blessing in your very words; and to return thanks too? And mother, when father was away at

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Richmond, would always put her hands together and say blessing in his place? How it all comes back to me! I have been mighty wild, I know. Never mind, that's all past; I take another trail from to-night."

And after supper it was at Uncle Frank's own request that his brother read a chapter and offered a prayer. He thanked God for having led them safely through their journey; for permitting the sons of sainted parents to meet after so many years. He entreated His blessing upon them in all things in the new life they were entering upon. There were tears in more eyes than one when they arose from their knees. But even then Venable could not but notice the astonished, frightened look of Francisco, standing by the door. No wonder. It was the first time the Mexican had ever seen Protestant worship. It was something entirely new to him.

Bright and early the children were up and out next morning. The broad landscape, the sparkling air, the wind blowing as if they were out at sea—all was new and exhilarating. There was Francisco too, just starting off with a coil of singular-looking rope on one arm and a bucket on the other. The children answered his smiling "Buenas Dias!" with the same salutation, only in English—"Good-morning!"

"Why, what is this?" said Will, touching, as they walked along, the rope—a hide cut into strips.

"Lariat," replied the Mexican. "That," continued he, pointing to another rope hanging on the branch of a mesquit-tree they were passing, and made of hair nicely twisted together—"that cabris."

"But what are you going to do with your lariat?"

By this time they had reached a rude rail pen, in which were near a dozen calves. Without replying Francisco let down the bars and admitted one of the impatient cows standing without. But before the calf could reach its mother a noose, thrown by the skillful Francisco, was around its neck, and the other end of the lariat run around a tree in the pen. The calf was permitted to suck for a minute or so, then the tightened rope held it struggling nearer the tree, while Francisco, first pouring water from the bucket over his hands, proceeded to milk. Only about a pint was obtained, and the same process had to be gone through with all the cows before the bucket was filled.

"I say, Francisco, you must teach me how to throw the lariat," said Venable, as they walked toward the house.

The Mexican laughed, and nodded. Notwithstanding his black eyes and hair and swarthy color, and outlandish, broad-brimmed, high-crowned black hat, the children felt far more at ease in regard to him than they had done the night before.

"See here," said Francisco; and handing the milk-bucket to Venable he pointed to a broken-off limb projecting from a mesquit-tree some thirty feet off, and with a swift hurl of his hand the noosed end of the lariat was around it in a moment, while the other end remained in his grasp. "You try," he continued; and running to the tree he disengaged the lariat, coiled it again, and placed it in the hand of his companion.

Venable did try his best, but at the first throw the noose did not reach half-way to the tree. At the next it went that far, but did not come within five feet of the tree even, falling to one side. At the next throw the whole lariat flew out of his hand far over the top of the tree, amidst the hearty laughter of all.

"Never mind—try every day—learn at last," said Francisco as they proceeded to the house, and the boys both resolved that learn they would, if effort and patience could accomplish it. Meanwhile they began to look up somewhat to the Mexican, who seemed only about the same age as Venable. But they did not dream of half he could do, as they were soon to learn.

"Now," said Uncle Frank, as they sat at table after breakfast, "what I propose is this: while sister Amanda and Bessie and Will rest themselves, suppose, Morton, that you and Venable take a ride with me—not on horseback but in the boat; it's down at the bank, not a hundred yards from the house. We can look around a little. What do you say?"

Mr. McRobert and Venable willingly consented. After seeing that their animals had been securely tethered out to graze on the rich mesquit grass growing abundantly around, and of which they seemed to eat greedily, and yielding to the earnest entreaty of Will to go with them, they started. Uncle Frank first said a few words to Francisco, who nodded and said, "Si, si, Señor," with a profusion of singular gestures with his fingers which struck Will as particularly funny.

"What did he say see, see for, uncle, and twist his fingers so for?" inquired he, as they walked on.

"Oh, si, si is Spanish for yes; and as to his fingers, Mexicans talk with them—five tongues on every hand, and one in their mouth"—replied his uncle. "You'll understand it all, Will, after a while."

In a few moments the whole party were embarked in the skiff and out upon the broad, clear river. It was a large, strong-built boat, nicely painted, and the name Dolores painted on the stern and on each side of the prow.

"Who was Dolores, uncle?" asked Will as they glided along.

"Not now—I'll tell you some of these days. Pshaw, why did I forget it!" replied his uncle, a little hastily, and there was a something in his tone that made all regret that the question had been asked.

"Ah, stop! I like to have forgotten," said Uncle Frank. Laying his oars down he took a tin cup from under the seat, dipped it in the river, washed it well, then filled it with water, and handed it to his brother.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Thank you, I'm not thirsty," said Mr. McRobert.

"Never mind, please drink; and you, Venable, and you too, Will. That's right. That'll do."

"But why did you want us to drink?" asked his brother.

"I'll tell you to-night. Steer, will you, if you please; there's a paddle in the bottom, Morton. I want to steer down stream toward the other bank."

As they sped rapidly along under the vigorous strokes of their uncle's oars the children exclaimed with delight every moment at the transparency of the water and the beauty of the scenery. A flock of mallard ducks flew so close over their heads that they could see the beautiful green of their necks and the very black of their eyes.

"Oh, if I only had a gun here!" said Venable.

"Yes, and knew how to hit," said Will.

"I'll see that you both learn to do that well enough before long," said their uncle. "I have got a good rifle for you at the harkal, Venable, and a double-barrel shot-gun for you, Will. I can't think what made me forget to give them to you before we left."

"Oh, uncle! thank you, thank you!" said both the delighted boys in a breath.

"It's often been with me no deer no supper. Mrs. Necessity was the old lady that taught me how to shoot," said their uncle. "And now I think I can hit in less than ten yards of a doe's foreshoulder when I try hard. Throw us a little more into the bank, Morton—that's it."

"Oh, see—yonder's another river!" exclaimed both of the boys, as the thick undergrowth of the river-bank directly opposite them on the other side parted suddenly as they sped down the river and revealed a beautiful stream almost as wide as the Colorado, on which they floated, of bluer water, flowing at right angles into the Colorado from among dense forest trees drooping over on each side.

"That? that isn't a river," replied their uncle; "that's a spring-branch. The head of it is only a hundred yards or so up out of the side of that high hill you see there."

"Who ever heard of such a spring?" said their father, amidst the exclamation of the boys, "it seems a hundred times too much water to come from a dozen springs! What is its name?"

"The San Hieronymo. Every thing is a San-Something in this country. That means Saint. There is the San Gabriel, the San Marcos—beautiful streams not sixty miles from here—San Pedro Springs, San Antonio River, and town too. Then there's the Brazos River; its full name was Brazos de Dios—the arms of God. There's the Trinity River too. Corpus Christi is the name of a town on the Gulf. And so of a hundred other streams or towns. However little religion the old Spaniards had in their hearts and hands, they had plenty of it, in this way, on their tongues. The names—the Trinity for instance—shock one at first in such common use. You soon get accustomed to it, and think of it only as a river. Besides, the old names are giving way to new ones as Americans come in."

"Some of the names in Texas can hardly be an improvement upon the old," said his brother. "Let me see; we crossed Muddy and Brushy and Dry Creeks, I remember."

"And through the towns of Bucksnort and Scrougeabout and Hog-eye, you remember, papa?" cried Venable.

"Yes, and mamma bought a doll for Bessie in Split-skull. And Hark told me," continued Will, "that he heard talk of a place called Lick-skillet."

"There are names worse than those," interrupted his uncle. "But never mind that now; I want to land here under this bluff. Catch those willows, Venable. "Hold on to the willows!"—you'll know what that phrase means first time you are adrift out here on the river when it is booming. That's it. Now look out you don't light on a rattlesnake when you jump out!"

Thus saying, the Texan led the way by a winding path until the party found themselves standing at last upon the summit of a bluff towering some fifty feet above the river. From where they stood the whole country on the other side of the river lay open before them, as in a picture.

"Now here's a view I wanted you to look at, Morton," said his brother. "You see where the San Hieronymo enters the Colorado, about half a mile up the river yonder. Trace it along by its timber as it circles inland under the base of the mountains. That high point about a mile from the river, where you see that thick grove of big live-oaks, is where the water bursts up from under the mountain. A splendid building-place that—plenty of water, wood, and rock for building; besides being high and shady. The mountain is just right to keep off the northers, while the south is open to let in the summer breeze up the valley. Back of the grove you see the country rolls up the mountains into the cedar brakes; cedar enough there to fence in all Texas. Coming on down to the right is open prairie, rich as cream, ready and anxious for the plow, good for wheat, corn, cotton, any thing. Come on farther to the right; that thick pecan forest is all river bottom. There's a little tract of land worth looking at—one or two miles river front, stretching I don't know how many miles back! Well, what do you think of your land?"

"My land! you do not mean to say—"

"Yes, it is," said his brother Frank, interrupting him; "that's your league. It's more than a league; it's a league and a labor—four thousand six hundred acres in one body."

"My dear brother," said Mr. McRobert, after a moment's silence, and in a faltering voice, "how can I thank you? I assure you—"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Thanks!" said his brother, impetuously. "When I ran away to Texas, and George and all were dead against me as a good-for-nothing scamp, didn't you stand up for me with father and the rest? And you can't have forgotten that five hundred you mailed me when I was so hard-up after the fight at San Jacinto. That is the league Texas gave me because I was in that fight. I bought the next league to it on the other side of the San Hieronymo with part of the money you sent me, improved it, and got a stock of cattle with the rest. So you may well regard it as your land—bought with your own dollars; only this is a better league for you than the one my ranche is on. And if you do owe me any thing, you have more than paid it up by coming out to Texas to live beside me."

"And you had not heard about the conduct of Watkins when you wrote?" asked his brother.

"O! couldn't I pick him off his horse with a rifle beautifully if he was only at all in range!" replied the Texan. "But no, I didn't hear of it till your last letter. Only Hark, Rohamma, and Scip left out of near one hundred hands! However, since it's brought you to Texas I don't object."

"It was hard at first," said his brother; "but I had no hostile feelings toward the man. I ought not to have indorsed for him. However, I did the best I could under the circumstances. I am not a Fatalist, but I am satisfied it will all be right in the end—I am satisfied of it," he repeated, warmly. "There's no such thing as Chance in my religion; it is Providence—a wise and loving and special Providence—I believe in. Each day I am to do the very best I can, according to the very best of my judgment at the time; and that it will all be right in the end I am sure of it, and feel sure of it."

During this time the party had descended to the river, entered the boat, and pushed off.

"I don't at all fancy rowing all the way back home up-stream," said the younger brother. "We'll land on the other side and ride home. I see Francisco is there with the horses."

Climbing up the opposite bank, at which they speedily arrived, they left the boat to be rowed back by Francisco, while they mounted the horses he had brought. There was Black Bob and Slow for Mr. Morton McRobert and Will, and two mustangs for Venable and his uncle. The boys now, for the first time, noticed closely the Texan fittings for the animals. The bridles were particularly strong, with immense curb-bits, Uncle Frank's bridle being heavily plated with silver stars, with which his saddle also was plentifully adorned.

"I got the bridle and saddle at San Jacinto," said Uncle Frank, as they rode homeward. "It belonged to one of the Mexican officers killed there."

"But what do people use such big wooden stirrups and such great spurs for?" asked Venable.

"Oh, the stirrups and saddle and rider go together," replied his uncle. "You are obliged to have such stirrups and mud-leathers in going through chaparral after stock, or your legs would be badly torn. The saddle is so deep, with such a high pommel—horn, we call it—so that a man can keep his seat when his mustang pitches, or when he has roped any thing. As to spurs, they must be severe to manage these vicious horses with. Mine are not larger than a dollar. I have seen them as large as a saucer, and jingling with bells."

Thus conversing they wound their way through a forest of pecans, live-oaks, wild plum, hackberry, prickly ash, and other trees, gay with the foliage and flowers of the season. Passing around the head of the San Hieronomo, the boys asking and the uncle answering a hundred questions, they were soon home again. As they arrived the active Francisco had just come up from the bank of the river, accompanied by Hark bearing a bucket of river-water for cooking. Taking a gourdful of it in his hand their host entered the house and offered it to Mrs. McRobert, who thanked him and drank a little.

"Now, Bessie," said her uncle to his little niece, as she climbed into his lap, "take a good drink from this gourd; it's nice cool water, and I'll catch a horned frog for you, first I see."

Bessie complied, and her uncle handed the gourd back to Hark.

"But why on earth did you make us all drink Colorado water for, uncle?" burst forth Will.

"Simply because when once you have drunk Colorado water, nowhere else can you ever live again as long as you live but in Texas. You may laugh," he continued, "but it's a solemn fact, never known to fail."

These last words were not lost on Hark as he passed out of the door with the bucket. He had drank at the river himself, that could not be undone. There was only one course left. In two minutes Scip had, under compulsion, swallowed a gourdful.

"What you make de chile drink for, man? He no want it?" inquired the unsuspecting Rohamma, who stood near by hanging out her washing.

"Drink some y'rself and I tell you," replied her husband. But it was not until after long entreaty that she would consent, and then suspiciously, and after much prying in the gourd, she permitted a small quantity to pass her lips. Almost before she had done so her eye caught the triumphant look of her husband, and she hesitated suspiciously and inquiringly in the act of swallowing.

"Too late now, gal!" cried he. "Yah! yah! yah! Mass Frank say, when folks once drunk Colorado water dey nebber can lebe Texas—nebber, nebber again!"

With a look of horror and disgust the woman spat out the water on the ground as if it were poison, spat and spat again, wiping her lips energetically with her apron.

"I nebber swallered a drop—but I nebber forgive you, nebber—you see if I do. Lib in dis here Texas? Nebber see ole Virginny again?

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I'd raffer die right here, now right off! Texas! Eugh!" with utter disgust. But as she spoke a shade of dismay suddenly deepened the darkness of her face. She had forgot. That very morning on the river bank, washing, she had taken one, two, three hearty drinks. It was too late!

"Well," she groaned, "de will above be done! Any how, I ha'n't long to lib, I hope," and with a load on her heart she turned into the log-kitchen to prepare dinner for the hungry husband.

Poor Rohamma! Many a heart beside thine has yearned in Texas after its old home. Woman, especially, recoils from the life of the frontier. Bravely has many a young wife, just brought to Texas by her husband in pursuit of fortune, struggled between her love for him and her desperate yearning back to her kindred and the scenes and companions of her girlhood in the old States. Bitter tears wept in a husband's absence have been stoutly chased away before his return by determined smiles, summer showers driven away by the shining of the sun. Far more painful is it when, in the turns of fortune, the aged mother is brought to Texas, leaving all her heart among the graves and the friends of her lifetime. It is only young trees that bear transplanting to a new soil. And yet, strange to say, let bride or matron or any other settler in Texas only actually return to the old States, I know not why it is, whether the glamour of the West is on them, or whether the witchery was in the water they drank, their old home is home to them no longer. Old friends, old haunts, old occupations have lost their charm—there is a sense of uneasiness. The yearning to get back to the West becomes a craving, a passion. Once back again in Texas nothing more is said of returning to the old States. It is singular, but it is the invariable fact. Texans call it "the Mustang feeling." My own pet private theory is this: Adam and Eve lived before the Fall in a fresh, new world. An old, settled state of things is utterly unlike this. The yearning back to the West, when once resided in, is the sleeping Adam and Eve feeling yet in the bones an instinctive longing back toward Eden.

CHAPTER III.

AN EXCURSION AND AN ACCIDENT.

It was Saturday when the party made the little voyage of discovery just mentioned. The rest of the afternoon was spent in getting all things ready for a quiet Sabbath. But before they went to rest that night, after full discussion, it was determined, bright and early on Monday morning, to go to the tract in a body and select a building spot.

Mr. McRobert, like a sensible man, always consulted with his wife in all his plans. Even the children were freely admitted, on all proper occasions, to express themselves; but the father remained the executive, with full veto power too. And herein was found the secret of the singularly strong attachment of the members of the family to each other; and the joyful, hearty, and intelligent interest taken by all, even by Bessie—as far as that is concerned, even by the servants—in all the family plans.

The Sabbath came, and was spent, as the McRoberts always spent their Sabbaths—except that they had no church to go to as in Virginia, and so had to make a church for the day of Uncle Frank's harkal. As usual all, even the servants, were scrupulously clean and arrayed in their best. At breakfast Uncle Frank could not suppress an exclamation of surprise and pleasure at the "Sunday appearance," as he called it, of all. As to little Bessie, in her red dress and morocco shoes and neat little collar and rosy, shining face and smoothly-parted hair and demure look, she seemed ten times sweeter than ever.

"Well, this does look like Virginia!" exclaimed their host. "It's the first time I've seen Sunday in Texas for years."

Immediately after breakfast he disappeared into his own room. When he reappeared you would hardly have known him. He had shaved—at least a little—and scissored his luxuriant beard that he left, and hair, and had changed his check-shirt for one of linen, and had donned a broadcloth suit fished up from the forgotten depths of his trunk. Francisco had blacked his boots for him, the first time the Mexican had ever done such a thing, under Hark's instruction. Handsome, sincere, genial before in appearance, he now seemed even more so—a little sun-burnt, that was all. Bessie fairly danced around him, clapping her hands with glee.

"Well, yes, I do feel more like a Virginian and a gentleman," said he. "Texas is the thing! all we have got to do is to Virginianize it a little."

After an early breakfast on Monday morning the whole party repaired in the carriage and on horseback to the spring-head of the San Hieronymo. If nature had arranged the whole place just to be a home it could not have been better done. In truth the God of nature, their heavenly Father, had arranged the place at the creation of the world in love to this family—knowing that it would, when its day came, settle just there. And in this He showed no more forethought and affection for this particular family than He has for all who fear and love him. In no sense was Mr. McRobert other than a strong-minded, sensible man; yet that very thought flashed upon him as he walked with his family over the place.

There was an elevation, commanding a full view of the river and all the valley open far to the south, and crowned with magnificent live-oaks, the very spot for a house. Off, not sixty yards to the left, was the spring—a monster spring. It gushed out right from under the mountain cold and clear, sixty-two feet across, and from ten to twenty feet deep. As the chil-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

dren stood on the rocky banks they could see the very bottom, and fish of all sizes floating leisurely far down, it was so transparent. It was not a spring, in fact—it was rather a river flowing under the mountain and breaking out there. For drinking, for washing clothes, for fishing, what could be more convenient! and for bathing, you could hardly hold yourself on the bank from jumping in. Then there was the mountain towering up on the north side, under which the house beside the spring could nestle like a chicken under a hen, while the northers were whistling over all the world besides. There was the open prairie for their cattle and for cultivation to the east, the vast river valley extending south.

"Now the first thing to be done," said Uncle Frank, as the whole party sat down together on the clean rock near the spring, breathless from rambling about, and exclaiming with wonder and delight—"the first thing to be done here I found in the Bible yesterday. I'm sorry to say it's the first time I have opened my Bible for a long time—one mother put in my trunk when I came to Texas; but I happened on this yesterday, and it's sound sense as well as Scripture: 'Prepare thy work without, and make it fit for thyself in the field; and afterward build thine house.' Yes, you must fix for planting first, and then build. Now it happens first-rate—I've had a Dutchman up in the cedar brake for I don't know how many months cutting rails. I paid him in land. Brother Morton, you and I and Venable must take the wagon and mules up there to-morrow and begin hauling rails."

"But how about the plowing?" inquired his brother.

"Oh, I have had another Dutchman breaking up the prairie all last winter, poor fellow! I paid him in cattle; but he was snake-bit, and died before he could get them up. But Hark will have to plow it over again with a long bull-tongue. I have oxen out on grass that we can get up to do that while we are hauling rails."

"How long will it take us?" asked his brother.

"Not long; it's down hill all the way from the brake. You won't need but a small patch, for garden things and a little corn—almost too late even for that. What with your building and fixing and fencing it will be full next winter before you will be ready to put in any thing like a crop. You ought to have been here six months ago."

"People use cedar altogether for fencing here, do they not?" inquired his brother.

"Hereabout they do. Once fence your land well with cedar and that work's done for your lifetime. Your fence may catch fire and burn up from the prairie, but it can never rot. Some people plant osage orange—bois d'arc ('bow dark') they call it—for a hedge. Further west they throw up a ridge by digging a deep ditch, and plant prickly pears thick on top of the ridge. Others wattle in dog-wood into posts. But cedar is far best when you can get it. Compensation of nature, as philosophers call it: wood is tolerably scarce here, but then it lasts forever, what you have."

"What a singular species of cactus!" exclaimed Mrs. McRobert, who had rambled off to one side; "it is as large and round as one's head; and what a beautiful cream-colored blossom it has! And here is another kind still, all in little lobes, a flower at the end of each, growing right out of the rocks!"

"That is the Turk's-head cactus," said Uncle Frank, as all hurried to the spot. "You'll find plenty of it hereabout. The switch cactus grows only in the sandy river-bottom; it can be trained to run twenty feet long, not thicker than your finger. It is singular," he continued, "how every thing in this country has thorns. There's the mesquit-tree—nothing but thorns. Yonder is a chaparral-bush—every twig and every leaf covered with thorns. A little later it's loaded with delicious currants. The plan is to put a sheet on the ground under it, and beat off the fruit into the sheet with a stick."

"They have given out lately," said his brother, "that the gum of the mesquit has all the properties of gum-Arabic, and far better for medicinal use."

"I'm glad to hear it," said the Texan. "A grove of them looks more like a deserted apple-orchard in winter than any thing else. They make a hot fire, and that's all the use I've had of them. But I was talking of thorns. The farther west you go the worse it is. The very grass is covered with thorns. As to the plate-cactus, it grows as large as a house almost—many plates twenty inches across. When range is poor stock-keepers rake them on a fire and burn off the prickles so that the cattle can eat them. Cattle often are choked to death trying to eat them with thorns still on. As to their beautiful red pears, three of them are certain to give a man a chill. They split open the plates and use them for poultices, sometimes, I believe. Nothing's made in vain, I suppose. The very frogs have thorns all over the back and head. Here is one I put in my pocket for Bessie. Oh, you needn't be afraid of it; it's clean, and as harmless as can be. The children are hardly ever without them in their pockets or bosoms, and you can pick them up any hour of the day any where. They say they live on ants and other vermin. But what use their horns are I can't imagine; some use, you may be certain."

"What do you call that, uncle?" said Venable, as they passed through a belt of prairie on their way home, pointing to a singular-looking sort of tree.

"Thorns again, you see," replied his uncle. "We call that the Spanish bayonet. It's one of the aloë species. You see it's like the trunk of a tree, with ten thousand spikes like, only larger than, bayonets, growing out on every side from the ground up. I'd just as lief be speared by a ranchero at once as thrown from a mustang against them. The points are keener than a needle. I knew a lady who had one growing

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in the yard, who put a spool on the end of every bayonet, to keep her children from being hurt. The tree was odd enough looking before."

"And what use is it, uncle?" asked Will.

"Why, I suppose if any one was to plant them close together they could make an awful fence. But if you noticed, as we passed it, a long, blue sheath had shot up a yard above the circle of bayonets. Soon that sheath will burst open into a hundred pure white blooms—it's the grandest flower in the world—perfumes the whole prairie. The magnificent flower, standing white and gorgeous above all the bayonets, and growing out from the bayonets, always reminds me of happiness after trouble."

"Or heaven after earth," added his sister. "But I did not think you were so romantic, Frank."

"Do you see those flowers?" asked the Texan, stopping with the party, and waving his hand toward the prairie, that rolled from his feet away off north and east to the horizon, brilliant, actually dazzling to the eye, as the sun shone upon it, with flowers. "Once in riding over that prairie to the San Gabriel my horse fell lame just as I started. I was obliged to go, so I walked leading him. Just for the curiosity of it I began, as I walked, to pick and count the different kinds of flowers I passed. I went on to a hundred and twenty-three, and stopped it, tired out. This," he added, taking a small five-leaved flower out of the hand of Bessie, which was loaded as well as her apron with flowers — "this is the Texas star; it always bends to the north; you had better look at it well, boys, in case you get lost—the compass flower some people call it. It's about the only flower whose name I know. But the cattle are rapidly destroying the flowers—they are all disappearing as emigration comes in."

"Speaking of emigration," said his brother, "I have been told that there are kinds of animals that keep in advance of emigration."

"Yes," replied his brother; "soon as an Indian sees a bee he knows it's time for him to be leaving. It's the same with squirrels. I have seen them crossing the Brazos westward in shoals. They had a story that a ferryman there was kept busy a week ferrying them over—a flat load every time. Same with quails—they were never known till white people began to come to the country."

"I do believe this is hoarhound," said Mrs. McRobert, stopping by the edge of a thick vegetation near the yard.

"Yes," said Uncle Frank, "they say it comes in with settlement too. There's enough of it—and sage, too—growing around here to doctor a city. The castor-oil plant, too—Palmi Christi, as it is called. I had not improved this place a year before it was growing twenty feet high all around the yard and the stables. Nature must think there's going to be lots of children raised here, I thought, when I first saw it, with plenty of green water-melons to make them sick. Then there's the cockle-burr too. Texas never heard of such a thing until it began to be plowed. It seemed seed sown at the fall, only waiting for man to come to spring right up and make good the curse, 'Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth—in the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread.' There's the milk-weed, too, and the old Virginia Jimpson weed that has sprung up here since the Indians left, and I don't know what all."

But here the speaker was interrupted by the screams of Rohamma running from the house toward them: "Oh, Mass Morton! Oh, Miss 'Manda! snake-bit! snake-bit! Mass Will, snake-bit!"

Sure enough Will was not with the party. Going on ahead of them to the house, he had been searching for bait for fishing among some old logs in the field beyond, and now made his appearance with Rohamma, holding out his hand bleeding. Quite a scene of consternation followed, in the midst of which Will explained that in thrusting his hand under a log to roll it over for grubs, he had felt a severe pain in his finger, and as he drew it out a ground rattlesnake had attempted to glide away—which, however, with the aid of Scip, he had killed. Scip himself was lamed for the time by a violent blow from a pair of tongs in the hands of Rohamma, endeavoring to aid in killing the reptile. Even before he reached them the wound had turned blue and the arm had begun to swell—sure sign of the virulent poison. Will bore it like a man, but was as ashy pale as his frightened mother; while little Bess made the air vocal with her cries. Meanwhile Uncle Frank had darted into the house, and now returned with one of the gourds which had been hanging in the house and a tin cup.

"Here, Will!" he said, pressing the full cup on the boy, "drink this—drink all of it, as fast as you can!"

"But what is it, uncle?" inquired Will.

"You never mind what it is," replied his uncle. "It's whisky. I've put some sugar in it—drink! drink! never be afraid; it won't hurt you. Pour out another cup for him, Venable; drink it too! Never mind how it burns your throat!"

"Your hartshorn, Amanda! Where is it?" asked her husband; and in a few moments a rag wet with hartshorn was applied to the wounds, for the fang of the snake had passed entirely through the base of the middle finger of the left hand, making a hole on each side.

"Have you any brandy?" asked Mr. McRobert.

"Only some brandy fruit," replied his wife.

"The very thing!" said Uncle Frank; and in a few moments Rohamma had produced and opened the jar.

Under the urgency of all Will ate, nothing loth, peach after peach; swallowing down, with many a wry face, the whisky pressed upon him continually by his uncle. He had already swallowed enough to intoxicate a grown man, yet it did not affect him in the least.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Now if he was a whisky-drinker this remedy wouldn't do the least good," argued his uncle; "but, as it is, he's safe now."

Sure enough, in a few hours his trouble seemed over. For a few days he could not use his hand or arm easily, but this soon passed off, and in time his adventure was forgotten. Brandy peaches, however, he declared he had eaten enough of to last him the rest of his life. He could never be induced to eat one again—and of whisky he had a special abhorrence.

"One day," said Uncle Frank, as they sat at dinner, "I had, what you, Morton, would call, I suppose, a special providence happen to me. I was riding through the thickest part of the Yegua Bottom. I had often gone the road before, knew it as well as I do the way to San Hieronymo Spring, but I got lost. As I stumbled about in the forest I chanced upon a faint trail, and followed it up till it led me to a little cabin in the deepest part of the woods. Before I could get to the door a woman heard my horse's hoofs and came running out as if she was crazy.

"'Thank God! thank God!' she said. 'What is good for a snake-bite, mister? Get off quick! What is good for a snake-bite? My boy's bit, my boy's bit! What is good for it? Quick, mister, quick!'

"I jumped off, went in, found a little four-year-old of a boy lying on the bed badly bitten just above the ankle-joint. There he lay, the wound blue, the leg dreadfully swollen. The father was off to the port with the wagon; nobody there but that poor mother with her only child. What with fright and what with ignorance she didn't know what on earth to do. If you believe me, the poor creature had put on a pot full of wild hoarhound and was boiling that to make him drink; it was the only thing like medicine she had or could guess at. It's well I came, and just then too; in two hours he would have been far enough gone beyond the best doctor that ever lived. I had a flask of whisky in my saddle-bags and kept the mouth of it between his lips, the end tilted up, while his mother was tying a rag full of wet salt to the wound; and that was about the only thing she did have. In a little time my flask was empty, and Charley, as she called him, was safe and sound asleep. I had hard work to get away from that woman. 'I had given up every thing,' she said, 'and was just praying to God to help me when I heard you coming. How did you happen to be passing such an out-of-the-way place as this, and just in the nick of time? It was God that sent you. Oh bless Him, bless Him, bless Him!' she exclaimed, looking upward, her hands clasped and her eyes streaming with tears. She made me stay till she could cook something for me, then put me in the road and off I rode, and I do believe to this day she almost believes I was an angel sent that way—a singular sort of angel! However, I was mighty glad I happened to lose my road."

"And you remember Steuben Brown you were telling me about yesterday, uncle?" said Venable.

"How was that?" inquired his father.

"Oh, it is only a little matter that happened a few years ago down the river," said the Texan. "Mr. Brown was out a little, looking up some hogs he had, and Steuben with him—Steuben was just about the age of Will here. On a sudden the Indians were on them. Brown had his boy on the horse before him. He put spurs to his animal, and might have got off safe, but he was looking around at the Comanches as he loped off, and a limb of one of these live-oaks struck him full in the breast. The Indians had riddled him with arrows before he could even begin to try to get up."

"But about Steuben, uncle?" interrupted Will.

"Well, he wasn't hurt. In double-quick time the Indians had caught the horse, and off they went. As soon as they struck the prairie they made the little fellow run before them, his father's scalp hanging round his neck, the blood trickling down. Whenever he would halt an Indian would prick him on with a spear. At night they would give him only what they threw away to eat, treating the child worse than a white man ever treats a dog. A day or two after starting one of them pounded some rock into fine bits. Taking a handful of the pieces, he stripped off Steuben's shoes and stockings, rolled up his breeches, and rubbed the flint into the child's legs and feet till they were all one sore. This was to keep him from escaping. They were pushing on for Santa Fé, but just before they got there the poor little fellow dropped, gave out. They thought he was as good as dead, and left him lying where he fell, half in half out of a water hole in the prairie. It chanced—it happened—it providenced, if you say so—that a company of traders going from Santa Fé turned considerably out of their road to water just at that hole. He was so small, and in a dead faint, lying there stark naked, starved, and cut to pieces from head to foot, they never would have noticed him if they had not come right to the hole to water. As it was, in four months he was in his mother's arms, alive and well. That is what you people call a special providence, is it not?"

"Every providence is a special providence," replied his brother. "If Charley had died there alone by himself with his mother, or if Steuben had died before the traders came, it would have been equally the providence, the special providence of God. Good and bad, nothing happens but according to the will of the Almighty. He has special love and care in afflicting us as in blessing us. The way is to see him in every thing: when we are prospered to rejoice in it as from Him; when we are afflicted to submit cheerfully to it as equally from the same all-wise and loving Friend."

"I must tell you a little thing about Will, Frank," said Mrs. McRobert—Will had before this gone out. "One day his father took him

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

out hunting, when he was only four years old. They went some distance in the woods. His father told him to stand still by a certain tree while he went off to get a shot at some doves. But the birds flew up, or something, and his father had to go still further on. Will became alarmed and began to call, but his father—not to frighten the birds—would not answer. At last he ceased to call, and his father coming back saw the little fellow on his knees on the ground, his hands clasped above his head, exclaiming, 'O God, please bring pa back! please bring pa back!' His earthly father having failed him, he had turned to his heavenly."

"Oh, ma, tell uncle what Will said about laughing with his legs!" said Venable.

"That's not to the point of what we are talking about, Venable," replied his mother; "but it's only this: One day, when Will was not three years old, he was making a great noise in the room, dancing and jumping. 'Why, what are you doing, Will?' said I. 'Oh,' he replied, 'I'm so happy! and I'm only laughing with my legs!'"

"Bessie's my pet!" said her uncle. "Wonder if she ever said a smart thing in her life?"

"All her smartness is to come yet, uncle," replied Venable. "But this morning Hark killed the hog you told him to before breakfast. Just before we sat down to table Bessie came out to where I was staking out Slow, and said, 'Bubber, oh! Bubber, I thaw a gotht to-day!' 'A ghost!' said I, 'what was it?' 'Oh, it wath the gotht of the hog Hark killed; Rohamma wath cooking ith gotht!'"

"However," said Mr. McRobert, rising, "we have no more time to hear about the children. Suppose we ride this afternoon up into the Cedar Brake."

THE LAST DAY ON THE PORCH.

I.—MORNING.

BRIGHT, beautiful, sunny, and summery. A lawn well shaded (front yard they called it when it was laid out sixty years ago), but not so well shaded as to shut out all the brightness of the day. Here and there a sun-patch brightens the green and heightens the shadows. Just now, over the level land, the rising sun has point-blank range under the trees, and the old man's feet, as he sits on the porch, are in the sun while his face is in the shadow. A nice old face he has, old Farmer Jones; and we read in it that eighty years in the world have neither saddened his heart nor damped his spirits, though the weakness of his body confesses to the full fourscore.

As the sun changes in its daily round various places under the shady canopy come in for their share of its beams; and the thrifty grass and flowers and shrubs are witness to the wisdom of those who planned, and of those who have kept up, the pleasant old homestead. Here a few blows of the axe, and there the setting of a new tree, have kept the equilibrium of light and shade. Trees grow wonderfully fast with those who understand how to plant, and how to nourish them; and superfluous limbs or whole cumberers of the ground can be spared without regret. The planners and the maintainers of the old place are the same. The old gentleman who sits on the porch with his chair tilted against the wall ("r'aring back" as somebody calls the attitude, in a figure borrowed from a rearing horse), that same old gentleman built the house. The two chair-legs which, in his favorite posture, are expected to bear his whole weight, and which have fulfilled that expectation since the time before you and I were born, have nearly found their way through the oak-flooring of the porch. And the "rung" between the two front-legs is worn to the thinness of a lath by the old gentleman's shoe soles. They put better stock, and more of it, in the old time into houses and into furniture than they do now. For Farmer Jones would break down a "cottage chair" of modern date in less than a week. In this old chair, for the summer days of sixty years, he has taken his seat; in early life at evening only, later in years during the heat of noon. Now his day's work is little more than to find his way to this shady nook, and sit, wind, weather, and rheumatism permitting, from morn till noon, from noon till night. Once he could read, though never very extensively or very critically. Now he is content with such scraps of the daily intelligence as his family find worth communicating, or he deems worth inquiring after. But to Farmer Jones the last brood of poultry, the color of the last calf or colt, and the prices of "truck" on the last market-day, are of more consequence than politics at home or wars in Europe.

Farmer Jones has never abdicated his post; but considers himself paterfamilias, with all the honors to that grade pertaining. And his old wife is still here, and is at this moment moving in busy idleness somewhere about the plantation. Two generations of her successors relieve her of all actual labor; but still she imagines that she is ever so busy, and, like her good man, never so important—a charming delusion of old age. A fountain of youth to the aged is this participation in the busy concerns of their successors. He is neither wise nor kind who would deprive them of it.

Old women are often better preserved than their old mates. While Farmer Jones sits and thinks, the Madam is bustling around with the little steps of age, proud in the fancy that she is still of some use in the world. Loom, and spinning-wheel, and wool and flax, have long been pushed aside, though from the attic all the appliances of ancient housewifery might still be produced. "Store goods" have taken the place of home manufactures, and even candles, yielding to petroleum, burn no more; and the ancient days of "dipping" come no longer, with their unctuous fun. The title "spinster" still remains in legal documents; but the actual spinster, who made it a point of pre-matrimonial

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 conscience to spin and weave her own sheets and toweling and ticking, is classed with the fossils that lived before the flood. Housekeeping now no longer includes the replenishing of the heavy and well-filled "press." So Ma'am Jones has nothing to do for pastime but to knit; and knit she does with all diligence. Her good man's feet would perish in any but long hose from her needles. And she has "well-saved hose" enough for herself, to carry her comfortably through another threescore years and ten. Every bed in the house has a "better quilt," the work of her busy fingers, knit in shell-work, and in scroll-work, and all kinds of work. Every easy-chair (some of them uneasy enough) has its "tidy." She even attempted to fit one for that chair on the porch. But when her old husband's carelessness had repeatedly converted it into a foot-mat, she indignantly reclaimed it, raveled it out, and knit it over for another use. The great personal inconvenience of the rebellion to her was the rise in the price of knitting-cotton. But the dear lady, like thousands more, scraped lint in war time, and found constant employment in soldiers' woolen socks.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A Jersey farm-house, and a Jersey sun; one is of the coziest, the other of the hottest. There are few fantastic cottages in the primitive districts; but men and women have managed to be born in those plain houses, to live long and to die in them, with quite the average degree of comfort and with more than the average of peace. Farmer Jones thinks his the nicest and most home-like house in the State. If long acquaintance and close attention should embolden him to say so, he has the right. In sixty years he has not slept out of that house sixty times. Nor will he sleep out of it till he is carried out over the porch for his long, last rest.

Knitting-needle posts has that porch, and a concave roof, modeled, it would appear, from the section of an egg-shell. "It turns the rain," says Farmer Jones. As to shade from the sun, the porch roof has no need to furnish that. For the trees are so arranged that though the sun's rays may strike in turn on all other places they never find the roof of the little porch. And the green moss of sixty years rejoices in a perpetual dampness and shadow. Only in the morning, as we have said, do the sun-darts find their way under the trees at point-blank range; and the very cracks and crevices seem to blink with astonishment, and the shoes of Farmer Jones cast queer shadows under his chair.

Morning bright! And here comes a morning face to match, a lovely, laughing little pet of the fourth generation, Farmer Jones's grandchild's daughter. She knows that she is welcome. Even the old dog, Watch, who lies at the Farmer's feet, too lazy to rise, beats a noisy greeting on the floor with his tail. Little Pet has climbed up on the old man's knees; and a charming picture they make, as her smooth apple cheeks nestle against his wrinkles.

The old man's mind is wonderfully busy to-day, and every thing he sees and feels suggests the past. As he hugs the little child to his heart his thoughts run back to the time when he, a child, rested on the breast of his grandfather, gone to his rest fifty years ago. Does this child think of him as he thought when a child? Does he seem so very old? And did his grandfather feel as he now does, hugging that little one?

Farmer Jones looks up, and his thoughts take refuge from these questionings among the trees. He remembers when they were saplings, and what a deal of pains he took to persuade them to grow straight. Nay, he remembers an older generation of trees which were here before. And some of them were of that iron kind, the locust. And he cut them for posts for the paling; and those posts still stand firm, "good as they ever were," thinks Farmer Jones, "and I so shaky!"

The mowing machine is doing its thorough but noisy work on the broad fields opposite. Farmer Jones can remember when grass-seed was repudiated as the craziest of "book-farming," and the only grass or grazing was the natural growth of the meadows and the low lands. He can tell you why farms on the lazy, noxious creeks were preferred. It was because the uplands would graze no cattle; and people compromised with the chills and fever for the sake of milk and butter. And he well remembers with what toil the hay was mowed, and spread, and made, and how the maidens took their turns in the hay-field.

But the memory of the old meadow has a charm for Farmer Jones. For his eyes fill as he recalls the morning in the hay-harvest when he first dared to hint his love to her who has been his companion in life's journey for threescore years. The graceful figure is before him, the downcast eye, the rosy blush—

"Come, child, you have plagued grandfather long enough," said a blithe maiden, as she bustled out and took the well-contented Pet from his arms—though not without some resistance and more outcry. "Such a strange look as grandfather gave me out of his eyes!" she said, as she entered the kitchen with her captive. She did not know how the old man's thoughts were busied; nor how for the instant in his reverie he was young again, and took her for the apparition of his young love!

II.—NOON.

The billowy wheat, like a yellow sea, with multitudinous summer waves, drifts the thoughts of Farmer Jones back to the time when a scanty crop of the coarser rye was all that he could hope from diligent farming. The maize, glistening in green, an army with banners, stands close as a Grecian phalanx, where once a few acres of corn, in scattered hills, of dwarfish growth, required weary days of patient hand-hoeing. Now the light plow slips through as if to man and horse the work were the merest pastime. So over the whole surface of his farm of a hundred

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

acres his review extends. And he smiles as he remembers that off his father's farm of five hundred acres the crops were not more than a fifth of what he gets from his hundred; and that fifth was more than he could with profit convey to the market.

He smiles, and yet it is with a slight feeling of mortification as he recalls how he contended, step by step, against the innovations which have converted the old waste into a garden, and made the fields to stand so thick with corn that they laugh and sing. New neighbors have come in and tempted him to sell the surplus acres, without which he once thought he could not keep from the poor-house. With every sale the remainder, like the leaves of the Sibyl, become more valuable, and, by better culture, more profitable. From the sales of lands and the growing profits of crops he has educated his boys fit for judges, and his girls for queens; and there is still left an unknown balance in securities in the county bank, in bond, in mortgage, in farm utensils, and in a well-stocked barn-yard. All the boys are "started in life;" one son, as his deputy in name but principal in fact, on the homestead; the others away, as their tastes led them. But this is still "home," and all his children are frequent visitors, though they have roamed the world around, and astonish their father with tales of California and of Ind.

Thus day after day has the old man sat and dreamed the honest dreams of a life well-spent, the recollections in his well-earned ease of years of toil. Every day his chair has ground its way farther and farther through the oaken floor, but he takes no more note of that than of the wear of his own frame, gradual but sure. No need had he of books, when, as he sat, he could read his own life, and the story of every child, and the history of all the years, in the familiar objects which surrounded him. He indeed could "Find tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, Sermons in stones, and good in every thing."

The broad, straight turnpike road runs before his door. He well remembers when a narrow, devious way wound like a lazy brook along: avoiding here a barn; there paying legal respect to a lime-tree directly in its path; and there again making a sharp corner to leave a fence in its angular integrity. Once a weary wagon on wooden bolsters instead of springs plowed occasionally along through the sand. Now there was scarce an interval between the various vehicles, from market wagons (among wagons like the Great Eastern among ships) down to the lightest and most fairy-like things on wheels.

And city carriages, once kept away by deep sand and heavy wheeling, now seek the tempting turnpike for their drives.

High noon, and there is a lull in the travel. The flies drone lazily; the very dust is too conscious of the heat to rise; and the leaves on the trees droop listlessly. The old man, in a doze, is dreaming of the time when a trip to town with eggs and butter, and a few articles of heavier "truck" for ballast, was a weary day's work, lengthened by early rising and late getting home.

The rattle of quick wheels, the chatter of merry voices, the inquiring bark of old Watch, the screaming and gabbling of the poultry, hens, and turkeys, and all, and the multifarious sounds of a farm-yard alarmed, wake the old man from his slumber.

"What on earth is the matter now?" says Farmer Jones.

"Father's come, father's come, father and Uncle Tom!" is shouted in answer from the gate. Old Watch, the dog, is satisfied with the reply and subsides into silence. In a moment more Farmer Jones's two "boys," one of fifty and the other of forty-five, have him by the hand. He greets them heartily, but looks abstractedly after their horses, which are being led to the stables, and wonders how they could buy such light "creeters," which could not stand the plow an hour. The hens cease cackling, the old gobbler is silent, and the momentary confusion is stilled in universal acquiescence; except that old Watch, the dog, can not satisfy himself with the smell of the city boots, which have not at all the fertile odor to which he is accustomed. And little Pet, the child, stands apart with her thumb in her mouth, sulky at being neglected, and puzzled at the assortment of kindred and affinity, fathers and grandfathers, and great-grandfathers. But the farmer-boy, aged fifty-seven, has come up from his work, and the happy family go in to dinner.

III.—EVENING.

A long summer noon of rest follows dinner—rest to every body except the women, who are clashing and clattering in the kitchen over the piles of dishes. It was easier for them, says Farmer Jones, when a big pan or two held the "boiled vittles," and pewter platters had not been superseded by delf. But the women, we fancy, would scarce consent to go back to that practice of the "good old times." They appreciate neatness and comfort.

All the others are resting, and the women soon will be. The horses and mules are munching in the stalls, the pigs lay prone, triple-cased in mud; the cows are ruminating in the shade, or up to their bodies in water if they can find it. The dog is as near asleep on the porch as the flies will suffer, waiting for his master; and little Pet is spread out on the rug inside the door, her cheeks rosy with health and heat, and her fresh lips breathing out ambrosia. But her dreams are a little troubled. That last bit of pie haunts her. She thinks, just as she is about to eat it, it changes to a father, and then a grandfather, and then a great-great-great-grandfather. She kicks, and, rubbing her eyes, awakes just as Farmer Jones comes stumping through to find his way to the porch again, and to wonder at people's laziness. When he was young he is sure it was not so; and the sum-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

mers were hotter then, and the winters were colder when he was a boy. Heigh-ho, Farmer Jones! That is the old story that your father told and his father before him. The new helps which every generation brings, in the form of machinery, give each successive race more rest, and, relieving the body, confer upon the mind more and more of activity. So always mote it be! till our descendants find a time when wood, and iron, and steam, and electricity, shall give human muscles perpetual holiday!

And now the rays of the westering sun begin to fall vertically on the hoping earth, the thirsty earth, which longs for the evening dews. The mowing-machine has resumed its clatter, the horse-rake has begun its sweeping, and mounds of fragrant hay cast their perfume on the air. Farmer Jones wonders that people can be in such a hurry with their "hauling in." In his time it was never so. But he forgets that, being without the potent helps which the present farmers have, the old ones could not have harvested quick if they would.

The old man takes his accustomed place upon the porch again. He settles down with more dead weight into the chair than he was won't to do, and he has less alacrity in tilting back to the native American position. His feet are raised to their perch, one by one, with more effort; and when he is fixed at last he wonders now, sometimes, how he shall get on his feet again. To-day the wonder is greater. He is dreadful stiff, he says. "It was that hearty dinner."

And it was a hearty dinner, and never to be forgotten—hearty not merely in the matter of meat and drink, though of that there was enough—hearty not only in the enjoyment of these good things, though all, from Farmer Jones down to little Pet, partook their share; and Watch, at his master's elbow, was not forgotten.

But it was hearty in the outgush of affection; it was hearty in the eloquence of love in old Farmer Jones, who seemed to have renewed his youth; it was hearty in the reverent and worshipful affection of grandmother, who, to the latest hour, loved, honored, and obeyed, as she had promised to do over sixty years ago; it was hearty in the thoughtful care of the younger for their elders; it was hearty in the love of God, acted rather than obtrusively declared, for it was spoken in the thankful eyes of all who said Amen! to the grace of Farmer Jones.

"The hoary head is a crown of glory," said the elder son, as they walked forth.

"When it is found in the way of righteousness," answered the next.

"As I am sure our father's is," the youngest added.

And they took their way over the fields, to tell and to hear what had been done on the old home-farm, and what still remained to do.

"Great plans those boys are contriving," said Farmer Jones, as he watched them from the porch. "But boys will be boys." Very proud was Farmer Jones of his sons, though inwardly resolved to cross-question them at tea-time, and to convict them out of their own mouths of folly in all they had been scheming.

Yet he must confess that something had been done. When these "boys" were boys trees all around bounded a narrow view. Now, here and there only a copse dotted the immediate landscape, while in the distance stood the bit of forest which Farmer Jones had resolutely preserved for winter fuel, allowing one-twentieth only to be cut in every year, that in twenty years they might begin again at the first cut, according to the old traditionary practice.

But of all the trees the old man's eye rested oftenest and most complacently on one nearest the porch. He had planted it on the very morning after the home-coming with his young bride. Then with two fingers she had held it straight while he filled in the earth. It had grown beyond all the rest, and its broad limbs cast the shadow under which he sat with honest yet grateful pride. "Every thing did always grow that she touched," he said. And just then, as always at the same hour she did, grandmother came to look at him, in her spruce after-dinner cap.

"Do you think I'm in my dotage? To be sure I recollect, and never can forget while you put me in mind of it every day."

"You never will grow wise and staid," he said; "you are the silly, little young thing that you always were!" And he gently drew her to him, nothing loth, and kissed the roots of her gray hair; carefully respecting the frills of the spotless cap. Away she trotted; and Farmer Jones forgot himself, and closed his eyes on the tree of his bridal troth.

IV.—NIGHT.

The threatening clouds gather, and the distant lightning drops its fiery lines on the black horizon. Hurry! hurry! people all! For the first commotion among the trees whispers of the coming tempest; and little eddies of dust begin to dance, and the earliest dead foliage of summer to rustle along the path. Hay must be housed, and windows closed, and numberless things cared for, before the coming storm. The "boys" are hastening homeward, but stop, in the glee of youth, to help pitch on the hay. Hurry! Hurry up the loaded wagon! There, it is safely housed.

Quick with the kine that their creamy treasure be not wasted. Now all is done, and grandmother has finished her hunt for eggs. The whole family turn to the house for shelter, just as the first heavy drops come, in big plashes, on their heads.

What ails the dog? A long and piteous howl comes from the porch; a howl eloquent of surprise and terror. And as they draw near they hear the voice of little Pet: "Grandpa! up! up! it begins to rain! Up! you must go in, for grandma says so!" But Farmer Jones will never rise from his seat again. The faithful

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

chair is crushed at last, and the floor has given way. None know at what moment the stroke of death fell upon him. But the last summons has reached him at a fitting time; just as he had "counted up his mercies" and thanked the God who had been his guardian ever since he leaned on his mother's breasts.

They bear him indoors, and hastily prepare a couch upon the floor. The windows are opened wide, for all are agasp for air.

A thunder crash, and with it sheets of fire which wrap them as a mantle. And all the world outside may be traced in black lines on the fiery ground; but THE TREE nearest the porch shines in green and brilliant gold. Grandmother has turned her head on her husband's breast; but he rises in the death-struggle, "There, wife, there!" and they sink down together.

Crash again! and the old tree is riven from the topmost point down to the earth. All are stunned and thrown to the ground with cries of God have mercy! But they must rise; and lights are brought, for the dark night has closed in on the storm. The clouds deluge the earth with rain, and a horror of great darkness is upon them. But the thunder peals no more.

Farmer Jones is dead. His faithful old wife looks up with a wild, earnest look as they whisper. She knows that when they open the earth for his last rest where he lieth she will lie.

And so it proved. Under the shadow of the old church, where they worshiped, bride and bridegroom, sixty years ago, is a stone with this legend:

LOVELY AND PLEASANT IN THEIR LIVES, IN DEATH THEY WERE NOT DIVIDED.

All are sad, but not sorrowful, as those without hope; and time will soon reconcile them to the death which waited till there seemed no longer reason for delay. Little Pet looks fearful, and clings close to her mother when the sky is overcast. Time, too, will remove her wayward fears. But when she comes to be a grandmother, if she does not startle her young listeners with weird fancies and strange tales, then are there no such things as early impressions and the traces of childish terrors.

The old dog drooped and died. They found him one morning stiff at the root of the blasted tree, and there they buried him. The tree is felled and worked up, every scrap, into memorials of the couple who began life with its youth and died when the tree died. They lived long and saw good days, and their children call them blessed.

DRIFTING.

ALL over the banks the wild vines crept,
With shining pansies and tangled weeds,
And close to the margin the lily slept,
Nodding the while 'mid the thick-set reeds
That ever replied to the wind with a sigh,
While over them hung the dragon-fly.

Adown the stream 'twixt the reedy shores,
Where the silvery willows in clusters grew,
We floated onward with idle oars
Under a heaven of perfect blue:
And ever above us the clouds went by,
Milky white in the azure sky.

Sometimes the wandering winds would bring
The scent of clover from either side;
Sometimes a bird, unseen, would sing
As we drifted along on the voiceless tide;
Or sometimes a silvery minnow leap
Where the reeds and lilies were wrapt in sleep.

Noiselessly parted our sharpened prow
The purple waves of the beautiful stream;
Ah! well I remember even now
How, in a kind of lotus dream,
We floated on past the reedy shores
Of that silent river with idle oars.

The sun hung low in a crimson sky,
Ever since noon had we drifted along;
Now the sober twilight was drawing nigh;
The wood-bird was singing her vesper song;
And myriad voices of insects filled
The reedy shores, where all else was stilled.

Never a stray breath stirred the reeds,
Never a shudder over them crept;
Motionless all were the pansies and weeds—
The cream-white lilies entrancéd slept;
And the willows, flushed with the sun's last gleam,
Hung listlessly over the voiceless stream.

Quickly the sweet day drew to a close,
On a sudden the great sun seemed to swoon;
Over the eastern hill-tops rose,
Red and swollen, the harvest moon;
And the twilight lingered, sombre and brown,
Till the solemn night on swift wings came down.

We are drifting still, but Life is the stream
Down which we pass on our certain way,
Sometimes at night, with no friendly gleam,
And sometimes on through the perfect day;
But in shadow or sunshine I know that we
Are drifting out toward the open sea.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SANTA ROSA OF LIMA.

"IT never rains in Lima;" but there had been cold, damp, palpable mists called garuas for days, and the sun had not been visible except momentarily for weeks. The streets were pasty with mud, and the sidewalks were slimed all over as if with dark-colored tallow in a state of semi-liquescence. The walls of the first-floor rooms dripped with damp. Boots and shoes were mottled green and yellow with mould. Inkstands sprouted luxuriant crops of feathery fungus. The sheets and towels were moist; and the knobs of doors and the very forks and spoons, fresh from the kitchen, were clammy. Juan and Antonia appeared with swollen and bandaged faces and complained of dolores in every limb; while their worthy employers winced under flying twinges which they considered themselves too young to suspect of being rheumatism, and tried to deceive themselves by calling neuralgia.

Now there are no fire-places in Lima, and only the poor device of brasiers, wherewith to drive off the damp. So one has the alternative of becoming morsy like a cypress-tree in a Southern swamp, or risking asphyxia from carbonic acid gas. No wonder the last of the Incas was elated when he heard that the Spaniards had established their capital on the banks of the Rimac, in a spot reeking with vapors, and where the usually-beneficent sun refuses to shine for half the year.

The morning of the 30th of August, however, broke bright and clear, and its rays brought light and cheerfulness into the dreary vaults within which we had been immured for weeks, meditating upon the justifiability of suicide. The buzzards, which are the city scavengers and sanitary police of Lima, instead of stalking gloomily along the fetid azequias in the middle of the streets, now repaired to the tops of the buildings, and in long rows and with outspread wings, waited patiently for the sun to dry their mildewed feathers. Juan and Antonia stretched themselves in the warmest part of the corridor to catch every ray of caloric reflected from its walls as a means of driving the dolores from their tortured bones.

The bells of the churches, which had sounded before as if suffering with severe catarrh, now pealed out clear and joyously—and all the more loudly and joyously because this was the fiesta of Santa Rosa, the patrona of Lima and the Americas, whose anniversary is celebrated with a pomp befitting her distinction as the only female ever canonized in America. She was a native of Lima, and there she lived and there she died. No wonder, then, that her shrines are richer, her jewels more costly, and the ceremonies in her honor more showy than those vouchsafed to any of the multitudinous saints, male and female, whose names jostle each other in the Romish calendar.

But before beginning to talk of Santa Rosa, we must premise that Lima was the richest, the most bigoted, perhaps it would be safe to say, the most profligate of all the seats of Spanish vice-regal power in America. No other capital could compete with it in the number of its churches and convents, and the munificence of their endowment. The Inquisition had there a scope and power such as it never possessed in Mexico or Santa Fé. During its existence no less than fifty-nine persons were burned alive in the Plaza de la Inquisicion, where now stands the fine bronze statue of Bolivar, and which is called to-day Plaza de la Independencia. There were eighteen others burned there en estatua; that is to say, represented by figures or effigies —a mode to which probably the originals had least objection. Nine unfortunates died in advance, and so only their bones were consumed; while eighty-six suffered confiscation of their property, and four hundred and fifty-eight were beaten with whips.

Now Lima has a cathedral and seventy-six churches in a population little, if at all, exceeding one hundred thousand souls. The cathedral was founded by Francisco Pizarro, the Conqueror of Peru, and the original edifice cost $594,000. Owing to earthquakes and other retarding causes it was ninety years in building. The present structure was raised on the ruins of the first, destroyed in 1746, and is as imposing in appearance as it is unsubstantial in fact. It contains many paintings of merit, and among them one of Veronica by Murillo. In the vaults beneath are shown what are alleged to be the remains of Pizarro. The church and convent of San Francisco are said to have cost $15,000,000, and to have had a corresponding endowment. This single convent once had nearly as many inmates as are now contained in all the religious establishments of the city, where, it is estimated, there are at present only 1736 priests, monks, and nuns—a sad falling off from the 6000 said to have existed in the earlier half of the last century! In all the various churches, convents, and monasteries (we are bound to be statistical for the nonce), there are celebrated annually 449 fiestas or festivals, and there are chanted 39,607 masses, of which 19,506 are paid for by endowments. We must not forget to mention that there are in Lima no less than eighty-one private chapels, duly "licensed," wherein the proprietors may do worship at their leisure, and with gratifying exclusiveness, at the small cost of $14 50 each.

We have mentioned Santa Rosa as the patron saint of Lima, and it would naturally be supposed that she is the richest. But Nuestra Señora del Rosario, one of the Avatars of the Virgin, has, or had, a personal endowment far greater. Her altar and its adornments comprised 1475 pounds of gold and silver, and her jewels embraced 1406 diamonds, 620 rubies, 1179 emeralds, 121 fine pearls, besides amethysts, topazes, and other less costly gems. She could have appeared with becoming effulgence in the presence of a queen or empress; and she is reputed rich still. But even among the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google faithful the genuineness of the diamonds in her tiara may be questioned with, at most, a deprecatory shrug of the shoulder.

Apart from Sundays there are observed, with equal strictness, no less than forty-eight fiestas, or days wherein it is enjoined by the Church, or established by custom, that no secular work shall be performed, and on which days the public offices are supposed to be closed. The disarrangement of business and demoralization of industry consequent on this waste of time can scarcely be computed. Drunkenness and dissipation are fostered by idleness, which finds its pretext in religion, and the day succeeding the fiesta is oftenest taken up in the process of convalescence, which, in turn, is pleaded as an excuse for lack of energy and efficiency. Public necessity and the requirements of civilization have consequently encroached somewhat on old customs and rules, and the fiesta, be it Sunday or otherwise, is generally observed only as a half holiday; that is to say, many of the shops, etc., are kept open until noon. This relieves somewhat the burdens imposed by superstition and custom. The days of the fiestas of "Santa Rosa, Nuestra Señora de las Mercedes" (the Patrona of the army of Peru), however, admit of no curtailment, but must be faithfully observed, under penalty of popular displeasure, if not of intervention by the police.

Santa Rosa de Santa Maria, who, before her beatification, bore the name of Isabel Flores, was born in Lima in the year 1586, and died there in 1617. Her parents, to use the popular biographical formula, "were poor but honest." Her sanctity was manifested early, and when she was only six years of age she did voluntary penance and consecrated herself to God, taking with supernatural prescience an oath of perpetual virginity. She underwent the ordeal of examination by the fathers of the Church, to whom her devotion became known through popular report at the age of sixteen, and was admitted to consecrated orders. When the French, English, and other pirates, who infested the Pacific coast, burned Casma, sacked Santa, and threatened every sea-port and principal town of Peru, she prayed that they might reach Lima, so that she might show them by her example how a Peruvian virgin might suffer outrage and cruelty—resigned and humble, relying on her faith, and dying with the exclamation, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do!" But her aspirations in this respect were disappointed. The pirates never reached Lima, and Santa Rosa died, at the age of thirty-one years, "in the odor of sanctity," leaving behind her a name for humility, patience, charity, and good works which exacted the reverence of all, and led priests and people, Church and State, archbishop and viceroy, to ask for her, at Rome, the honors of canonization. It is said that when her merits and claims were urged on the Pope he exclaimed, "A virgin in Lima! I should as soon expect a shower of roses from Heaven as to find in America a criolla of such virtue and sanctity!" On the instant—so runs the legend—the ceiling opened, and the Pope found himself standing knee-deep in a bed of roses of celestial origin. He comprehended the significance of the miracle, and in 1671, fifty years after the death of the Virgin of Lima, she was canonized, and declared Patrona, not alone of her native city but of all America.

The day of the fiesta of Santa Rosa, as we have already said, broke bright and clear. The bells of the churches rang out joyfully, and the streets were gay with the gaudy dresses of Cholas and Sambitas, hastening, with their more sombre-robed white sisters, to the special masses said on this anniversary in the cathedral and the leading churches. At ten o'clock the booming of cannon announced that the effigy of Santa Rosa had started from its shrine in the church of Santo Domingo, and was on its way to the cathedral, where the civil and military authorities were assembled to do her reverence.

It must be premised that the Saints in Lima make promenades on stated occasions, and exchange visits with ceremonial exactness. San Pedro sometimes calls on San Augustin, and passes the night with him in his own temple, where they are stationed fronting each other, one on each side of the great altar. It is said that bread and wine are placed on a table between them, so that during the weary night the duties of hospitality may not be neglected.

Santa Rosa is not without her social qualities, and relishes a call on her sisters when her fiesta comes round. The line of march is always duly announced in advance, and every one knows through what streets she will pass, and in what churches she will call. So that the faithful have ample time to congregate in the latter, and lookers-on have opportunity to diplomatize among friends and acquaintances for balconies or windows on the shaded side of the savory streets through which the Patrona of America takes her promenade. We were fortunate enough to secure a balcony to ourselves, in the Cala de los Plateros, at a point about midway in the itinerary.

Santa Rosa entered the cathedral with more than feminine exactness at the appointed hour, under a musketry salute from the soldiers drawn up in the plaza. Precisely what happened inside the cathedral I am unable to say, for the crush in the churches on such occasions is too great to be lightly encountered. It was past one o'clock, after patient waiting for more than an hour in our especial balcony, before the file of soldiers and the band of music, heading the procession of the Saint, showed themselves in the street of the Plateros.

While waiting we had ample opportunities of observing the freaks and fancies of a sight-seeing crowd in Lima. Every one, old and young, was in his best, and all the boys were rich in fire-crackers and spiteful little cohetas that only rose as high as the house-tops, and were not at all particular about driving into windows and balconies. Why they should be let off in the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

daytime will probably be a puzzling question for American youth. We can only say it is cosa de España, the "custom of the country." Little hustling fights come off now and then, with generally no more serious consequence than the plunging of one or other of the combatants into the foul azequia.

Immediately in front of us was a tall structure of canes, a cross between a Chinese pagoda and a Gothic church, and which we soon discovered was an elaborate feu d'artifice, connecting by what appeared to be thin cords, with a series of gaudy paper globes suspended by ropes across the street.

Now if there be a thing in the world utterly incomprehensible to the Spanish-American mind, it is a procession; that is to say, an orderly assembly of people walking in file with even step and observing the cadences of the music. The procession of Santa Rosa was no exception to the huddle and confusion that characterize all the processions, secular or religious, that are to be seen in Lima, Mexico, or Guatemala. The soldiers that headed it, and the band of music that followed, preserved some semblance of order; but the rest was a surging, tumultuous crowd, in the centre of which, tossing like a ship in a tempestuous sea, was the ark on which was borne the effigy of the Patrona of all the Americas.

Imagine a long and rather broad table or platform covered with scarlet velvet, studded with golden stars, edged heavily with bullion fringe, and falling on every side to the very ground. In the centre of this, standing on a silver globe supported by a low pedestal, was the figure of Santa Rosa, of full size, bearing on her head a golden crown blazing with jewels, beneath which her glossy curling hair of intensest black streamed down almost to her heels. Her dress was of blue velvet, crusted and stiff with gems and gold, spreading outward like an inverted Δ, and faced with white satin. In one hand was held a golden cross, and the other, loaded with jewels, was lifted as if in benediction. Her face was in the rosiest style of modern French wax-work, and looked in the bright light as if newly colored and varnished. Two angels, standing behind the figure, held a crimson canopy supported by golden rods over her head. The whole apparatus was carried on the shoulders of relays of stalwart cholos and negroes, who were concealed beneath the velvet covering of the platform, and who dodged out and under, wiping their perspiring and glistening faces and clamoring for pisco whenever the Saint halted, which she did at every corner and the middle of every square.

Following the music were a number of men smoking cigars, with which they lighted the cohetas that it was their exclusive business to let off from stores of the same carried in the arms of attendants, thus keeping up an irregular fusillade. A score or so of little girls in white and tinsel and crowned with flowers, designed to represent angels, came next; but the rush and crush was so great that the spirits of darkness, in the shape of stalwart chola or negro nurses, were fain to rush in to protect them and soothe the frightened babes, who, on the whole, made very sorry and slobbering representations of the angelic hosts. Immediately in front of the platform were devotees swinging censers, or trying to do so, but with poor success, among the thronging, disorderly mass that crowded around them. Many, and by no means saintly, were their objurgations, and more than one persistent intruder got a cracking blow on his head from the silver censers.

The procession stopped in front of us in a condition that can only be described as "a mess." The wonderful Chino-Gothico structure was let off, and fizzed and banged, and threw out a cloud of smoke and a fearful odor of damp powder, driving the ladies from the balconies, while the gamins and cholos shouted and shrieked (there is no hurrah in Spanish), and lent the whole power of their lungs to augment the hubbub. By-and-by the structure fizzed and banged itself out, leaving only a blackened frame-work of canes, which the negroes caught up and trotted away with adown the street, where there was a perspective of similar noisy and sulphurous contrivances. The ladies emerged from their retreats and resumed their places, and Santa Rosa recommenced her paseo. Just as she got under the paper globes, the object of which we could not before divine, they suddenly exploded with a loud report, scattering bushels of roses over the Saint and the platform on which she stood. We thought this the most interesting and satisfactory part of the performance, and speculated on the value of the adornments of the effigy until the motley crowd drifted away in the direction of San Augustin.

It may be satisfactory to a portion of our readers to know that a capitalist of our party who had the benefit of an opera glass in forming his estimates was heard to say that he was willing "to advance Santa Rosa a hundred thousand dollars on her wardrobe, in case she should ever find herself in need of ready money." The Guia de los Forasteros tells us authoritatively that the silver adornments of the altar and litter of Santa Rosa amount in weight to 31,000 ounces, or about a ton, equal to $40,000 in value.

Anciently the procession of Santa Rosa was a much more formal affair. The standards of the various provinces of Peru, with the arms of their various capitals, were carried before her image, while the lomeros or mountaineers came down in great numbers, bearing bouquets and wreaths of flowers. But in common with all the ceremonies of the Church in Lima those in honor of Santa Rosa have degenerated, and the press of the capital calls openly for the abolition of all processions of the Saints as absurd and debasing in their character and tendencies. None of them have the least solemnity, and only give pretexts for getting together a mob of people and for burning a quantity of coarse powder. A Lima writer says of them: "They are marked

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

by no acts of devotion or demonstration of respect, but a certain effrontery or abandon which is offensive in any public exhibition, but especially in a ceremony purporting to be religious. Laughter, jests, and conversation free and often licentious, are not happy features in a congregation of people, got together for any object."

During the procession of San Augustin, owing to the stumbling of one of its bearers, the effigy of the saint fell over, revealing only an attenuated frame-work of canes beneath his rich robes, whereupon the crowd shouted boisterously, "All head and no body!" which ejaculation was quickly put in a couplet and chanted during the remainder of the performance.

Peru is no exception to the rest of Spanish America in this, that the Church fails to meet the requirements of emancipated intelligence, or to satisfy the religious aspirations of its best and most exemplary men. The churches are chiefly frequented by women, while among their fathers, husbands, and brothers religious observances receive little more than toleration. All agree that the Church needs reform, but they see no way of effecting it, and seek to excuse their listlessness by accepting, as a matter of course, that "it is good for the plebe" or populace—with whom, however, it is a pretext, excuse, or consolation, but never a restraint.

The decline of the power and influence of the Church in Lima, since the independence, is only imperfectly indicated by the fact that within that period ten convents and monasteries, having endowments to the amount of $1,000,000, have been suppressed and their edifices and sites dedicated to other purposes. . A high school occupies the convent of Guadeloupe; the college of San Marcos has taken possession of the greater portion of the grand cloisters of San Francisco; that of San Carlos has supplanted the Jesuits; San Juan de Dios is a railway station, and the principal market of the city stands where once was the convent of Santa Catalina. The bigotry of the people has given away in a greater relative degree than these facts would indicate, and marriages are now as frequent in Lima between Catholics and Protestants as in any part of the world, in proportion to their respective numbers. The archbishop has formally recognized all marriages celebrated by the diplomatic representatives of Protestant countries. There is a Protestant church and congregation in the capital and another in Callao, and the Protestant cemetery at Bella Vista is respected equally with the Catholic cemetery in its neighborhood.

Conventual restrictions are far less rigid than before, and are becoming less so every day. In some of the convents, however, as in that of Santa Rosa, the exclusion of its inmates from the world is complete, and access next to impossible, except to those who enter its doors never to return.

This convent was founded by royal cedula in 1704, the number of nuns being fixed at thirty-three, who were to assume the dress of the Dominicans, and observe the rules of San Augustin. Four hundred thousand dollars were raised for its endowment, apart from gifts of buildings, jewels, etc. A lady, wife of General Galdames, contributed upward of $130,000 to the establishment, reserving only for herself and her descendants the privilege of naming a single nun who should be permitted to enter without payment of the "dot" or dowry. Its first prioress was the daughter of the Viceroy Monclora, who escaped from the vice-regal palace during the night to assume the habit of the Patrona of Lima.

Entrance to any of the convents is prohibited to men, except the confessor, who usually combines the character of priest and physician; and access is equally denied to women, except when in "a delicate condition" they happen to fix their minds on that object. It is assumed that, under these circumstances, they must be indulged in every wish and whim for prudential reasons. But even then it is requisite to make formal application to the archbishop, who considers the case; and if satisfied that the request should be complied with, issues a formal order to that effect, and names, as a general rule, the confessor of the convent to accompany the applicant. The concession was made, for the first time in many years, to myself.

It should be premised, however, that the following papers, lawfully stamped, had taken due and formal course previous to the visit:

"Ilustrisimos Señor, el Arzobispo de Lima:

"Doña ——, resident of this capital, appears in this manner before you, and, with due respect, sets forth:

"That she is a Roman Catholic, citizen of the United States of North America; that she is in this city with her husband —— of the United States; that she wishes to become acquainted with the monastic institutions of her sex in Lima, unknown in the United States, although all religions enjoy there complete toleration. Being unable to fulfill her desire, except by your permission, she appeals to your kindness to concede to her the privilege to visit the convent of Santa Rosa, in company with two respectable ladies of this city who have hospitably entertained her, and who will accompany her to facilitate her communication with those she seeks to visit. For these reasons she appeals to your charity, illustrious Sir, to concede the request which she now respectfully makes."

To this request, in due time, came the following response:

"Archiepiscopal Palace, Lima.

"In view of the solicitation of Señora Doña ——, and attending to the reasons therein set forth to us, and to those not expressed, I concede permission to the aforesaid Señora Doña ——, and to her only, to visit the Convent of Santa Rosa, and to enter its cloisters, but without any companions whatever, and without remaining there longer than necessary, and to this end I designate the Cura, rector of the parish of Santa Ana, to accompany her in her visit.

"By order of the archbishop, my superior."

It was on a morning as bright and clear as that which had ushered in the day of the Fiesta of Santa Rosa, that Señor T——, the gentleman who had undertaken the negotiations at the archiepiscopal palace, appeared at the Legation to accompany us to the doors of the convent, which were to open to me, on presentation of the somewhat portentous pass of the excel-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

lent archbishop, who is one of the most venerable, as he certainly is the richest, man in Peru. Our course led us from the Calle de Coca up the street of Botica de San Pedro, or "Shop of Saint Peter," to the corner of the Street of Pilita (or "Little Fountain") de Santa Rosa, all the way by the side of one of the azequias, or open sewers, which run through every street intersecting the city from east to west. Nothing can be more offensive to sight and smell than these azequias, which receive most of the filth and garbage from the town. Buzzards line them on both sides, or, taking up the rôle of aquatic birds, wade along their course, struggling for whatever bit of offal there may be floating in the current. The sidewalks are narrow, so narrow that two people can not walk abreast. The houses have few windows on the street, and the shops on the ground-floor receive light and air only through their open doors. Here is a tailor's shop; the patron or principal occupies a chair; but most of his assistants or apprentices sit on the bare earthen floor. Next to it is a picanteria, or cook-shop, wherein are served picantes, or dishes in which, whatever other elements there may be, aji, or red pepper, predominates, and which are certainly appetizing in odor. It is not best to be critical on the score of cleanliness in Lima.

We are jostled, very nearly something worse, by two-score donkeys, with panniers holding bricks or lime. They prefer trotting along with their unshod feet on the sidewalk rather than over the cobble-stones of the highway. Señor T——, who carries a big cane, fortunately stations himself chivalrously in front, and turns aside the assinine array. But next comes a stalwart cholo, with a sort of box on his head full of cakes and sweetmeats, made by the denizens of some convent and bearing its name, the quality of which he announces at the top of his voice, while whirling his head in an indiscriminate manner, dangerous to the passer-by, who may be obliged to look for his hat in the gutter. A little further on, the narrow sidewalk is obstructed by piles of what appear to be alabaster blocks of uniform size, but varying tints, white, yellow, and pink. These are cubes of mineral salt, cut from cliffs of the same in the interior. At the corner is a fountain where a dozen cholas or sambas are jostling to see which shall first fill her cantero, or jar, and who force us into the street.

Finally we reach the street of the Pilita de Santa Rosa. A huge door opens into a high square room, paved with stones sloping to the middle. A low stone bench runs around it, cold and damp. The walls are hung with rude paintings, dim and mildewed, among which is one, archaic in style, bearing the name of Santa Rosa. In one corner is a turn-table, so arranged that things may be sent in and out without exposing the interior ever so slightly. A bottle, a bunch of vegetables, a little package of fire-wood, and a basket of fruit are passed in, and a dish of cakes or sweetmeats is at the same time passed out. A lady, dressed in black, with a lustrous-eyed little girl at her side, asks for some inmate, and then plants herself patiently on the cold stone bench, draws the brightly-dressed little girl to her side, and sits still and silent as a statue. She has sent a message to a daughter or sister within and awaits a reply, perhaps the opportunity of exchanging a word or two with her through the veil of the wicket. The turn-table is constantly in motion. An old man, ragged enough and forlorn, comes up, fumbles a while in his dilapidated pockets, takes out an orange and a chirimoya, puts them on the table, gives two smart raps with his knuckles on the board, which promptly whirls them out of sight. The old man crosses himself, bows to us, and goes his way. Has he a daughter within?

The excellent Cura of Santa Ana did not keep us waiting long. A man of fifty, robust, with a clear complexion and rosy cheeks, not suggestive of midnight vigils, and with the air and bearing of a caballero as he is, he saluted me gracefully, and his friend, Señor T——, cordially. Apologizing for being a few minutes behind time, he led the way to a heavy door opening out of the stone-paved ante-room, and gave a peculiar rap, which was responded to by a withdrawing of bolts and a rattling of chains, indicative of the strictness with which the devotees of Santa Rosa guard their sanctuary.

I entered with the Cura, and the heavy door of Santa Rosa closed behind me with a sepulchral reverberation. For the moment I comprehended how it must sound to those who heard it close with a full consciousness that neither in life nor death it would open for them again. The door led to a narrow passage, paved with stones, long, damp, and dark, with no light except the uncertain horizontal reflections which streamed in from an open court at its further extremity. Coming from the blaze of day I was for the moment so blinded that I did not make out the figures of eight or ten nuns, dressed in black and deeply veiled, until the clear voice of the Cura announced:

"Mothers, here is the child of the Church, whom its visible authority permits to visit you."

I felt a soft hand pressed into mine, and a low voice said, "Come, daughter, with us."

A few steps brought us into the outer court-yard of the convent, surrounded by a broad Moresque corridor, with a fountain in the centre and full of shrubs and flowers, mostly roses, for which, in respect of variety, beauty, and abundance, Lima is without rival. From the arches depended cages of birds, chiefly canaries, which chirped and sang in gay competition with the melodious plash of the falling waters.

Inside the corridor, the roof of which was a quaint arabesque of wood-work, brilliantly painted, the dreary succession of plain doors leading to the cells of the nuns was relieved by intermediate paintings of various dates and merit, representing how the dead were raised, the wounded healed, the sick cured, and the lost restored through the intercession of Santa Rosa.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Here I had time and opportunity to survey my companions, at the head of whom was one who constantly tinkled a small silver bell. This, as I afterward ascertained, was as a warning to the mothers—the inmates here are called mothers, not sisters—not to emerge from their cells while the visitor is passing. They were eight in number, a commission or committee, the Cura explained, deputed to conduct me through the convent.

I may here say that the "mothers" are all women of original high social position, and who have each brought an endowment of $3000 to the convent. They are exempt from all except religious service, and are waited on by lay-sisters, less fortunate than themselves, who, bringing no money into the establishment, are obliged to serve their more favored associates.

I was first conducted into the room in which it is alleged Santa Rosa died. It is small and dark, hung round with life-size pictures of the Saint, representing the various scenes of her life; her first communion, having her luxuriant hair cut off, because it was a thing of admiration and might stimulate pride; her penitences, and her death. On the spot where she died reposes a figure of herself, and on an altar in the same room are personal relics of the holy woman. Among them a finger nail.

Further on we came to a spacious marble bath for the nuns. Next we went to the chapel of the convent, not large, but tasteful, with splendid altars covered with rich and elaborate embroideries, the work of the nuns, whose position in the building on all public occasions is behind a close grating, through which they may see, but which the strongest eye fails to penetrate from the outside. There were several nuns in my escort who for forty years had had no other glimpses of the world which they had abjured than those they had caught through these inexorable bars. One or two had entered here while yet Peru was a dependency of Spain, and while Lima was the seat of the most brilliant and lavish of the vice-regal courts.

From the chapel I was conducted to the room of the Lady Superior, a tall woman, graceful in her simple garb, who received me with much courtliness. The apartment was scantily but neatly furnished. The bed in the corner was daintily neat, with a spotless coverlet and snowy curtains. An altar-piece against the wall supported a cross of ebony set in silver, and before it, on the brick floor, was spread a rug on which the devotee might kneel. The Lady Superior expressed surprise that I should speak Spanish, and asked many naïve questions about my country and its society. I need not say that geography and a knowledge of history are not among the highest of the accomplishments of the "mothers" of Santa Rosa. Not because they do not possess that spirit of inquiry so lauded in man, but contemned in woman as "feminine curiosity."

A little conversation soon made every one at her ease, and the little party became really sociable; so much so that I ventured to ask the Mother Superior to remove her veil.

"Ah, my child," she said, "it is against our rules. Besides, I am neither young nor pretty!"

I took up her hand, which was plump and soft and white, and expressed some doubt as to her statement. There was something of pleased consciousness, and probably a trace of vanity, in the manner in which her fair, white hand was withdrawn and concealed beneath her veil.

I asked if any of the sisters were as young as myself, and was told, "Yes," but with the complimentary assurance that "None were as pretty." I preferred to pronounce on the question myself, and persisted that really I could not think of leaving the convent with no more individualized impression of its inmates than that afforded by a series of long black veils. The Cura was consulted, and after some delay the sister regarded as youngest and prettiest was allowed to throw back her veil, but only for a moment, revealing the oval, colorless face, large black eyes, intense black hair, and the general typical features of the Limeñas. She was not over twenty, and notwithstanding some dental defects was really beautiful, as a faint blush rose to her cheeks under, I fear, my too steady gaze. A moment after the veil fell, never probably to be raised again before one not dedicated to the same shrine with its wearer.

I was troubled at the moment with a slight cough, which seemed to excite the sympathy of one of the nuns who had been most chatty and communicative, and who had kept close to my side from the moment of my entrance. She said she had had such a cough once, and had been given over to die; but as a last resource she had been sent up into the mountains to Tarma, the air of which is regarded as a specific against consumption. Here she had prayed to Santa Rosa for her restoration, which came speedily, and now she was back again in perfect health—"benedictions on the holy Santa Rosa!" The Cura, who is the physician as well as spiritual adviser of the convent, and who had attended her in his former capacity, rallied her a little about a still lurking desire to again get out into the world—a suggestion which she warmly repelled, being, as she said, "now doubly convinced that there was no happiness comparable with the calm and elevated content of conventual life."

Before leaving, delicate cakes and dulces, all made in the convent by the lay-sisters, were served, and the Mother Superior hung around my neck an elaborately-worked Agnus Dei, which not only had been made with her own hands, but which had been suspended, to give it especial sanctity, around the neck of the figure of Santa Rosa in the room where she died. This, she said, would be a comfort to me and a protection from the dangers of the long sea-journey to my native land. She added that the Sisters of Santa Rosa would all offer up for me a prayer morning and evening. With this assurance, tenderly spoken, I commenced my re-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

turn. The sun was bright in the court, and the fountain flashed and plashed among the shrubs and flowers, while the canaries piped cheerfully as we entered the corridor again. The noise, however, was only sufficient to make the solemn calm and silence palpable, and I comprehended how, with isolation and such surroundings, and after long and rapt contemplation of religious things, the human mind might be worked into a trance which is as akin to perfect repose as sleep is to death.

The "Mothers" followed me to the massive door and stood there, with folded hands in attitude of prayer, as the heavy bars were withdrawn and I passed out of their sight forever. When it closed I felt the involuntary pang which attends separation from friends, and hardly noticed the somewhat querulous "Well, I hope you have had a good time of it?" uttered by Ursa Major, who had been "cooling his heels," as he irreverently said, on the cold, damp pavement of the ante-room of the convent, "for two mortal hours."

A few moments after reaching home some of the dependents of the convent appeared with trays of cakes and dulces, and sticks of incense, as a last secuendo or memorial from the Sisters of Santa Rosa.

JOHN BRIGHT.

WEDNESDAY afternoon is, during the session of the British Parliament, in a certain sense, a consecrated time. Parliament sits five days of the week; of these Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, and Friday are the regular days in which practical John Bull attends to his practical affairs. On these days Parliament meets at four of the afternoon; goes through some technical matters; launches the order of the day. It then puts up some garrulous fellow who is known to hold an inevitable speech, to relieve himself of the same, while the members —with some respect for a quorum—go out continuously to dine in the dining-room connected with the building. After this the Commons return to their work in that post-prandial and conservative frame of mind which is essential to John Bull's affairs. It would be little short of revolutionary for England to permit any but after-dinner legislation; and there are not wanting political philosophers in Westminster Hall who indulge in full-paunched speculations as to the degree in which American radicalism is fed by the unfed condition in which the Congressmen meet at the Capitol in Washington. But Wednesday is the day on which Parliament has what is called a morning session; that is, it meets on that day at noon, and adjourns in time for the members to go home to a six o'clock dinner, if they are unfashionable enough to dine so early. And it has gradually become a habit to throw upon this Wednesday all those discussions, bills, etc., which John Bull holds to be impracticable and purely theoretical. If any one desires to know what visions English visionaries are indulging, let him obtain a seat—it will not be very difficult—in the Stranger's Gallery on Wednesday afternoon. Radicals who dream of abolishing capital punishment, or primogeniture, or have other wild Utopian projects, are accommodated by genial Premiers on these Wednesdays. So long as a project is supported by such a minority that it can not get beyond that morning session nobody is disturbed by it. The Treasury Bench dozes through the debate, which goes on dreamily under the perpetual twilight of the Hall, as if it were occurring in that Lotos-land where it is "always afternoon." True, all the great measures which are the ruling facts of England to-day were once Wednesday fancies; and there is a secret belief in every Englishman's breast that on those same afternoons the future policy and history of England are taking shape. But the governmental motto of the Eastern Hemisphere is "Apres nous le deluge," and so the visionaries are indulged, despite some misgivings.

On one of the Wednesday afternoons of the last session of Parliament there occurred a most significant and picturesque incident. The subject of the abolition of the law of primogeniture had been brought forward, in the form of a carefully-prepared bill; and though there was a thin House, it was evident that the advocates of that measure of reform had resolved to make an unusually strong push to carry it. As speech after speech came from the Radicals, and the flagrant injustice of a law by which one child was so often made rich while the rest of the family were beggared was put in most forcible terms, the House began to wake up, and the practical men began to feel very uneasy. Mr. Gladstone whispered to Sir George Grey, and Sir George—looking rather miserable—scanned the benches of his friends to see who could be put forward to defend the Constitution in this particular, ending his glance by catching a serene and subtle smile from Mr. Mill, which fell full upon his discomfort and very much intensified it. The Tories began to scent the Government's embarrassment, the source of which was that none of the Ministers present had come prepared to meet such an unusually obstinate siege as the dreamers were making, and none of them was well enough read up in the law of primogeniture and its history to resist the carefully-digested positions of the other side.

It was not that Mr. Gladstone and his friends were apprehensive that the proposition to abolish the laws of primogeniture would pass the House, nor even that they would have cared very particularly if it should; but it was one which every Ministry is under the necessity of resisting until it has a large enough party to take it beyond the Wednesday phase; and their present misery was that they were likely to make themselves ridiculous, and Disraeli and his friends happy, by a wretchedly weak and inadequate defense of a British institution. Their Attorney-General, Sir Roundell Palmer, was at that moment engaged in the Courts in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

a most important case: he was resisting the claim of Mrs. Ryves to be a Princess Royal of England—a claim which involved the legitimacy of Queen Victoria! There is no doubt that the Queen and her family were exceedingly anxious while this trial lasted; as well they might be, who knew even so much as they did about the habits of their immediate ancestors; and that the Attorney-General was required to watch and conduct the case with extreme care. It was, however, necessary that he should be notified to come at once into the House of Commons to meet and answer John Bright.

Sir Roundell Palmer came in straight from the court-room, without even having had time to change his costume; so he walked up habited in the hideous wig and gown with which he had just been vindicating royal legitimacy and the innocence of the Georges, and took his place to defend the ancient rights of primogeniture, against which John Bright was leveling one of the most ponderous of the many hard blows which he has dealt against the defenses of the indefensible—which in England are the strongliest built of all defenses, as indeed they have need to be.

At that moment I suppose it would have been impossible to find two figures more exactly representative of the political forces struggling in Great Britain than those two men. One might almost have imagined that the genius of England was devising for that afternoon a masque of her Past and her Future. Sir Roundell Palmer, Knight, whose very name is a reminiscence of the Crusades, whose face and form are the average of the filtrated and thinned-out Norman, wearing the wig and gown of a past epoch to defend the appropriate traditional laws of the same epoch, was, to his very finger-tips, a type of antiquated, out-grown, bloodless England.

To any who have seen and heard John Bright I need not say how completely the voice, manner, physique, and entire character of the great English Middle Class are, as it were, incarnate in him. His very name is more that of the English Radical than "Felix Holt." In his plain black citizen's dress, well-built, standing squarely, handsome, with clear-cut features, with voice sound to the faintest tone of it, every sentence that he uttered was as a strong and solid piece of granite. Without any haste or trouble, with perfect certainty of conviction, he built up and buttressed his argument against the laws of primogeniture, so that there could not have been, by any possibility, a single person present who did not see the entire injustice of those laws, and the positive truth of every position which the Coming England assumed toward the Crumbling England.

Sir Roundell's wig and gown replied. They gave no argument at all. "We are; we intend to remain as long as we can." The fourth article of the wondrous creed discovered by Teufelsdröckh is—"There is safety in a swallow-tail." So argued wig and gown: if you find the English people wearing swallow-tails or primogeniture laws, be sure, gentlemen, that there were good, honestly-selfish reasons for the original adoption of such tails and laws. Are Englishmen in the habit of doing things for no advantage at all to property? Then beware how you touch any thing adopted for an advantage until you are sure that no further advantage can be got out of it. Justice? Every thing is just that is for England's advantage. This—freely rendered, I admit—was Sir Roundell's defense of primogeniture; which, however, was neatly begowned and bewigged with precedent and learned citation.

What such a man as John Bright said against the same I need not quote here, where my object is to present the man, and not any particular debate. But there was one thing with which he incidentally startled the House of Commons which deserves mention. When, in the full thunder of his denunciation of that spirit of injustice which gave all the wealth of a man dying intestate to the eldest son — injuring him as much as it wronged the younger—he quoted a son of a nobleman as having said to him, "I think we younger sons are treated damned badly!" This sentence, containing a word which it is unparliamentary even to quote in either House of Parliament, was uttered by the sturdy Quaker with so much gravity, and it was such a natural part of what he was saying, that it was only after a minute or two that the members began to bethink them that Mr. Bright had been saying something unusual and not altogether proper. But all sat still, and the orator went on without interruption to the end.

A noisy Tory Irishman—Whiteside—then alluded to the singular and unusual language which had been used by the member for Birmingham; but he saw a smile on the face of the House which looked as if it might blossom to a laugh, and dropped the matter. A leading man in the House—Disraeli, I think—said to Mr. Mill afterward that there were but two men in Parliament from whom the use of such a phrase would have been tolerated: John Bright and the Bishop of Oxford.

To my mind this humorous criticism of Disraeli's—for the truth of which I have the best authority—is also pregnant. I believe it expresses the exact position of John Bright before the Commons of England, and the secret of his strength. As it would be felt that in every phrase, however casual, which such a Church-possessed prelate as the Bishop of Oxford could utter before the Parliament there would be found, not a private but a Church utterance, so every sentence of John Bright is referred beyond the man to certain seething elements working among the people. John Bright is indeed hated in Parliament by a majority of it, and hated with an intensity that is cowardly. He is hated not only because he is a remorseless enemy of that which a majority in Parliament treasures most—with precisely that hatred which in America an old slaveholder felt for an aboli-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tionist; but also because he has no appreciation for the sentiments which, with so many others, covers the mouldering institutions of England as mosses and lichens cover her ruined castles. In every unjust institution John Bright can see only the wrong it would preserve; though, if it would only consent to die at once, I doubt he would be willing to scatter some flowers (and he has rare ones at his command) on its coffin. Nevertheless, any thing he might say would be listened to and borne as from the prelate of the people, the priest of the Altar of Labor, and also as from a man of absolute loyalty to his cause. A writer, utterly opposed to John Bright's opinions, once spoke of him with a kind of angry homage as a lurid volcano; and it is evident that his every utterance in England is received by the upper classes with an alarm somewhat similar to that with which a volcanic eruption might be viewed by neighboring villagers, who have no time to think of the finer clusters that in after-years grow from the lava-fields. They never appeal to him; they never try to persuade him to pause, to alter, to retract; but regard him as an elemental necessity, a mysterious providential danger to be avoided as well as they can. There is no doubt whatever, in my mind, that there is a considerable proportion of the upper classes who in their hearts would be glad to have a special prayer for deliverance from the dangers of John Bright's influence inserted in the regular Church Service, and who already slip in an anathema for him next to the prayer for the Queen.

It seems to me that I have seen a considerable growth and increase of this feeling toward Mr. Bright during the last few years; but if so it is only the counterpart of the increase of his bitter and religious hatred toward the institutions he is resolved to overthrow. Evidently there were many who supposed that when John Bright got the power to advance his cause he would not care to press it, or at least that he would press it in a conservative way; it was supposed that when he had won the victory he would divide it with old Whigs, if not Tories. During all the last great debate on the Reform Bill Gladstone and many others tried to persuade the Tories that large numbers of the working-classes were conservatives, and brought forward many election statistics to show that the admission of such to the franchise would not alter the political balance of the House. But beyond all these fair-seeming promises and statistics the Tories and Whigs read their answer on the face of John Bright. There were no evasions nor subtleties on it. As he sat there they saw him to be what one of their speakers by a curious impulse pronounced him, "the future government of England;" and his expression said, plainly, "Gentlemen, I have waited long, and I am ready to wait longer; and the reason I do not care to conceal from you: Haste and Thoroughness do not go together; and I am waiting for a Substance, not a Shadow. You see as well as I do that my victory is won, though not yet formulized, and you begin to be apprehensive that I mean to claim every possible result of it. Your apprehensions are perfectly correct: of all the edifices of injustice be you sure not one stone shall be left upon another."

This man is absolutely free from that egotism which, with politicians, is content with a nominal success, or a personal one. His entire history, indeed, has been the perpetual success of his cause, secured by an accumulation of hatred for himself. Every great measure which England has passed within the last thirty years has been a triumph for John Bright; but the men who boast most loudly about England's repeal of Corn-Laws, her Free Trade, and the like, turn white with rage whenever they see the man who, more than any other now living, is associated with those victories. It is not the Corn-Laws of the past that the Tories of to-day wish to defend, but those of the present. They all believe in Reform "ez fur away ez" 1832. But John Bright is a man who, though he can turn his head when he wishes, has his eyes in front. He declines to spend his strength on stuffed snake-skins, but can see Pharaoh, Pharisee, Slave-driver, and Corn-Law tyrant under the gold and gems of their newest skin.

A very intelligent American, who lately heard Mr. Bright speak in Birmingham, found much in his look and style of oratory which resembled Daniel Webster; but although, in some respects, a comparison between the two may well be made, there never were two men who more diverged in that morale of the intellect which enables men to discriminate between surface and substance. While Webster could stand in Faneuil Hall and defend any George the Third who happened to be reigning at Washington, or could take off his hat beside Plymouth Rock with one hand while with the other he upheld any modern Archbishop Parker who might be persecuting the Brewsters and Bradfords among his constituents, John Bright lives under an abiding perception of the continuity of the great cause of Humanity. The belief in perpetual inspiration, which has grown with him from a Quaker doctrine to a profound and habitual reverence for his own convictions, has helped to train in him that vigorous instinct by which he interprets the present by the past, and recognizes old friends or foes with whatever new faces. He ever feels the cloud of witnesses around him.

In the late great Reform demonstration at Birmingham there was a very striking incident illustrative of this feeling. There is in that city a place called Newhall Hill, where, in the year 1832, the largest meeting which perhaps occurred during all the agitation of those years met to petition the House of Lords to pass the Reform Bill which is now the law. Two hundred thousand persons are said to have been present on that occasion, and they had there repeated after a speaker these words: "In unbroken faith, through every peril and trial and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

privation, we devote ourselves and our children to our country's cause!" Those men were entering upon dark and perilous times, and it was in the spirit of that consecration that they conquered. Since then Newhall Hill, which thirty-four years ago was an open space of twelve acres, has been built over by the growth of the city. But all the fine mansions cleared away before the vision of John Bright as the great Reform procession of 1866, with its quarter of a million of men, passed that way. When the carriage in which he was seated came to the main street which runs over Newhall Hill, Mr. Bright called to the driver to stop; he then leaped up on the seat of the carriage, and, without uttering a single word, pointed to the hill, his glowing eye steadily following his pointing finger. The vast crowd caught his thought as if by an electric flash, and for many moments their plaudits were like the rolling of mighty waves, when deep calleth unto deep.

It will not be wondered that a man who feels himself to be one of a great procession of the loyal and just, marching on from age to age to rescue the Holy Places of Humanity, should have the temperament of a poet. Were it not that we have all fallen upon times too sad and full of wrong for humane spirits to rise into song, John Bright might have been a true poet; and even now I can yet remember, in each one of the many speeches which I have heard from him, some passage or passages which were worthy of John Milton. I quote one such passage here—not because it is the best, but because I have it by me:

"I believe there is no permanent greatness to a nation except it be based upon morality. I do not care for military greatness or military renown. I care for the condition of the people among whom I live. There is no man in England who is less likely to speak irreverently of the Crown and Monarchy of England than I am; but crowns, coronets, mitres, military display, the pomp of war, wide colonies, and a huge empire are, in my view, all trifles light as air, and not worth considering, unless with them you can have a fair share of comfort, contentment, and happiness among the great body of the people. Palaces, baronial castles, great halls, stately mansions, do not make a nation. The nation, in every country, dwells in the cottage; and unless the light of your constitution can shine there, unless the beauty of your legislation and the excellence of your statesmanship are impressed there in the feelings and condition of the people, rely upon it you have yet to learn the duties of government."

It perhaps requires that such passages as these should be associated in the mind with the simple grandeur of Mr. Bright's delivery. As an orator, although almost never pathetic, he is very impressive; and in each address there is at least some one point where he is electric. I was in the House of Commons during the late Reform debate when he said to the Opposition: "You may succeed in delaying or in defeating this Bill; you may overthrow the present Government; but there will still remain the people of England to be met, and the great question of Reform to be considered and settled." A more profound sensation than that with which this quietly-uttered remark was received I have rarely witnessed in a public assembly.

But in humor Mr. Bright has not his equal among English speakers. His humor has struck me as being a mixture of drollery, love of symbols, and kindliness. Although he often utters very stern denunciations, they are generally applied to the principles he believes false or the political parties whom he believes unjust; but when he has to single out individual opponents his kindliness leads him to transform them as it were into something that he need not hurt by poking, while all are laughing at it. In the late debate, his representing the English Copperhead, Mr. Horsemann, as repairing to a political cave of Adullam, and inviting thither all the distressed and the discontented, was so exactly descriptive of the annoyance and disgust of Horsemann at the bringing forward of a Reform Bill, and the sulkiness with which, followed by other conservative Whigs, he abandoned the Government, that it became the joke of the debate, and the entire party of Whig Secessionists were, and have been since, spoken of by all parties as "Adullamites." So in answering the speeches of Mr. Horsemann and Mr. Lowe, who were both representing this third party, the "Adullamites," nothing could have been more graphic than his describing his difficulty in saying which of the two was the party's head, by the figure of one of those wretched little dogs, so covered with long hair that one can hardly say which is head and which is tail. Little shaggy terrier dogs are now held up on the ends of poles in Reform demonstrations, so completely has this delineation of their chief opponents pleased the populace. In his great speech of August 27, at Birmingham, the power of his humor was displayed in a passage concerning Mr. Lowe, which, by-the-by, the reporters for the London press mangled a little. It must be remembered that Mr. Lowe is the Member of Parliament for Calne, that he was once very liberal, and that he has of late years received his election through the influence of the late Marquis of Lansdowne over his tenants, who are the chief electors of that "pocket-borough." Alluding to Mr. Lowe as a Member of the House "who has now no constituency, or whose sole constituent is now no longer here to participate in the strife of politics," though, he presumed, "another constituent acts and reigns in his stead"—Mr. Bright continued thus: "Now, if I quote any thing that Mr. Lowe said"—here there were many groans and hisses for Mr. Lowe—"understand me that I wish to bring no charge against him whatsoever. He has spent some years in Australia, and probably has voyaged round the world; and I don't deny him the right to voyage round the world of politics, and to cast anchor in any port that may be pleasant to him. I merely intend to quote something that he said; and I quote it because when it was said it was received with rapturous

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

enthusiasm by that great party who are the supporters of Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli." When, after this, the extract from Mr. Lowe, which Mr. Bright read, began with the words—"I have had some opportunities of knowing some constituencies in this country"—the memory of the Member for Calne's sole and now defunct constituent came over the crowd, and the laugh that for some minutes had been fermenting in it, now burst out in explosive and long-continued laughter. Charles Lamb could hardly have arranged the little absurdities of Mr. Lowe's position and language with more art.

And indeed Mr. Bright is an artist. There is evidence in all of his speeches that he is a careful student of the best English thinkers and writers, and especially that he is familiar with the graceful and artful beauties of the early English poets. No man in Parliament has made so many apt quotations from the old English masters of lyric verse. But, at the same time, I do not know another man whose addresses, artistic as they are, fall from him so ruddy and warm. There is no cold, elaborated invective, no ornamented poison-cups, no sign of the chisel. His preparation extends only to the general arrangement of his argument, and the illustration of his leading points; if any thing or any person is to be struck by lightning it must be from a spontaneous storm. But when such a storm does arise it is fearful. At the Birmingham meeting, to which I have several times referred, there was one sentence at which the multitude shuddered, as much under the manner as the matter of it. It was this:

"I say that the accession to office of Lord Derby is a declaration of war against the working-classes ....You may work, you may pay taxes, you may serve in the army and fight—seventy thousand or more of your brethren are now living under the burning sun of India, and twice as many more are serving in the ranks in different parts of the world—and you, the great body of the people from whom these men are drawn, are not considered worthy to do so simple an act as to give a vote in your own great town for your present or for any future members. You are to have no vote; you are to have no share in the Government; the country that you live in is not to be your country."

Every word in that passage was flashed through the United Kingdom immediately; and on Tuesday, the 28th of August, Lord Derby awoke to find that England was streaming around as if by a general thaw and dissolution. The London Times was down on its hands and knees, declaring that extension of suffrage was a foregone conclusion, and that it was only in the interest of a fuller extension that it and other liberals had thrown out the late Reform Bill. The Pall Mall Gazette made a more graceful surrender. And the Economist (which opposed the Reform Bill, and which represents all the brain that there is on 'Change) came out and warned Lord Derby that he would be compelled to introduce a Reform Bill in the next session of Parliament—that he would unquestionably bring in an unacceptable one—and that he would have to go under. The Saturday Review declared that the struggle has come, and intimates that the only escape from the England of Mr. Bright is such an escape as France has made. It is now Democracy or Absolutism. I believe that there is no other instance in history where a single sentence of a single speech produced such a tremendous and instantaneous effect upon a great nation.

Personally Mr. Bright is a most genial and friendly gentleman, full of a certain blended delicacy and manliness which are very winning. He is at once blunt and courteous; he never lacks tact, but at the same time will get his testimony out in any company if there be need of it. He has always a number of good stories and witticisms, which no one ever heard before. There never was a better Club-man, though he goes to the Reform Club alone, and to that, I believe, but rarely—for he works hard. He has no trace of asceticism; he can enjoy a cigar with friends, and can play a good game at billiards. He is as free from egotism, personally, as I have said he is politically. He once passed an evening in the company of the man who of all others holds views most antagonistic to his—Thomas Carlyle—but no storm arose; a fact which those who know Carlyle will account almost a miracle. Mr. Bright never speaks to ventilate his own opinions, nor to prove his courage. It has seemed to some of the great reformer's friends that the heavy sorrows which have fallen upon him—first the loss of Cobden, and soon afterward of his brother-in-law, Samuel Lucas—one of the purest and stanchest of reformers—have gone deeper than the frost they have sprinkled on his hair. He is to be met with less often in drawing-rooms, perhaps, and his brow may be a trifle less smooth; but in his public life there has been of late a more intense and concentrated power; and since the introduction of the Russell-Gladstone Reform Bill he seems to me to have been doing both his own and Cobden's work. It was apparent in his last speech in Parliament, and more particularly in his last appearance at Birmingham, that the imminent triumph of Suffrage Reform has cost him as much in health as the triumph of the Corn-Law Repeal did, and his friends are insisting that he shall consider it his public duty to "rest and be thankful." Nevertheless, if "man is immortal till his work is done," there is no reason for any apprehension about John Bright; he is still vigorous, and, as Cobden said, has two or three good Reform bills in him yet. There is yet on him the unbroken seal of one

> "Solemnly elected,
> With gifts and graces eminently adorned,
> To some great work."

Passing out of the House of Commons one night—it was after midnight—very much stirred by the speeches for Reform to which I had just been listening from John Bright, and others of the sturdy band who sit with him below the gangway—men who have as yet found no gov-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ernment behind which they can fully stand—I paused for a while before the fine fresco of the Embarkation of the Pilgrim Fathers which adorns the wall of the lobby of the House, and at the moment the very faces of those Pilgrims seemed to me to resemble those of the men to whose appeals and warnings I had been listening. The great charge which the Tories and Adullamites had been hurling at them was—"You wish to Americanize our institutions!" The Reformers had been brave enough not to deny this. I reflected that the emigration of the Plymouth Pilgrims was really a grand scheme for Americanizing English Institutions. In old Winslow's "Briefe Narration" we read that those earnest men, then exiles in Leyden, felt it "grievous to live from under the protection of the State of England"—that country in which they had been so persecuted—and that they began to hope that "God would be pleased to discover some place for them, though in America, where they might exemplarily show their tender countrymen, no less burdened than themselves, where they might live and comfortably subsist, being freed from anti-Christian bondage, and might keep their names and nation." That is, it was a New England—a larger, freer, juster England—that those Pilgrims sought and found; and it is a New England that John Bright and his comrades are seeking and will find. They are in no respect like Americans; but they seem to me to be the very men with whom, as Carlyle said, "the soul passed into America." The free, large thought of John Robinson still utters itself when Mill speaks; stout Miles Standish will never die while Baines or Taylor lives; and Bradford and Brewster seem both to live again in John Bright. The presence of such an array of powerful reformers in England just now is a writing on the wall which the dwellers in the cave and the idolaters of its fossils are beginning to understand. "Spirits are not finely touched but to fine issues." As a wing implies air, or a fin water, such men as are now agitating this country imply and prefigure a New England.

JOHN ECCLESTON'S THANKSGIVING.

I.

THE November night was settling down darkly and coldly when John Eccleston came out from the little dingy office where he had just finished his day's work. His day's work! It was an odd phrase to apply to John Eccleston, because in no way did labor of any kind ever seem to have any fit connection with him. And now as he emerged from the low lintel, after three years of this dull servitude, it appeared to fit him as little as it had three years before, when life with him was at its highest ebb of ease and pleasure.

Looking at him, you thought of him, "to endless pleasure heir," so bright, and blithe, and full of gracious youth did he appear; and now as he came out of the little dingy office, though his garments were slightly rough of texture, and certainly wanting in fashionable freshness and finish, yet his air was that of a debonair gentleman, and he hummed lightly a strain from Der Freischutz, as if only last night he had come from some stately feast where the horns and harps had set the enchanted hours to music. But it was many, many nights, so many that he had ceased to count them, since John Eccleston had sat at a feast and listened to festal music; and even now, as he hums the brilliant aria with that debonair manner, he is thinking very sadly and sorrowfully of a small home where nothing brilliant ever enters save it may be his own brilliant presence.

He observes the holiday merriment, and hears the gay laughter about him as he enters upon the wider thoroughfares, and he thinks painfully and bitterly how far away it all is from him; and then some one steps out of a splendid shop, and says to a passing friend: "See, I have bought this lovely little Como of Valsi's for Alice. It's Alice's birthday this Thanksgiving, you see, and I wanted something specially rare."

A fresh pang struck John Eccleston as he heard. He knew of another Alice, whose birthday came upon this Thanksgiving too, and he had nothing to give her, not even one of those pretty-colored lithographs hanging in the window there, and this man talking so happily with his friend could carry home Valsi's lovely Lake of Como. How late it was since he, too, could have carried home to his Alice the most expensive work of art! Still, with these sad and bitter thoughts, he kept on humming unconsciously that strain of Der Freischutz, and looking, as I think he ever must look whatever betide, the brilliant, gracious gentleman. And looking thus, he caught the observation of a gentleman who was walking down the street.

"What! is it you, Eccleston? I haven't seen you for an age. Where have you kept yourself?"

And saying this, he joined him with a hearty eagerness of manner which bespoke real pleasure at the meeting. Turning the corner of a street, they came upon a house whose one bow-window shed out a bright curtainless radiance upon the pave; and looking in, you saw a pleasant room full of pictures and all manner of delightful and charming things.

"Here we are now, Eccleston," exclaimed his companion; "and you must come in for a minute, and see a new picture I have!"

It was early; Alice would not expect him for half an hour yet; so he went in.

"Come round this side—there now, with this light—and tell me honestly what you think of it when you're ready."

There was a pause. In it the host watched his guest's face with eager scrutiny. But he was so eager he could not keep silent long.

"Well," he presently exclaimed, "do you recognize it?"

"Yes; it is a copy of that loveliest head of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

all those lovely fancy heads of Rosalba Carriera in the Dresden Gallery. But though I recognize, I must tell you frankly I don't like the copy."

"Well, where is the fault? I see there is a fault, a want, or something, but it is so intangible I didn't know but it might be in my remembrance."

Eccleston, with his eyes still on the picture, sat down absently at the little table standing before it, and in the same apparently absent manner took up a pencil that lay upon a sheet of drawing paper, and with a free hand and a dreamy eye fell to sketching. A few strokes, bold and firm, and he held it up for inspection.

"That is what I mean. Do you see it?"

The other uttered an exclamation of delighted satisfaction; and no wonder. His doubts were all cleared in an instant. He had not mistaken his first impression. Here was the solving of the difficulty; and just a few lines by this amateur on a piece of white paper had wrought the miracle; had given to that loveliest head its wonderful airy pose, which the finished copy lacked.

"Eccleston, how did you catch it?"

"Oh, I have spent hours in that particular room before that particular picture; and it was this very lift of the head, and that matchless setting on of the throat, which impressed me most."

"I wish that something might be done to this, but I suppose—"

"No," interrupted Eccleston, quickly and decisively; "nothing could be done to this. It is in the first drawing that the whole aerial grace and spirit are fixed."

Clarke Steyner as he listened speculated curiously, as he had done many a time before, about this John Eccleston, and wished he knew more about him. A year ago he had met him at an artist's exhibition. If he remembered rightly Valsi himself had introduced them; and he had learned then that he was a book-keeper at Warde and Slido's, and a fine judge of pictures—"a man of unerring taste," according to Valsi; and he had never learned any thing more. They had met in print-shops, studios, and exhibitions, until a sort of acquaintance had been established through their mutual admiration of art, and Steyner had proved him to be, indeed, "a man of unerring taste." But how did this man, with all his various cultivation and traveled lore, appear here in the counting-room of an importer? He could not answer this question. Who could? Who knew any thing more of him than what he knew? He seemed to have no intimate friends, no places of visiting; yet he was a gentleman to grace any society, was Clarke Steyner's verdict as he came to know him better. And as Eccleston sat there after his critique of the picture, talking still of Art with that debonair manner, his entertainer puzzled himself again and again with these thoughts. But a city clock struck the hour.

"Bless my soul, how the time has gone!" And Eccleston rose hastily.

"Stay and take a cup of tea with me. I'm an old bachelor, you know, and like my cup of tea."

"No, thank you; my wife will be waiting for me."

Steyner started almost visibly with the sudden surprise he felt. It had never occurred to him that John Eccleston had a wife; and the fact struck him oddly and curiously, making a new combination of circumstances. His wife! Steyner looked at the rather shabby coat of his guest, and wondered what manner of home it could be with this clerk on a small salary, who was yet like a young prince in disguise.

"Come again, come in at any time." He invited Eccleston cordially, following him to the door; but he noticed that Eccleston, in replying, did not reciprocate the invitation.

II.

It was a contrast to step from the spacious room with all its elegant appointments, where Clarke Steyner had entertained him, to the low-ceiled little apartment where his wife awaited him; and John Eccleston felt it bitterly. But he entered with a gay smile and an apology for his lateness; and Alice answered as brightly:

"Oh, you've been to see that Mr. Steyner whom you like so much. I'm glad you went.—No, I have not been waiting long."

And ringing the bell for their one little maid, she took her place at the table. She was an elegant, high-bred young creature, was this Alice Eccleston, looking quite as much like a princess in disguise as her husband did like the prince; but it was pretty to see them both in this simple, narrow room, and over this simple table; they were so sparkling and cheery in their air and talk, carrying with them all the time a consciousness of something too fine and rare to be overborne by the meagreness of their surroundings. He told her all about his call upon "that Mr. Steyner," about the picture and its deficiency, and showed her upon a fresh piece of paper, by a few touches, what the figure had lacked, and how he had recalled it. And then they, too, fell to talking about art in much the same manner as he had talked with Clarke Steyner.

"Has Mr. Steyner ever seen the Violante?" And asking the question, Mrs Eccleston glanced up at a beautiful half-length, with a peculiarly spirituelle head, which hung over the mantle.

"Oh yes, he must, if he has been in the Dresden Gallery."

"Ah, I forgot." Then after a moment's musing pause: "He would appreciate your copy, John."

The next moment she blushed scarlet at the sudden color that came into her husband's cheek, and the expression of startled surprise that crossed his face. But immediately he drained the contents of his cup, and said, brightly, almost gayly:

"Ah, well, we don't want any company, do we, Ally?"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

And immediately her own face reflected his.

"Oh no, I'm sure I don't; it is quite enough for my selfishness to have Mr. John Eccleston all to myself." And into Mrs. Alice's deep, tender eyes there stole a softness which made the playful laugh a little suspicious.

"So you won't go to Lady Russell's reception to-night, or to Mrs. Ap-Glydon's ball afterward? You prefer the society of a dull fellow who has been running to seed for the last three years—eh, Mrs. Eccleston?"

There was a brilliant smile on his face, and a light jocose tone to his voice to fit these words; but in his eyes there was a watchful anxiety all the time. And her whole manner was just as airy and sportive as she replied:

"I'd thank you not to abuse my preference, Sir. Mr. John Eccleston, after three years of seediness, is more to my taste than those prosy Englishmen at Lady Russell's and all those witty Ap-Glydons put together. Then I've worn out parties. I've got beyond them, you see," nodding at him archly, and with an indescribable air of espièglerie.

He laughed. "At the age of twenty-five, Madam, you prepare yourself to renounce the vanities of the world. Where are the mob caps? Where—" But he got no further. All their airy talk came to an end as the little maid, Kitty, thrust herself excitedly into the room.

"Shure, Marm, it's the pipes has bust agin, and the water is a-runnin' all over the floor. I tould the man how it would be whin he put thim chape fixins in, but he wouldn't heed me, bad luck to him!"

The color rushed into Mrs. Eccleston's delicate cheek, and her first thought was, "I wish it had happened before John came home." But John was already laughing gayly over it; and, laughing, followed Kitty into the tiny kitchen, where he set himself to the task of remedying the mischief till better help could be summoned. He whistled and hummed in gay good-humor over his work, now and then making odd little jests, or with some quiet fun calling out the quaint oddity of their odd little maid, until Mrs. Alice herself could not help but laugh in real merriment. And no sooner was this matter of mending over than Kitty found a dozen other things awry—those perplexing leaks and cracks and breakages which are forever occurring in a household. And to their repairing this "young prince" set himself as easily as if all his life he had been accustomed to their doing and undoing. And Alice, overlooking, laughed lightly over his blunders, or applauded his success. You would have presumed them at once to be without a shadow of care upon their lives; but the presumption would never have been more incorrect.

Instead, the shadow of more than care perpetually hung over them. Much as John Eccleston loved his wife, and much as she loved him, there was a fatal want of understanding between them. Married five years ago in Paris, where they had met for the first time in the same year of their marriage, they had lived for two years a charmed life of Continental travel. At the end of the two years John Eccleston, as honorable and open as the day, found himself, by the villainy of others, at the end of what he imagined perhaps an endless fortune. Instead of turning his great talent—yes, let us frankly say, genius to the use for which it was destined—instead of going to work as an artist, and painting pictures for his daily bread, by some curious want of self-knowledge he looked upon himself as wholly unfit and unworthy for the work, and with this underrating he set his face against all the great company of painters to which he rightfully belonged, and coming back to his native land, cast about him for other work.

His father had lived abroad so many years that the son found he was a stranger in this native land, with no near or far ties of blood to take up the dropped links. His wife's family was in the same isolated condition. What associations, then, were there to bring him—this fastidious, cultivated gentleman—fitting employment? Not one. So it happened that out of his pride and his humility he came down to the place of book-keeper in the small house of Warde and Slido, importers of china. It was a hard coming down for both of them; but harder for John, who was full of all kinds of chivalric ideas about woman, and who had all his life been able to carry them out until now.

Perhaps, if they had loved each other a little less romantically, they might have accepted their new condition with much more ease and contentment; but they were moulded in a delicate, sensitive fashion, with a good many of the rose-tints in their soul as well as their clay-coloring, so it was impossible for them to do otherwise than they did. Thus it happened that they made each other miserable in many ways by little concealments and subterfuges of affection. John, who hated poverty honestly and heartily, and all its long train of petty annoyances, made pretense of gay content for Alice's sake; and Alice, with the same tastes, followed his example. Fond of social life, yet isolated completely from it for three years, he made pretense of distaste for it because he fancied that it was distasteful to his wife in their altered way of living; and so it came about that the two or three men whom he had met at artists' studios—men like Clarke Steyner, who would have been glad to have visited him, were never invited to do so. And Alice, wishing all the time that John was not so morbidly sensitive on their poverty, refrained from saying a word indicative of any desire for him to bring home a friend. Thus they played at cross purposes, each making pretense of a state of feeling that was unreal out of this mistaken view of the other.

III.

Clarke Steyner sat for a long time, forgetting his bachelor's tea, after Eccleston had gone, looking at the sketch upon the table. And sitting there, Valsi himself came in. Steyner,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google telling him of his call, handed him the paper.

"You don't mean that young Eccleston did this?"

"I do."

"Then what in Heaven's name does he burrow down there in that counting-room for?"

"Just what I'd like to know," returned Steyner, animatedly.

Valsi mused a while longer over the little sketch, sitting with his chin dropped into his hand. By-and-by, in a musing tone:

"Why don't Warde and Slido send him to Europe for the firm? Then some of you might give him a commission. I'd like to see what he'd make of the Christo della Moneta."

Steyner lifted his head with a sudden, quick movement, but said nothing; but he had evidently got a new thought which fitted an old one. He brooded over it with his tea. He smoked it in his after-supper pipe. He slept and dreamed upon it. The next morning, meeting young Slido at the bank, was it accident that set him talking of Eccleston to him? It was careful talk, not too interested; but through it he discovered what he wanted to know—that John Eccleston was invaluable as a reliable clerk, but that Warde and Slido could not afford to send another man to Europe, Warde himself being already there.

"He'd make an excellent buyer; for he has, besides an artist taste, a knowledge of the wants of the people. I wish we could afford to send him; but we are a new house, you know, and our capital isn't large," communicated Slido.

Steyner went home with a "bee in his bonnet." "Tom will do it," he said to himself, "on my suggestion, and I'll take the responsibility. It's the very thing."

Tom was his brother-in-law—an extensive importer of china, so it is easy to see where the bee buzzed.

He was right. His brother-in-law was in need of a good buyer, and had such ample confidence in Clarke that he caught gladly at the suggestion. Steyner went home triumphant, dropping a note on his way to John Eccleston—just a simple request that he would call as he went up from the office that night.

That night was the night before Thanksgiving. Every night for a week John had walked through the gay and busy crowds, noting the holiday merriment and preparations with a fierce ache at his heart. Once, so little while ago, he could have spread a brilliant feast, and welcomed a host of brilliant friends. Once he could have ransacked the splendid shops for his Alice's birthday; and now he was plodding home without a token, a tired and shabby man. He had turned the corner, and was right upon the bright bay-window before he thought of his engagement.

A soft light shone from the window, and within there was a glint of gilding, and the glow and warmth of many pictures, and in the midst of all he saw Clarke Steyner sitting, gazing idly into the fire, full of careless, happy ease. What a contrast it offered to the dim little rooms and to the dreary state he daily kept! And entering, he could not quite conceal beneath that debonair manner the bitter pain he felt.

Steyner, like all persons of delicate sensibilities, found it difficult to approach this matter, where he himself was the apparent conferrer of a favor. So he put it off by a gracious little bustle of hospitality. He touched a bell, and there appeared such wine as Eccleston had not tasted since those "long Italian days." And sipping slowly that delicate, airy sparkle, he was led on into that region of enchantment where Art alone reigns by the skillful suggestions of his host. Either the delicate influence of the wine, or the magnetism of his companion, or it may be both together, carried him so far away from the present ills and narrowness of his lot that he gave himself up fully to the charm, and stood revealed to Steyner at his full measurement of manly breadth and culture. How rich that hour was! With what gentle, gracious gayety he talked of some things; with what tender reverence of others, and accompanied always with an appreciation as rare as it was genial and delighted. But the hour passed; a neighboring clock struck, and recalled the present. The old pain returned, and its shadow stole into his face. The wine had lost its flavor, the fire no longer sent out warmth and radiance; there was the chill of a cold reality about every thing. What right had he to be sitting here sunning himself in an atmosphere of ease and indulgence? What right, while in the little lonely house his Alice waited for him? He rose with a sigh that was half a shudder; and it was then that Steyner began to speak. Just a few words, but of what import!—a few words modestly spoken, deprecating all generosity, as one might ask instead of giving.

A great red flush rose to Eccleston's cheek. Steyner, seeing it, mistook the cause. He had been abrupt and patronizing in his offer, perhaps, was his instantaneous thought. As if Clarke Steyner, the gentlest soul alive, could have been abrupt or patronizing!

"I beg your pardon," he began, "if I have seemed—"

And then Eccleston found his tongue. "You have seemed nothing but what is most delicate and kind," he interrupted.

The flush died away, and almost a pallor succeeded as in a few brief words he gave his acceptance and thanks. The words were so simple they might have sounded cold but for the warmth of his eyes, the intensity of his tone; and the clasp of his hand, as he said "Good-night," had in it so much meaning that Clarke Steyner in a moment recognized a great deal—not all—of the sad, sore struggle of these years of deprivation.

IV.

The little table was set in the little room, a fire burned in the grate, and the one picture—

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the lovely Violante—smiled down from the wall in the evening light as Eccleston entered. Alice, sitting in abstraction over a book, glanced up with a quick smile, but the smile chased a shadow.

"How bright you look, John! Have you been to see Mr. Steyner?" she asked.

"Yes, I have been to see Mr. Steyner, Alice."

There was something in his voice which Alice could not understand; something in his eyes, too—a soft sparkle she could understand as little. She was glad for him to have such pleasure with Mr. Steyner; but there came to her, as there will to the most generous sometimes, a little pang of loneliness at the contrast of this pleasure. She had been so specially lonely on this night before Thanksgiving. The tears were in her eyes a moment ago at the thought of other days, and the obscure uncertainty of the present. She had ached for sympathy and consolation; for somebody to comprehend her mood, to say some tenderer word than usual, to look some sweeter look. But she was very glad that John had had his pleasure, and yet—and yet there lurked that slender thread of pain. He sat down at table, keeping still that soft sparkle of enjoyment, quite oblivious of the extra pains Alice had taken—of the perfumed chocolate that steamed fragrant in the cups, of the pretty attire that set off her loveliness. How strange it was! Had he forgotten, could he forget this night, the eve of her birthday? She tried to meet his mood as usual. She tried to put out of sight all her "cross and passion," and be as bright as he; but as she met his eyes, and saw only the gleam of airy mirthfulness, and listened to his almost exaggerated jesting, a shiver ran over her.

"What is it, Ally?" he asked. "Has this dreadful little house, with its thousand-and-one cracks and crannies, given you the ague?"

It was not so much the words as the light, jocose tone that jarred with the words; and together it proved the drop too much. She tried to answer him, but instead burst into a flood of tears.

"Ally, Ally, what have I done?"

He started from his seat, and going to her side, bent over her with such fond concern that in her uncontrolled state she sobbed out some words that could not fail to enlighten him of her feeling.

"I have been a great blunderer, Alice, but I meant it all for the best."

And then he took her in his arms, and hiding her tearful eyes against his breast, he told her the good news that had brought such unusual gladness to his face, and such buoyancy to his manner on this night.

"And we will go back again to all the dear old scenes, John; and you will have your right place among men again, which is best of any thing. Oh, John, what a Thanksgiving this will be to us after all!"

And the tears flowed afresh, but they were no longer tears of bitterness. And presently, when they had looked at this new happiness on every side, they began to talk of Steyner, and John wondered and questioned out of the simplicity of his nature the meaning of his election. But Alice was clearer sighted.

"You dear, modest old John!" she cried. "how could any man of discernment know you as Mr. Steyner has without knowing you were worth something? And, John—"

She paused, looking up at him wistfully and shyly.

"Well, what is it?"

"I—I think we might—perhaps ask Mr. Steyner here for to-morrow."

"Alice!"

"Not if you don't wish it, dear John; but I thought you—that he might like it."

"I should like it, Alice; but you—"

"I should like it very much, John; and I am so glad that you do. I was afraid you might not, living as we do; for you never have brought him home with you, you know."

"Yes, I know; but, Alice, do you know that I have not because I thought it would be distasteful to you in our way of living."

They regarded each other a moment in eloquent silence. It was Alice who broke it, and her voice faltered as she spoke.

"Oh, John, how we have misunderstood each other all these years, and I—"

He bowed his cheek to her head, and held her a little closer as he interrupted:

"But we have loved each other, my darling, let us always remember that."

There ensued a longer silence, and then John said brightly, in his old debonair manner: "So we are to bid Mr. Steyner here for to-morrow, are we?"

And Alice answered as brightly: "If you are not afraid he will miss his accustomed crystal and Sèvres dinner-service, Mr. Eccleston?"

"I am not afraid of his missing any thing if he dines with Mrs. Eccleston," he answered, with tender gayety.

And so that very night Clarke Steyner was bidden to John Eccleston's Thanksgiving. I think he had no less than four invitations to great houses, where there was brilliant company, and where the feast was served on crystal and Sèvres; but he never hesitated a moment when, John coming in upon him unexpectedly, said simply: "I want you to dine with us to-morrow if you can, Mr. Steyner."

"My dear fellow," he answered, quickly and cordially, "nothing would give me more pleasure."

And sitting at Mrs. Eccleston's right hand the next day, I am very sure that he did not miss the crystal and Sèvres dinner-service. And sitting there too, he comprehended more of John Eccleston's life than he had ever done before. Of course they talked of Art; neither Clarke Steyner nor John Eccleston could be long in any company where there was any sympathy or taste that way without drifting into it; and so, of course, the Violante was discussed. Mr. Stey-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ner was delighted with it, and even satisfied Mrs. Alice with his praises. He had not meant to proffer his request quite yet, but he was led into it involuntarily by this talk.

"I have been thinking," he said, slowly and thoughtfully, looking all the time at the Violante, "if you would make me another copy of that fancy head, when you are in Dresden—I know that no copy but yours will satisfy me now."

Alice's eyes literally glowed with the intensity of her delight; but her husband—"that dear, modest old John"—as she called him, murmured out something about Mr. Steyner's overrating his ability; and then Mr. Steyner loosed his tongue utterly, and told him of Valsi's praise.

Again Clarke Steyner saw that great red flush mount to John Eccleston's brow; and for a moment, as once before, John could find no words to speak, and when he did it was in his gay and pleasant fashion; but it touched Steyner more than any gravity. And over their cigars a little later, it was decided that the copy should be made. And a little later still, when the guest had gone and the husband and wife sat alone together, she said, in a low voice:

"John, I think this is the happiest birthday, and the happiest Thanksgiving of my life."

He put his hand caressingly on her head: "My love, I know it is my happiest Thanksgiving." There was a little upward look which dwelt a moment on the Violante, then lifted thoughtfully beyond; far beyond into no earthly space that look went.

It was John Eccleston's Thanksgiving.

FORTY-THREE DAYS IN AN OPEN BOAT.

COMPILED FROM PERSONAL DIARIES.

THE superb clipper-ship Hornet, Captain Josiah Mitchell, sailed out of New York harbor about the first week in January, 1866, bound for San Francisco. She had a quick passage around the Horn, and experienced no ill luck of any kind until just after crossing the equator, upward bound, in the Pacific. Then, on the morning of the 3d of May, she took fire and was burned up, and the crew and passengers, with ten days' provisions saved from the vessel, found themselves adrift in three open boats.

Each boat had a compass, a quadrant, a copy of Bowditch's Navigator, and a Nautical Almanac, and the Captain's and chief mate's boats had chronometers. There were 31 men, all told. The Captain took an account of stock, with the following result: four hams, nearly thirty pounds of salt pork, half-box of raisins, one hundred pounds of bread, twelve two-pound cans of oysters, clams, and assorted meats, a keg containing four pounds of butter, twelve gallons of water in a forty-gallon "scuttle-butt," four one-gallon demijohns full of water, three bottles of brandy (the property of passengers), some pipes, matches, and a hundred pounds of tobacco. No medicines. Of course the whole party had to go on short rations at once.

The Captain kept a "log," and so did each of the two passengers, Samuel and Henry Ferguson, aged 28 and 18 respectively—young gentlemen making their first sea voyage. The plain, matter-of-fact journal of the elder Ferguson was as interesting to me as a novel, notwithstanding I knew all the circumstances of the desperate voyage in the open boat before I read it. I give it entire, adding extracts from the other logs occasionally. A perusal of the diary for the 2d of May will introduce the reader to the cheerful, home-like ship, before she takes her final leave of the stage:

SAMUEL FERGUSON'S DIARY.

May 2.—Latitude 1° 28′ N., longitude 111° 38′ W. Another hot and sluggish day; at one time, however, the clouds promised wind, and there came a slight breeze—just enough to keep us going. The only thing to chronicle to-day is the quantities of fish about: nine bonitas were caught this forenoon, and some large albicores seen. After dinner the first mate hooked a fellow which he could not hold, so he let the line go to the Captain, who was on the bow. He, holding on, brought the fish to with a jerk, and snap went the line, hook and all. We also saw astern, swimming lazily after us, an enormous shark, which must have been nine or ten feet long. We tried him with all sorts of lines and a piece of pork, but he declined to take hold. I suppose he had appeased his appetite on the heads and other remains of the bonitas we had thrown overboard.

May 3.—At 7 A.M. fire broke out down booby hatch. The boats got off safe, and all hands. Compute our latitude at 2° 20′ N., and longitude 112° 10′ W. The ship burned very rapidly. Two hours after the fire broke out the main-mast fell over the side, and dragged the mizzen-topmast with it. Saved nothing but what we had on, except our over-coats. Got in as much provisions and water as time would allow. Staid by the burning ship all day and night. Divided forces—fourteen in the long-boat, and nine and eight men in the two quarter-boats. Our boat—the long-boat—was in command of Captain Mitchell, and the other boats were in charge of the first and second mates. Rations, one half-biscuit for breakfast; one biscuit and some canned meat for dinner; and half a biscuit for tea, with a few swallows of water at each meal.

May 4.—The ship burned all night very brightly; and hopes are that some ship has seen the light, and is bearing down upon us. None seen, however, this forenoon; so we have determined to go together north and a little west to some islands in 18° to 19° N. latitude, and 114° to 115° W. longitude, hoping in the mean time to be picked up by some ship. The ship sank suddenly at about 5 A.M. We find the sun very hot and scorching; but all try to keep out of it as much as we can. The men stand it so far well, though we have three or four on board who have been sick and disabled

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

for some time. Though we have had none yet, we hope, in this latitude, to have plenty of showers, which will work two ways, however; as they must wet our provisions, and also kill the wind. Our course to-day has been north-by-east. Our water rations are increased while we are in the "Doldrums," where we have too frequent showers.

May 5.—Last night was a very unpleasant one; it rained very hard, and it was mighty hard stowage. We all got some sleep. To-day has been overcast, so we have not suffered from the burning sun as we otherwise should. We caught a good deal of water last night, and have now more than we had when we left the ship. The Captain computes our latitude at about 4° N. The Captain, my brother Henry, myself, the third mate, and nine men lead in the long-boat, which, having most sail (Hornet's main-top-gallant studding-sail), tows the other two—the first mate's coming next, and the second mate's last. We made a good run till about midnight, when the wind lessened a good deal. So far every thing goes on as well as can be expected. The men are in good spirits, though we all have a pretty hard time. We were enabled to keep on our course until showers and squalls headed us off.

Sunday, May 6.—This morning began very stormy and squally; it rained very hard, and one time the sea was very wicked—the waves broken and dangerous — what sailors call a "cobbling" sea. Every body became soaked, of course; bread got wet—with fresh water, however. Wind very light until one P.M.; then a rain squall. We keep on the look-out all the time for a sail. In the evening it rained again, making every thing very disagreeable. This boat is a very disagreeable one. What with a large water-cask, the bag of bread, and the bags belonging to the men, there is hardly any room left.* We naturally thought often of all at home, and were glad to remember that it was Sacrament Sunday, and that prayers would go up from our friends for us, although they know not our peril. We read and said our prayers as best we could for the rain. Not much wind. First part of the night very rainy and uncomfortable.

May 7.—Henry got the best sleep last night he has had yet; the Captain also got a few good cat-naps, the first he has had during the four days and nights since we lost the ship. Wind light until seven or eight o'clock, when it freshened up and gave us a high and cobbling sea—much worse than any we have seen in a good while. The other boats get on well, and are much better sea-boats than this chunk we are in—not that I have any reason to complain of her action. Upon consultation the Captain thought best to steer more easterly to an island called Clipperton Rock, which is decidedly the nearest. Suppose we do not find it, we shall still stand in the highway of ships, and also make a good deal of easting, by which we are better able to make the isles further north, they being in latitude 18° to 20° N., and longitude 111° to 131′ W. About ten o'clock we headed east-northeast, and hope to find Clipperton Island in latitude 10° 28′, and longitude 109° 19′. The bread department of our provisions is decidedly our weak point. The Captain places no reliance upon the chronometers on account of their constant disarrangement by the plunging of the boat; but he means to take sights now and then, as they keep together tolerably well.

May 8.—Last night a series of calms and light breezes, during which we had wind in all directions; rained, but not hard, till morning, when about six it began and kept it up pretty regularly—wet every thing and every body again. No wind all day. About noon it cleared off and came out hot. Second mate's boat desiring to row, we went to the rear and each boat took to the "white-ash"—that is, to the oars. Saw plenty of dolphins, but could not catch any. I think we are all beginning more and more to realize the awful situation we are in. It often takes a ship a week to get through the Doldrums—how much longer, then, such a craft as ours, which can not sail within seven to eight points of the wind. We are so crowded that we can not stretch ourselves out for a good sleep, but have to take it in any way we can get it. I am glad I managed to get aboard my three bottles of brandy—it will do us good service.

May 9.—Last night was a pleasant one—no rain of any account—so most of the day was spent in drying our wet clothes and blankets. Early in the evening the second mate's boat took the lead, rowing, when shortly a breeze sprang up, and they made sail, continuing to row. We reefed our sail and set it, and so soon caught up that we took the lead; then shook out the reef. We have been highly favored in being able to keep together so well. The sun is very hot indeed, and gave me a warning to keep out of it as much as possible, in a very peculiar doubling of the sight when looking with both eyes, while with either one the vision was unmarred. Looking with both eyes the horizon crossed thus: ×. Lying down in the shade of the sail soon banished the trouble, however, and I am all right now. Henry keeps well, but broods over our troubles more than I wish he did. Caught to-day two dolphins; had part of one cooked in a pan; it tasted well. Turned in about 7½ o'clock and slept pretty well till 12; then turned out to give Henry a chance. Had a good breeze and no rain. The Captain believed the compass out of the way, but the long-invisible North Star came out—a welcome sight—and indorsed the compass.

May 10.—Latitude 7° 0′ 3″ N.; longitude 111° 32′ W. Drifting in calms all day. Even as the Captain says, all romance has long since vanished, and I think most of us are beginning to look the fact of our awful situation full in the face. We are still in a good place to be picked up, but seem to make little or nothing

* The boat was but 21 feet long, and 6 feet 3 inches wide, and 3 feet deep.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

on our course toward the isles. We are so cramped up here that it makes it more trying than all else. They are not as provident as they should be in the third mate's boat. They have eaten up all the canned meats brought from the ship, and now are growing discontented. The men in the first mate's boat are careful and contented, however. The chronometers are going, but differ somewhat, and so they can not be depended upon. We have been mercifully guarded against the destructive effects of these sudden and violent squalls. We have all the water we want. To-day Joe caught some more dolphins and a small turtle. Charley cooked a portion of the former.

May 11.—Latitude 7°; longitude 110° 0′ 3″. Standing still! Or worse; we lost more last night than we made yesterday. Caught some little rain, but not enough to fill up the water-butts. The sun in the middle of the day is very powerful, and makes it necessary to cover one's head. To-day the mate's boat caught a turtle; so we have some meat, though we have to eat it raw. The cock that was rescued and pitched into the boat while the ship was on fire still lives, and crows with the breaking of dawn, cheering us all a good deal. The second mate's boat again want water to-day, showing that they overdrink their allowance. The Captain spoke pretty sharply to them. From appearances they ought to be able to catch enough to-night. Have no reported sights of sails yet. In this latitude the horizon is filled with little upright clouds that look very much like ships. The men keep up well in our boat, and the Captain serves out two table-spoonsful of brandy and water—half and half—to our crew. I offered one bottle of the brandy to the chief mate, but he declined, saying he could keep the after-boat quiet, and we had not enough for all.

[Henry Ferguson's Diary to date, given in full:—"May 4, 5, 6.—Doldrums. May 7, 8, 9.—Doldrums. May 10, 11, 12.—Doldrums:—Tells it all. Never saw, never felt, never heard, never experienced such heat, such darkness, such lightning and thunder, and wind and rain, in my life before."]

May 12.—A good rain last night and we caught a good deal, though not enough to fill up our tank, pails, etc. Our object is to get out of these Doldrums, but it seems as if we can not do it. To-day we have had it very variable, and hope we are on the northern edge, though we are not much above 7°. This morning we all thought we had made out a sail; but it was one of those deceiving clouds. Rained a good deal to-day, making all hands wet and uncomfortable; we filled up pretty nearly all our water-pots, however. I hope we may have a fine night, for the Captain certainly wants rest, and while there is any danger of squalls, or danger of any kind, he is always on hand. I never would have believed that open boats such as ours, with their loads, could live in some of the seas we have had. We are all right so far, and as comfortable as can be expected. I feel the fatigue of the lack of exercise, together with the insufficiency of food, considerably. Henry seems to bear up pretty well, though looking at times pretty miserable.

Sunday, May 13.—Last night was one of the finest nights we have had—no rain or squalls, though a variable set of winds. This morning finds us all pretty cheerful. During the night the cry of "A ship!" brought us to our feet, but it proved to be only a star rising out of the water. Thought often of those at home to-day, and of the disappointment they will feel next Sunday at not hearing from us by telegraph from San Francisco. To-day our rations were reduced to a quarter of a biscuit a meal, with about half a pint of water. We hope to catch more turtles and fish to eke out our small stores. The men, I am sorry to say, are improvident; they don't waste what they have, but would take three times as much as is necessary, if they could get it, and eat it instead of keeping it.

May 14.—To-day very showery, though last night was the most comfortable we have had. In the afternoon had a regular thunder-storm, which toward night seemed to close in around us on every side, making it very dark and squally. With great gratitude we saw the clouds break and stars once more appear. Our situation is becoming more and more desperate, for we have very little steady wind to make northing, and every day diminishes our small stock of provisions. We want to get to 18° N., and make some of the islands put down as lying thereabouts, but will have the northeast trades to contend against; they would be a good steady breeze, but with our sail and boat I doubt if we could sail within eight points of the wind—certainly not while towing the other boats. We have one large compass, and the second mate another; my little compass that H—— gave me I have loaned to the first mate. The time must soon come when we must separate.

May 15.—From 10 P.M. last night we had a more comfortable night, though every thing was in a perfect sop. Wind baffling and very light—made but little progress. Spirits keep up, and I trust all will be well; but it is a terrible thing for us all so cramped and with no change of clothes. Sun out again hot; drying our wet things, but making it very scorching. We manage to head about north, but make very little progress. One blessing we have is a continued supply of water, which, as we must soon take the trades, is very important. The Captain took a longitude sight this morning, but noon was too cloudy for latitude. This afternoon wind headed us off to nearly E., and threatened squalls and showers late in the evening. Joe caught another dolphin to-day. In his maw we found one flying-fish and two skip-jacks. Had a visit from a land bird to-day, which perched on the yard for a while. This shows that we can not be far from Clipperton Rock—but whether we shall make it or not is very doubtful.

May 16.—Last night was a very quiet and comfortable one as regards rain, though our limited space makes it very hard sleeping for

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

any length of time. We all keep well as yet, thank God, but are growing weaker. To-day we have a wind from the northeast, which we hope will settle down to a good steady trade, and take us either to the islands or across some vessel's track. The first mate's crew are in good spirits, but they have lived very close and are pretty weak. The cock still lives, and daily carols forth His praise. We have yet eaten neither of the turtles; when we do we must eat them raw, for want of means to cook them. No more fish caught to-day. Bids fair for a rainy night, which I do not mind if we can fill up our water-butts.

[In Henry's log is mentioned that on the 17th one of those dire spectres of the deep—a waterspout—stalked by them, and they trembled for their lives. With accustomed brevity and expressiveness he observes that "it might have been a fine sight from a ship." Captain Mitchell's log for this day gives this item: "Only half bushel of bread crumbs left."]

May 17.—Was stopped writing last evening by the rain, which continued steadily all night, with a heavy and dangerous sea. All day yesterday till 2 P.M. rained steadily, and a more uncomfortable set of wretches one can not imagine. To-day, however, we are drying a little. To-day we were fortunate enough to catch a dolphin and a bonita—the latter, in its distress, took shelter under our rudder from a large sword-fish that was hovering around, and which we dared not for our lives try to catch or even molest. To-day we have been two weeks in these egg-shells, and it certainly seems as if we are to be saved. God grant that an end to our captivity may soon be sent. The men in all the boats seem pretty well—the feeblest of the sick ones (not able, for a long time, to stand his watch on board the ship) is wonderfully recovered. A great increase of birds about us this morning.

["Passed a most awful night. Rained hard nearly all the time, and blew in squalls, accompanied by terrific thunder and lightning, from all points of the compass."—Henry's Log.

"Most awful night I ever witnessed."—Captain's Log.]

May 18.—Latitude 11° 11′. Last night no rain of any consequence; had a pretty good night. Drifted about till 2 A.M., when we got a good breeze, which gave us our course. Mate came aboard to-day and reports all well with him but Peter, who has again got the fever, poor fellow! The third boat cooked the turtle the second boat caught, and mate reports the meat first-rate. We talk of separating, and must soon do so—we can tow one boat, but not two. It seems too bad, but it must be done for the safety of the whole. At first I never dreamed; but now hardly shut my eyes for a cat-nap without conjuring up something or other—to be accounted for by weakness, I suppose. Very likely we would have been in to San Francisco tomorrow or next day, had not our disaster happened. I should like to have sent B——* the telegram for her birthday. At 2 A.M. we took a brisk little breeze from southwest, which allowed us to run our course north by east.

May 19.—Calm last night—rested pretty well. This morning Captain called up the two quarter-boats, and said one would have to go off on its own hook. Second mate would not go, so the first mate took his boat, and with six of the second mate's men who volunteered to go, with two of his own (in all nine); started early, and by 5 P.M. were out of sight to windward. Was very sorry to have the mate leave us; but all considered for the best. This morning we have had a most scorching and burning sun, making it almost intolerable. Very calm all day to about 4 P.M. when a slight breeze sprang up. It did not last very long, however. The mate's boat nowhere to be seen this morning. I hope he was more successful in catching water than we were. Water will now be a scarce article, for as we get out of the Doldrums we shall only get showers now and then in the trades. This life is telling severely on my strength. Henry holds out first-rate.

Sunday, May 20.—Latitude 12° 0′ 9″. Very little rain last night—none that we could save to put in the cask. No breeze to speak of. It is very strange that we do not get the trades, which usually come at 8° to 10°. We all watch anxiously for a sail, but as yet have only had visions of ships that came to naught—the semblance without the substance. God grant that the time is not far distant when we shall be picked up, for that is my greatest hope! The turtle which Joe caught served us for dinner yesterday and to-day, and very good it was. No fish about us to-day. We are daily in hopes of catching something, for it helps out our stores wonderfully. The second mate, this afternoon, succeeded in catching a "booby"—a bird as large as a wild duck. As they have no other meat it will go well.

May 21.—Fine breeze all night, about east—quite as much as we could well stand. It soon brought up a sea, but we made a good night's work of it. No rain to-day; more squally, and the wind not steady. The second mate has been fortunate enough to catch three more boobies, and gave us one. For dinner to-day we had half a can of mince-meat divided up and served round, which strengthened us somewhat. Just after dinner, during a little squall, and rolling very much, we sprung our mast so badly that it had to be taken down, cut off, and reshipped. The sail also was altered. We may now be said to be on our trade-wind. Our rigging, like ourselves, is rather weak, however. I believe I have not before stated that, in getting this long-boat off the ship's deck, a large hole was stove on the starboard side of the keel; it has been calked the best we could, but still we have to keep one man bailing all the while. One of the quarter-boats also had an oar-handle stove through her. We have headed to-day about northwest, which is perhaps well, for we hope we have casting enough to make some of

* A young sister.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the isles; if not, we are in better position to be picked up.

May 22.—Last night wind headed us off, so that part of the time we had to steer east-southeast, and then west-northwest, and so on. This morning we were all startled by a cry of "Sail ho!" Sure enough, we could see it! And for a time we cut adrift from the second mate's boat, and steered so as to attract its attention. This was about half past 5 A.M. After sailing in a state of high excitement for almost twenty minutes we made it out to be the chief mate's boat. Of course we were glad to see them and have them report all well; but still it was a bitter disappointment to us all. Now that we are in the trades it seems impossible to make northing enough to strike the isles. We have determined to do the best we can, and get in the route of vessels. Such being the determination it became necessary to cast off the other boat, which, after a good deal of unpleasantness, was done, we again dividing water and stores, and taking Cox into our boat. This makes our number fifteen. The second mate's crew wanted to all get in with us and cast the other boat adrift. It was a very painful separation. This afternoon caught a booby.

May 23.—A good breeze all night, allowing us to head about northwest or a little better. Took a longitude observation this morning, but the sun was overclouded at noon, so we could make out neither latitude nor longitude. Our chances as we go west increase in regard to being picked up, but each day our scanty fare is so much reduced. Without the fish, turtle, and birds sent us, I do not know how we should have got along. The other day I offered to read prayers morning and evening for the Captain, and last night commenced. The men, although of various nationalities and religions, are very attentive, and always uncovered. May God grant my weak endeavor its issue! Sea much gone down, and altogether a comfortable day; wind regular trade, allowing us to head about northwest. Sun obscured nearly all day. We want a few good showers to fill up our cask, now twice heavily drawn upon in supplying the departing boats. These, however, I hope and trust will be sent in good time. We as yet suffer little from thirst, having as a ration about half a tumbler a meal; besides, since the trades set in it is not so hot or languid. No boobies nor fish to-day. I am afraid our chance for fish after this is small, as few here bite at a trolling hook, and we have a fresh wind almost all the time. Turtles will be scarce also. However, I hope for birds.

May 24.—Latitude 14° 18′ N. Headed about northwest all day. In the afternoon heavy sea, with promise of a bad night. No birds or fish. Can of oysters for dinner, which gave five oysters a piece and three spoonfuls of juice, which, with an eighth of a biscuit,* made our allowance, with about a gill of water. Such is our fare. God have mercy upon us all! We are all plainly getting weaker—there is no blinding ourselves to that sorrowful truth. Our best hope is to the westward, in the track of ships, and let go the isles, as we waste twice the time tacking for them. Such is the Captain's notion. Ah, how I wish I had striven to get the rest of my whisky! A spoonful of brandy with water has a marked effect upon us all. All the evening had a heavy and cobbling sea.

May 25.—Last night was a very hard one till about 4 A.M., the sea breaking over our weather side, making every thing wet and uncomfortable; nor was the day any better. I think hardly any one managed to keep entirely dry. Sun not fully out all day. Tried, but could get no observation. These are splendid trades for a ship, but too much for our crank craft. Nothing particular happened to-day. My cramped position makes lying one way any length of time almost impossible, and one is sore almost all over. Plenty of flying-fish about, but none disposed to come aboard. Passed at some distance a spar, but not near enough to see what it was. Saw also some whales blow. Weather misty, with very fine rain, which is penetrating. Good prospect of just such another night as last. Great difference noticeable in the men in regard to close steering and keeping a dry boat. Though our meals are very slight and poor, men were never more eager for them or appreciated them better than we do.

May 26.—Latitude 15° 50′. Last night much more comfortable than the one before this. Occasionally we took some water. In the first watch (the watches are kept up, four six-hour watches in a day) a large flying-fish came aboard, and at about 4 A.M. we caught a booby, which will do for our dinners to-day. Both fish and flesh we have to eat raw after drying or baking in the sun (which has been so far a good hot one). The men grow weaker, and, I think, despondent; they say very little, though. We can not do better with the boat than sail within eight points of the wind, particularly as the trades bring considerable sea, which aids to head us off. This beating is out of the question. It seems our best chance to get in and lie in the track of ships, with the hope that some one will run near enough our speck to see it. I fear for the other two boats, for the sea we had Thursday night and Friday was very hard for them. I hope they stood west, and are picked up.

Sunday, May 27.—Latitude 16° 0′ 5″; longitude, by chronometer, 117° 22′. Our fourth Sunday! When we left the ship we reckoned on having about ten days' supplies, and now we hope to be able, by rigid economy, to make them last another week if possible. Last night the sea was comparatively quiet, but the wind headed us off to about west-northwest, which has been about our course all day to-day. Another flying-fish came aboard last night, and one more to-day—both small ones. No birds. A booby is a great catch, and a good large one makes a small dinner for the fifteen of us—that

* Say a piece the size of an ordinary percussion-cap box.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 is, of course, as dinners go in the Hornet's long-boat. Tried this morning to read the full service to myself with the communion, but found it too much; am too weak, and get sleepy, and can not give strict attention; so I put off half until this afternoon. I trust God will hear the prayers gone up for us at home to-day, and graciously answer them by sending us succor and help in this our season of deep distress. The ship was fired by carelessly drawing some varnish with an open lamp in hand, the barrel of varnish being in the "booby-hatch," where are stored spare sails, rigging, etc. Orders had been given to have it on deck to open.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

May 28.—Wind light and sea smooth last night, so that all hands, I hope, got a good six hours' rest. This day wind freshened, enabling us to head about northwest. A good day for seeing a ship, but none to be seen. I still feel pretty well, but my legs are very weak. Henry bears up and keeps strength the best of any aboard, I think, thank God! My earnest prayer is that he may be saved at any rate, and restored. Our only chance is in being picked up, unless providentially provided with more provisions in the shape of fish or birds, which now seem more and more scarce. I do not feel despondent at all, for I fully trust that the Almighty will hear our and the home prayers, and He who suffers not a sparrow to fall sees and cares for us, His creatures.

May 29.—Good breeze last night, and not very rough after 9 o'clock. The moon is of great benefit to us, and a cheering comrade. I am sorry it is now on the wane. To-day we changed to two meals a day, thereby to lengthen out our scanty stores as long as possible. We are all wonderfully well and strong, comparatively speaking, thanks to God and the good fare we had on board the ship. All the men are hearty and strong; even the ones that were down sick are well, except poor Peter, who had to be left to the second mate's boat. The two boats are ere this saved, or I fear for them. We have here a man who might have been a duke had not political troubles banished him from Denmark. He is one of our best men; have to-day quite enjoyed a chat with him. The rest, including "Harry" (Frenchman), seem rather callous to their condition. All seem attentive to our morning and evening prayers, which Henry reads, his voice being strongest. There is no complaining or swearing aboard, which is a great comfort. Henry and I have quiet little evening chats, which are of great comfort and consolation to us, even though they are on very painful subjects. Latitude 16° 44′ N.; longitude (chron.) 119° 20′.

["Reduced ration to a quarter of a biscuit a day to each man. Two quarts bread crumbs left, one-third of a ham, three small cans of oysters, and twenty gallons of water."—Captain's Log.]

May 30.—Latitude 17° 17′. Last night a comparatively quiet one. Had a good breeze, which enabled us to head about north-northwest. The result shows for itself in our latitude to-day—made over 33 miles of northing since yesterday's observation. Shipped but little water, so all hands did some sleeping. This noon, upon general agreement, we have changed our course to west by north. Our reasons for this are good: We are just in the latitude of a group of islands—the "American Group"—though a long way east of them; our prevailing wind (trade) is from northeast; our chance is equally good of seeing vessels; and, lastly, by sailing "free" we do not waste time, which, as our provisions are very low, is a great object. It is a hard scratch and a long six hundred and fifty miles, but is, all in all, our best course. It is perfectly useless to try to beat to windward with this boat, so the other isles (the Revillagiegado Group) are of no account to us. Our ration at 9 A.M. yesterday was a piece of ham two inches square, and about as thin as it could be cut, and one-eighth of a biscuit, with about a gill of water. At 5 P.M. we had about a quarter of a biscuit, five oysters (which constitute one-fifteenth of a can), one and a half tablespoonfuls of the juice, and a gill of water. Our stores, however, will not stand even two such meals a day as the above. We have got to reduce the rations further, for our bread is almost gone. We have now left: 1 can of oysters, about 3 pounds of raisins, 1 can of "soup-and-bouillé," less than half a ham, and about 3 pints of biscuit crumbs. God help us and provide for us! Somehow I feel much encouraged by this change of course we inaugurated to-day.

May 31.—Very little to chronicle to-day. Last night was cold, but not very wet. Made good headway all the twenty-four hours. God grant us deliverance soon, in the shape of a ship, or if not, strength to reach the "American Group" of islands! This A.M. the bread-bag was found open and some bread missing. We dislike to suspect any one of such a rascally act, but there is no question that this grave crime has been committed. Two days will certainly finish the remaining morsels. Day obscured until about 3 P.M., when the wind and sea always seem to increase, but afterward generally subside somewhat. We have kept an anxious look-out for vessels all day, but it was all for naught. The hope was vain. The Captain has lost his glasses, and therefore he can not read our pocket prayer-books as much as I think he would like, though he is not familiar with them. He is a good man, and has been most kind to us—almost fatherly. He says if he had been offered the command of the ship sooner he should have brought his two daughters with him. Naturally enough, he is now devoutly thankful he did not.

["Two meals a day: of fourteen raisins and a piece of cracker the size of a cent, for tea; and a gill of water, and a piece of ham and a piece of bread, each the size of a cent, for breakfast."—Captain's Log.]

June 1.—Last night and to-day sea very high and cobbling, breaking over and making us all wet and cold. Weather squally, and there is no doubt that only careful management—with

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

God's protecting care—preserved us through both the night and the day; and really it is most marvelous how every morsel that passes our lips is blessed to us. It makes me think daily of the miracle of the loaves and fishes. Henry keeps up wonderfully, which is a great consolation to me. I somehow have great confidence, and hope that our afflictions will soon be ended, though we are running rapidly across the track of both outward and inward bound vessels, and away from them; our chief hope is a whaler, man-of-war, or some Australian ship. The isles we are steering for are put down in Bowditch, but on my map are said to be doubtful. God grant they may be there!

["Hardest day yet."—Captain's Log.]

June 2.—Latitude 18° 9′. Last night much like previous one—squally and cloudy, with slight showers of rain and a heavy sea. This morning much the same; toward noon, however, the sea went down somewhat, and, although it is still high, it is a great deal more comfortable. The sun, also, was out a good part of the time, which has not been the case for a day or two. It is a great blessing, as it dries us. The charitable breeze keeps off thirst wonderfully, so that we even save water out of our scanty allowances. We see very few birds now except "Mother Cary's chickens;" occasionally a "boatswain," and some sea-birds that keep continually darting about just over the tops of the waves. I can not help thinking of the cheerful and comfortable time we had aboard the Hornet.

["Two days' scanty supplies left—ten rations of water apiece and a little morsel of bread. But the sun shines, and God is merciful."—Captain's Log.]

Sunday, June 3.—Latitude 17° 54′. Heavy sea all night, and from 4 A.M. very wet, the sea breaking over us in frequent sluices, and soaking every thing aft, particularly. All day the sea has been very high, and it is a wonder that we are not swamped. Heaven grant that it may go down this evening! Our suspense and condition are getting terrible. I managed this morning to crawl, more than step, to the forward end of the boat, and was surprised to find I was so weak, especially in the legs and knees. The sun has been out again, and I have dried some things, and hope for a better night.

June 4.—Latitude 17° 6′; longitude 131° 30′. Shipped hardly any seas last night, and to-day the sea has gone down somewhat, although it is still too high for comfort, as we have an occasional reminder that water is wet. The sun has been out all day, and so we have had a good drying. I have been trying for the past ten or twelve days to get a pair of drawers dry enough to put on, and to-day at last succeeded. I mention this to show the state in which we have lived. If our chronometer is any where near right, we ought to see the American Isles to-morrow or next day. If they are not there, we have only the chance, for a few days, of a stray ship, for we can not eke out the provisions more than five or six days longer, and our strength is failing very fast. I was much surprised to-day to note how my legs have wasted away above my knees; they are hardly thicker than my upper arm used to be. Still I trust in God's infinite mercy, and feel sure He will do what is best for us. To survive, as we have done, thirty-two days in an open boat, with only about ten days' fair provisions for thirty-one men in the first place, and these twice divided subsequently, is more than mere unassisted human art and strength could have accomplished or endured.

["Bread and raisins all gone."—Captain's log.

"Men growing dreadfully discontented, and awful grumbling and unpleasant talking is arising. God save us from all strife of men; and if we must die now, take us himself and not embitter our bitter death still more."—Henry's log.]

June 5.—Quiet night and pretty comfortable day, though our sail and block show signs of failing, and need taking down—which latter is something of a job, as it requires the climbing of the mast. We also had had news from forward, there being discontent and some threatening complaints of unfair allowances, etc., all as unreasonable as foolish; still these things bid us be on our guard. I am getting miserably weak, but try to keep up the best I can. If we can not find those isles we can only try to make northwest and get in the track of Sandwich Island bound vessels, living as best we can in the mean time. To-day we changed to one meal, and that at about noon, with a small ration of water at 8 or 9 A.M., another at 12 M., and a third at 5 or 6 P.M.

["Nothing left but a little piece of ham and a gill of water, all round."—Captain's log.

Note secretly passed by Henry to his brother:

"Cox told me last night there is getting to be a good deal of ugly talk among the men against the Captain and us aft. Harry, Jack, and Fred especially. They say that the Captain is the cause of all—that he did not try to save the ship at all, nor to get provisions, and even would not let the men put in some they had, and that partiality is shown us in apportioning our rations aft. Jack asked Cox the other day if he would starve first or eat human flesh. Cox answered he would starve. Jack then told him it would be only killing himself. If we do not find these islands we would do well to prepare for any thing. Harry is the loudest of all."

Reply.—"We can depend on Charley, I think, and Thomas, and Cox, can we not?"

Second Note.—"I guess so, and very likely on Peter—but there is no telling. Charley and Cox are certain. There is nothing definite said or hinted as yet, as I understand Cox; but starving men are the same as maniacs. It would be well to keep a watch on your pistol, so as to have it and the cartridges safe from theft."

Henry's Log, June 5.—"Dreadful forebodings. God spare us from all such horrors! Some of the men getting to talk a good deal. Nothing to write down. Heart very sad."

Henry's Log, June 6.—"Passed some sea-weed, and something that looked like the trunk of an old tree, but no birds; beginning to be afraid islands not there. To-day it was said to the Captain, in the hearing of all, that some of the men would not shrink, when a man was dead, from using the flesh, though they would not kill. Horrible! God give us all full use of our reason, and spare us from such things! From plague, pestilence, and famine, from battle and murder—and from sudden death: Good Lord deliver us!"]

June 6.—Latitude 16° 30′; longitude (chron.)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

134°. Dry night, and wind steady enough to require no change in sail; but this A.M. an attempt to lower it proved abortive. First, the third mate tried and got up to the block, and fastened a temporary arrangement to reeve the halyards through, but had to come down, weak and almost fainting, before finishing; then Joe tried, and after twice ascending, fixed it and brought down the block; but it was very exhausting work, and afterward he was good for nothing all day. The clew-iron which we are trying to make serve for the broken block works, however, very indifferently, and will, I am afraid, soon cut the rope. It is very necessary to get every thing connected with the sail in good, easy running order before we get too weak to do any thing with it.

["Only three meals left."—Captain's Log.]

June 7.—Latitude 16° 35′ N.; longitude 136° 30′ W. Night wet and uncomfortable. To-day shows us pretty conclusively that the American Isles are not here, though we have had some signs that looked like them. At noon we decided to abandon looking any further for them, and to-night haul a little more northerly, so as to get in the way of Sandwich Island vessels, which, fortunately, come down pretty well this way—say to latitude 19° to 20° to get the benefit of the trade-winds. Of course all the westing we have made is gain, and I hope the chronometer is wrong in our favor, for I do not see how any such delicate instrument can keep good time with the constant jarring and thumping we get from the sea. With the strong trade we have, I hope that a week from Sunday will put us in sight of the Sandwich Islands, if we are not saved before that time by being picked up.

June 8.—My cough troubled me a good deal last night, and therefore I got hardly any sleep at all. Still I make out pretty well, and should not complain. Yesterday the third mate mended the block, and this P.M. the sail, after some difficulty, was got down, and Harry got to the top of the mast and rove the halyards through after some hardship, so that it now works easy and well. This getting up the mast is no easy matter at any time with the sea we have, and is very exhausting in our present state. We could only reward Harry by an extra ration of water. We have made good time and course to-day. Heading her up, however, makes the boat ship seas, and keeps us all wet; however, it can not be helped. Writing is a rather precarious thing these times. Our meal to-day for the fifteen consists of half a can of "soup-and-bouille"—the other half is reserved for to-morrow. Henry still keeps up grandly, and is a great favorite. God grant he may be spared!

["A better feeling prevails among the men."—Captain's Log.]

June 9.—Latitude 17° 53′. Finished to-day, I may say, our whole stock of provisions. We have only left a lower end of a ham-bone, with some of the outer rind and skin on. In regard to the water, however, I think we have got ten days' supply at our present rate of allowance. This, with what nourishment we can get from boot-legs and such chewable matter, we hope will enable us to weather it out till we get to the Sandwich Islands, or, sailing in the mean time in the track of vessels thither bound, be picked up. My hope is in the latter—for in all human probability I can not stand the other. Still we have been marvelously protected, and God, I hope, will preserve us all in His own good time and way. The men are getting weaker, but are still quiet and orderly.

Sunday, June 10.—Latitude 18° 40′, longitude 142° 34′. A pretty good night last night, with some wettings, and again another beautiful Sunday. I can not but think how we should all enjoy it at home, and what a contrast is here! How terrible their suspense must begin to be! God grant it may be relieved before very long, and He certainly seems to be with us in every thing we do, and has preserved this boat miraculously; for since we left the ship we have sailed considerably over three thousand miles, which, taking into consideration our meagre stock of provisions, is almost unprecedented. As yet I do not feel the stint of food so much as I do that of water. Even Henry, who is naturally a great water-drinker, can save half of his allowance from time to time, when I can not. My diseased throat may have something to do with that, however.

HENRY FERGUSON'S LOG.*

Sunday, June 10.—Our ham-bone has given us a taste of food to-day, and we have got left a little meat and the remainder of the bone for to-morrow. Certainly never was there such a sweet knuckle-bone, or one which was so thoroughly appreciated. * * * I do not know that I feel any worse than I did last Sunday, notwithstanding the reduction of diet; and I trust that we may all have strength given us to sustain the sufferings and hardships of the coming week. We estimate that we are within 700 miles of the Sandwich Islands, and that our average, daily, is somewhat over 100 miles, so that our hopes have some foundation in reason. Heaven send we may all live to reach land!

June 11.—Ate the meat and rind of our ham-bone, and have the bone and the greasy cloth from around the ham left to eat to-morrow. God send us birds or fish, and let us not perish of hunger, or be brought to the dreadful alternative of feeding on human flesh! As I feel now, I do not think any thing could persuade me; but you can not tell what you will do when you are reduced by hunger and your mind wandering. I hope and pray we can make out to reach the Islands before we get to this strait; but we have one or two pretty desperate men aboard, though they are quiet enough now. It is my firm trust and belief that we are going to be saved.

["All food gone."—Captain's Log.]

June 12.—Stiff breeze, and we are fairly flying—dead ahead of it—and toward the Islands. Good hopes, but the prospects of hunger are

* From this time forward Henry's log is used.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

awful. Ate ham-bone to-day. It is the Captain's birthday—he is 54 years old to-day.

June 13.—The ham-rags are not gone yet, and the boot-legs, we find, are very palatable after we get the salt out of them. A little smoke, I think, does some little good; but I don't know.

June 14.—Hunger does not pain us much, but we are dreadful weak. Our water is getting frightfully low. God grant we may see land soon! Nothing to eat—but feel better than I did yesterday. Toward evening saw a magnificent double-rainbow—the first we had seen. Captain said, "Cheer up, boys, it's a prophecy!—it's the bow of promise!"

June 15.—God be forever praised for His infinite mercy to us! Land in sight! Rapidly neared it, and soon were sure of it.....Two noble Kanakas swam out and took the boat ashore. We were joyfully received by two white men—Mr. Jones and his steward Charley—and a crowd of native men, women, and children. They treated us splendidly—aided us, and carried us up the bank, and brought us water, poi, bananas, and green cocoa-nuts; but the white men took care of us, and prevented those who would have eaten too much from doing so. Every body overjoyed to see us, and all sympathy expressed in faces, deeds, and words. We were then helped up to the house, and help we needed. Mr. Jones and his steward, Charley, are the only white men here. Treated us splendidly. Gave us first about a tea-spoonful of spirits in water, and then to each a cup of hot tea with a little bread. Takes every care of us. Gave us later another cup of tea—and bread the same—and then let us go to rest. It is the happiest day of my life. God, in his mercy, has heard our prayer, and we are saved.....Every body is so kind. Words can not tell—

June 16.—Mr. Jones gave us a delightful bed, and we surely had a good night's rest—but not sleep—we were too happy to sleep. They gave the Captain a little room, and the same to Sam and me, and gave the sitting-room to the men. We enjoyed the night, but did not sleep—would keep the reality, and not let it turn to a delusion—dreaded that we might wake up and find ourselves in the boat again.....

They have told their story, and in their own language. I hardly know which to admire most—the steady persistence and faithfulness with which they kept up their journals through such a weary time, or the unwavering hopefulness they showed from first to last, in the face of the seeming hopelessness of rescue.

They wanted to "doctor" the diaries a little, but it did not appear to me that any emendations were necessary; a careful and elegantly composed log-book, gotten up in the midst of thirst, starvation, and a stormy sea, would seem so strikingly unnatural that its genuineness might reasonably be questioned.

The men were so carefully nursed where they landed (at Laupahoehoe, on the island of Hawaii) that all except one seaman were able to walk about within ten days afterward. Yet in some cases there had been no action of their bowels for twenty and thirty days, and in one case for forty-four days!

With ten days' provisions Captain Mitchell performed this extraordinary voyage of forty-three days and eight hours in an open boat (sailing 4000 miles in reality and 3360 by direct courses), and brought every man safe to land. Each individual day of those six weeks bears its testimony to his watchfulness, his prudence, his cool courage, his foresight, perseverance, and fidelity to his duty, and his rare intelligence. In him are the elements of greatness.

This strange voyage, in its entirety, is an eloquent witness of the watchful presence of an all-powerful Providence, and as such its record carries with it a lesson that can not be valueless. This presence was distinctly manifested on two occasions at least. Henry mentions the fact of the boat going directly before the wind toward the island on the last day. It was getting late. They had to make land that day or perish. They struck boldly for the shore, and when they had got pretty well in they lowered the sail, and afterward, not liking the appearance of the reef, tried to hoist it again and retreat, but they were too feeble to accomplish it, and beheld themselves drifting helplessly upon the rocks after all their toils and hardships. And it was all the better. They swept through an almost imperceptible opening in the coral reef and were saved. There was not another place within thirty-five miles where they could have got to the land or found a human habitation. Every where else a precipice more than a thousand feet high comes down like a wall to the sea, with forty fathoms water at its base, and not even bordered by a strip of ground wide enough for a man to stand upon. The other case is that of Cox. The mate's boat had bidden the Captain's good-by and departed, but came back directly and the Captain was requested to receive a man. Cox came on board, and was the only man who warned the Captain and the passengers afterward, when the conspirators had sworn their lives away.

Before closing, a few words ought to be said about the conspiracy. The Captain says that for many days he had known that a murderous discontent was brewing by the distraught air of some of the men and the guilty look of others, and so he staid on guard—slept no more—kept his hatchet hid and close at hand.

At this time the famishing, ravenous men were cutting boots, handkerchiefs, and shirts into bits and eating them. They had done so for days. They were even eating the staves of the butter-cask. They were wild with hunger. They were in a manner insane, and in the judgment of no just and merciful man responsible for their words or deeds. They afterward dreaded, in Honolulu, that the Captain and passengers would take legal measures against them because of their murderous conspiracy; but their fears were without foundation. These

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

gentlemen well understood the case, and only pitied the men. They insisted for some time that I should leave out all mention of the conspiracy from their published journals. That the men were frenzied is shown by the fact that they told Cox, in a whispered conference at night, that the Captain had all the ship's money in the boat—"a million dollars in gold and silver!"—just about enough to sink such a craft. They were to watch until such time as the Captain might become worn out and fall asleep, and then kill him and the passengers. They were afraid of Ferguson's pistol and the Captain's hatchet, and laid many a plan for getting hold of these weapons. They told Cox they would divide the money with him if he kept quiet and helped, but they would kill him if he exposed them. He refused to join the conspiracy, and they said he should die; and so, after that, day after day and night after night, he did not go to sleep, but kept watch upon them in fear for his life. The Captain and passengers remained under arms, and watched also, but talked pleasantly, and gave no sign that they knew what was in the men's minds. The Captain spoke now and then of his strength holding out being a necessity, since only he could use the chart and the quadrant and find the land.

By way of conclusion it may be well enough to say that up to the present time no tidings have been received of the poor fellows in the missing boats. It seems almost idle, now, to hope that they are saved.

HONOLULU, SANDWICH ISLANDS, July 2, 1866.

HOHENBADEN.

O THAT ride upon the donkeys,
You and Alice, Grace and I,
Up the heights of Hohenbaden!
What can dim its memory?
'Twas a day of rain and sunshine,
As along the leafy way
Slowly gain'd we four the summit
Where the ancient castle lay.

Dear old ruin! lapp'd in wildwood—
Oak and beech and mountain-fir—
Nothing rivals thee in beauty
In the countries far and near!
Strolling 'neath thy weird arches,
Through thy lone and voiceless hall,
Something of the ages vanish'd
Round thee gathers as a pall.

Memories of the past come o'er us,
Dreams of knights and ladyes fair,
When the sound of harp and viol
Rung upon the midnight air;
When within these halls were gathered
Men as brave as trod the earth,
And the days and nights went swiftly
Mid the wassail and the mirth.

Here is still the massive gateway,
Terrace walk, and tower hoar—
Here the shield of Markgraf Bernard
Wrought above the middle door;
But the clang of mailéd armor
Rings no longer in the gloom,
And the knights who trod these chambers
Long have moulder'd in the tomb!

From thy walls the eye roves over
Hill and valley stretch'd below—
Here the Oos glides gently onward,
There the Rhine's bright waters flow;
While the mountains like an army
Close around the quiet scene,
Rising one above another,
Robed in rock and forest green.

There stands Rastadt in the distance;
There lies Murg's secluded vale;
Farther still the Yberg romantic,
Fraught with legendary tale;
Here a flowery meadow glistens,
There a sloping vineyard green,
While the terraced town of Baden
Through the shadowy trees is seen.

In this solitary mountain,
Crumbling slowly to decay,
Linger on, O Hohenbaden,
Charming many a coming day!
May the wanderer mid thy ruins
Still these ancient boundaries trace—
Wall and archway, tower and buttress—
In their pristine strength and grace!

Time indeed will ne'er restore thee
To thy medieval day,
Fête and wassail here are over,
Clos'd fore'er the bloody fray;
At thy lofty vine-drap'd windows
Ne'er shall knight or lady fair
Gaze abroad at break of morning,
Linger in the sunset air.

Other steps and other voices
In thy silent halls resound;
From thy broken walls and towers
Other eyes are gazing round;
Here proud Albion's sons and daughters,
Here pale wanderers o'er the main,
Come to muse of vanish'd glories
Never to return again!

O that ride upon the donkeys,
You and Alice, Grace and I,
Up the heights of Hohenbaden!
What can dim its memory?
'Twas a day of rain and sunshine,
As along the leafy way
Slowly gain'd we four the summit
Where the ancient castle lay.

C. C. Cox.

Baden-Baden.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BEHIND THE SCENES.

FROM the night when my father took me to see Forrest as Sparticus, in the Gladiator—oh, ever so many years ago, at the old Federal Street Theatre in Boston—theatricals have had for me an undiminished fascination. I was a mere school-boy at the time, and the first inside view of a theatre, with its dazzling lights, its tier on tier of gilt and paint, its crowd of people, its mysterious "green curtain," its pompous "drop" curtain, and finally the splendor of its stage effects, the acting, and the play itself—these furnished such an unexpected and marvelous scene of enchantment, that memory turns to it even now, when judgment and experience have long since formed more correct estimates of the matter, with genuine satisfaction. From that memorable night forward the word "theatre" had a magic sound to me, and long before my school-days were over I had become actor and manager in more than one "Dramatic Corps," whose juvenile performances in various attics and barns never failed to "bring down the house" with rapturous applause.

The most successful "establishment" with which I was connected in that inexperienced season of youth we named the "Star Theatre." It was located in Wilkins's mother's garret. We had tried the garrets of other boys' mothers, but had seldom succeeded in performing more than once in each place. Either we made "too much noise altogether, boys," and disturbed the household beneath; or it was found that the stair-carpets were too rapidly wearing out under the constant tread of the dramatic corps in going up and down at rehearsals; or else the smell of the painted scenery, or the too great absorption of the chairs and sofas from bedrooms and parlors to furnish seats for the audience: these, or kindred objections, drove us about from house to house without rest for the sole of our buskins. At last that model of all patience and forbearance, Wilkins's mother, permitted something like a permanent establishment of the drama in her third-story attic.

I think we had some dozen performances, and eminently successful they were too. I remember that the Forty Thieves had a decided run of three successive Saturday afternoons. It was an exceedingly gorgeous affair. Charley Munson (denominated in the play-bills "Signor Palletti") painted the scenery, and Wilkins's sister (denominated Signora Festooni) made the costumes as well as the stage curtain. The robbers' cave was pronounced to be the most remarkable imitation of nature on the modern stage. As we had but eight performers in all, and could only spare four of them for thieves, the entrance of the "forty" into the enchanted cave was accomplished by reduplication; that is, as soon as one got into the cave and out of sight, he would stealthily creep round behind the scenes, and appear again before the audience, repeating the performance until the magic number was accomplished.

Before "the season" was over—which, by-the-way, was prematurely brought to a close by a serious contretemps—we had ascended from Melodrama to the walks of Tragedy. Othello, if it had not been for a white smutch occurring on the nose of the jealous Moor while in the act of smothering Desdemona (and which created a titter and cries of "Black your nose, Hopkins!" from the audience), was a great success. So was Macbeth, only we had no trap-door for the benefit of the ghosts, and Banquo was obliged to conceal himself beneath the "banquet table," which, unfortunately, he upset in rising therefrom, causing three of Wilkins's mother's Bohemian finger-bowls, which served as royal goblets, and her favorite cut-glass fruit-dish to come to an untimely end. Appalled at the mischief done, the actors "stood not upon the order of their going, but went at once," and in this way the "Star Théatre" set, to rise no more.

From imitation to the real thing is a natural consequence in the experience of man. As school-boy days gave place to the more independent and adventurous periods of the college and the law-office, the theatre itself became the tempting place of resort whenever my pocket-money and a spare evening permitted that indulgence. From the "front of the house" curiosity soon led me to desire to penetrate the mysteries of the stage; and how to get behind the scenes during a performance was for a long period the subject of the most anxious investigation. I knew that no "outsiders" had a right there, and also that a stern-faced man sat nightly at the stage-door in the rear of the theatre scrutinizing the face of every one that entered. Besides this, I had seen, as I stood in the dark alley leading thereto, a notice conspicuously posted over the door, which stated in unmistakable terms that there was "No admittance except for persons having business with the Manager." This, however, gave me the necessary hint. Could I not make some "business with the manager?"

Days of thought, I remember, were given to this subject which should have been directed exclusively to the copying of legal documents in the office of my employer, Thomas Trust, Esq., Counselor, etc., No. 3 Court Square. The result of my cogitations was a resolve, and the result of the resolve a practical success. One night I advanced boldly up the alley leading to the stage-door as if on business bent, and without a shade of expectant curiosity in my appearance. There sat the Argus-eyed porter, but I pretended not to see him as I walked rapidly past with a legal-looking bundle of papers, tied with red tape, in my hand. I had scarcely got three steps, however, into the mystery of mysteries before I was brought to with a—

"Halloo, there! who do you want?"

"Mr. B——, the manager. Is he on the stage?"

"Well, yes, he's on the stage; but he can't see nobody now, 'cause the play's goin' on. You'll have to call to-morrow morning."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"All right!" I said; "I'll call to-morrow morning. Let's see—what time's rehearsal?"

"Ten o'clock; you'll be sure to see him then."

So off I went. One point had been gained; the porter knew my face—knew I had business with the manager, and I had actual permission to go on the stage. Next day, promptly at ten, I was there. With a familiar nod and a "good-morning" I passed the Cerberus of the stage-door, and in a moment after stood in the "wings" upon the actual stage of a veritable theatre.

Ah, what disenchantment that stage by daylight! Gloom every where; a height of gloom above, a depth of gloom behind, a vast semicircle of gloom in the direction of the boxes. I found myself standing like a pigmy between towering sheets of daubed canvas stretched upon frames, like gigantic scaffolds, and smelling atrociously of paint and oil. With the scenery drawn closely back into the "wings," the stage spread its tremendous proportions, and made the one little solitary table by the foot-lights, and the manager sitting by it, most insignificant. A few seedy-looking gentlemen with their hats on were standing listlessly about, and three or four women in woolen shawls and plain bonnets, made up the group on the stage. Apparently they were receiving their parts as given out by the manager, and discussing some changes to be adopted in the play before the rehearsal commenced. Where, thought I, where has the glory of the last night fled to? What has become of the "rustic mill and waterfall"—the gigantic and purple-tinted mountains with the wonderful aerial perspective which enchanted the eye? Where is the "Grand Hall" of the Palace with its vista of colored column, its gorgeous drapery, its elaborate and massive appointments? Where the singing peasants in short skirts and ribbons—the courtiers with cloaks of purple and scarlet and wonderful truncative legs? Where the ravishing ladies with rustling silks and bejeweled arms and dulcet voices? Fled, fled like a fairy scene that will not bear the daylight—like the blushes and the glances of the ball-room belle as she rolls homeward in the solitude and the gloom of the early dawn!

Yet around me were all the elements which made up the gorgeousness of the last night's spectacle. The tall, dreary, dauby, stretch of canvas beside which I stood did not appear to have a distinguishable form or line of grace upon it; heavy clots of coarse paint in masses of confused color. Yet this was the identical "Enchanted Palace" of the night before! Flat, unsightly, meaningless as it was to me in the shades of daylight, how illusive and magnificent would it have appeared if but the row of foot-lights had been relighted and I had removed to that necessary "distance" which "lends enchantment to the view!" The thin, sallow, unhealthy-looking individual, in a napless white hat and dirty yellow gloves, who was at that moment remarking to the middle-aged woman in a black pinch bonnet that "butchers' meat was getting excessively dear," was the "Grand Duke" of that Enchanted Palace, only last evening rolling in riches incalculable, and rolling his r's with irresistible tragic effect. The sad, tired-looking woman to whom he was speaking was the "Princess of Beauty" who beamed and smiled upon the audience beneath a sparkling diadem of precious "paste." She held a child by the hand, a wan and sickly thing, the rouge not yet thoroughly washed off its little face. Where were its fairy wings with which it floated in the moonlight and fluttered over the flowers? Probably laid away in the "property" room with the cord which would again that night suspend her between earth and heaven—the painted earth and painted heaven of the stage.

I was absorbed in the contemplation of this phenomena, and had almost forgotten the manager and the pretense which had brought me there, when, out of the dusk and the gloom, an inexpressibly sweet voice addressed me:

"Please, Sir, are you the manager?"

It was a neatly-dressed and most attractive young woman. She had just come in, and was evidently a novice in the place. I was on the point of directing her to where the manager sat, when a thought occurred to me: "I'll make capital out of this; release myself from the awkward position in which I am placed, and secure a permanent 'footing' behind the scenes."

"Well, no, Miss," I answered, "I'm not the manager; but if you'll tell me your business I'll secure you an interview."

"I called, Sir, in consequence of the advertisement for ballet-girls for the new spectacle, and would like to make an engagement if I suit. I can do very well in third parts, I think."

"Let me see," said I, with unblushing assurance, but with a feeling of genuine interest in the modest young creature, "what name shall I present you by, and where is your residence, in case of future reference?"

"Mary Steele, No. 10 Sweet-Briar Lane. My mother takes in fine-sewing, and I have two little brothers to support. I need an engagement badly, Sir; I hope you're not full."

"You spoke of your mother. What does your father do?"

"I have no father, Sir; he died two years ago."

Ah! thought I; quite an interesting case for young benevolence. No father!—of course she needs a protector. She should need one no longer: yes, I would take personal supervision of this rose-bud of Sweet-Briar Lane. Telling Mary to call me "Mr. Tomlinson," I advanced with her to the manager's table and introduced her as a young lady particularly accomplished and exceedingly exemplary: hoped the manager would be able to offer liberal terms, and represented the case in every possible combination of favorable lights. Mary got an appointment for the next day at rehearsal to exhibit her Terpsichorian qualifications, and of course "Mr. Tomlinson" was present on the occasion to watch the progress of his protégée. The re-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

sult was a permanent and very satisfactory engagement for Mary Steele, who appeared in the play-bills as "Mademoiselle Stephano;" and the young lady looked upon me thenceforward as her guardian friend and patron. In her private life she was most exemplary, and a few years afterward she married very respectably.

By this impromptu acquaintance I was able at any time to get behind the scenes and indulge my curiosity in all that pertains to that life which is so little known in its private relations by the outside world. For many years after Mary Steele's connection with the theatre ceased I indulged the occasional habit of "dropping in" at the stage door, and, quietly ensconced between the side scenes, would watch the mimic battle of life apart from its glittering delusions. In this way I saw much of Forrest, Charles Kean, the elder Vandenhoff, Macready, Miss Cushman, Celeste, in the popular days of the French Spy; Fanny Ellsler, Mrs. Wood the vocalist, so famous in "Somnambula," and stars of lesser magnitude.

I remember that Forrest, when he played Damon, had a small table and mirror placed in "the wings" to assist him in his "make-up" without losing time in going to his dressing-room. In the scene where Damon rushes violently upon the stage, just in time to reach and save his Pythias, it is necessary to impart to his face the appearance of great heat and physical excitement. Forrest stood at his little table and mirror rubbing smutches of black under his eyes and daubs of red powder over his forehead and cheeks, at the same time stamping his feet violently upon the floor and uttering the exclamations supposed to be those of Damon "advancing rapidly from a distance;" then, raising the voice to a higher and more distinct utterance, he would drop the powder and the hare's foot upon the table and rush upon the stage with half-broken ejaculations and fall into the arms of Pythias. To stand where I did behind the scene and hear the burst of applause from the audience in front was a combination of ludicrous absurdity difficult to describe to those who have not been similarly placed.

Vandenhoff, the elder, made a deeper impression on my mind as an actor of feeling than any of his distinguished contemporaries. He was very refined and eminently courteous; a gentleman by nature, a tragedian by intuitive impulse. I followed his every moment with intense interest, and looked up to him with a species of veneration. He seemed the "noble Roman" as much at rehearsals as when he trod the stage in his white flowing toga. I confess that it somewhat diminished the majesty of the scene to hear him before "going on" give his instructions to the supernumeraries who represented the Roman populace; yet I never failed to notice with what kindliness of manner he addressed these useful auxiliaries. It struck me as very ludicrous to hear him one night, previous to his entrance as Brutus in the conspiracy scene of Julius Cæsar, direct the man in shirt-sleeves, who was to manage the lightning (by blowing lighted rosin through a tube), when to emit the "whizzing exhalations." "When I say to Lucius, Look in the calendar and bring me word, then give us a flash, and when I say"—repeating another passage—"then give us a flash." When in the last scene Brutus kills himself upon his sword, how gracefully and effectively did Vandenhoff accomplish the act, covering his face with his toga as he fell. After the green curtain had descended I remember being impressed with the courteousness of the scene as several actors simultaneously stepped forward and lifted the tragedian from his prostrate position, which attention he acknowledged with a quiet "Thank you, gentlemen," and "good-night all," as he proceeded to his dressing-room.

Macready was another of the refined gentlemen of the stage, whose interpretation of Shakspeare evinced the most patient and scholarly research. To hear him read the great dramatist was, however, far more satisfactory to me than to see him on the boards. As an actor he was mechanical and studied. It is said that he measured his distances and counted his steps, and consequently never made the slightest variation in his stage walk and positions. This I hold to be incompatible with genuine inspiration, which, varying, of course, with circumstances and with the physical condition of the performer at different times, must lead to occasional variety of attitude and style. In private conversation Macready carried with him the same rigidity of manner and studied delivery of his words. Behind the scenes he was very taciturn, cold, and reserved, speaking only upon the business of the stage. He was a rigid disciplinarian, and would be severely impatient at any shortcomings on the part of others, or if any thing went wrong in the stage performance. On these accounts he was far from being popular among his fellow-actors, and I have heard the severest language employed against him by those who supported him on the stage.

One of the most memorable evenings in my experiences at the theatre was that on which Fanny Ellsler made her first appearance before an American audience. The house was, of course, "packed," and hundreds were unable to obtain admission.' Never shall I forget the moment of intense stillness which preceded her entrance on the stage, or the tremendous tour de force with which she bounded from the "wings" to the centre of the stage, in the cloud of gauze, and with the transparent wings of the Sylphide. The pale, beautiful face, the spirituelle expression of the features, the exquisite limbs, the poetry of every motion, sent a thrill to each heart, and for a moment or two utterly prevented the applause which at last burst like a storm from every part of the crowded theatre.

The next morning I went behind the scenes at rehearsal, and observing on the stage a middle-aged and excessively emaciated woman in a blanket shawl and old bonnet, assuming consid-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

erable authority in the arrangements going on, I inquired who she was.

"Why, Fanny Ellsler, of course," was the reply.

So far as my experience went I never observed a look, word, or action behind the scenes in keeping with the character represented before the foot-lights. The moment the actor made his "exit" he unbent, assumed his natural action and style of conversation—not always the most dignified—and seemed to take no thought of the business before him until he went on again in character. Occasionally some one behindhand in his part would keep the play-book constantly in hand, poring over the text and committing it to memory, then suddenly fling it from him between the scenes and "go on" in his character. I found it very often the case that not a word had been studied until the performer had dressed for his part and descended to the stage; then the text would be committed for the first scene only, and so on as the play progressed. Very many seemed to depend almost entirely upon the "prompter," and I have heard the latter often give the performer on the stage word for word through the entire play without the fact transpiring to the audience.

If the instructions enunciated from the wings, and the private remarks between the actors on the stage, could be interpolated with the text of the play-book, the reading would be most curious and amusing; as for example—the "asides" being in italics:

HAMLET. Can you play upon this flute? Let it alone—you're not to take it.

HAMLET (to Ghost). Go on. I'll follow thee. Why don't you move on?

MARCELLUS. You shall not go, my lord.

HAMLET. Take hold of me. Hold off your hands.

HORATIO. Be ruled; you shall not go.

HAMLET. My fate cries out, and makes each petty artery in this body as hardy as the Nemean lion's nerve. Don't let go yet. Still am I called. Keep hold. Unhand me, gentlemen. Let go now. By heaven! I'll make a ghost of him that lets me. I say away! Go on. I'll follow thee. Why the d—l don't you go?

(Hamlet to Laertes at the grave of Ophelia.)

HAMLET. This is I, Hamlet the Dane. (Leaps into grave.)

LAERTES. The devil take thy soul!

HAMLET. Thou prayest not well. Take hold of my throat. I pr'ythee take thy fingers from my throat;—Not yet—for, though I am not splenetive and rash, yet have I in me something dangerous, which let thy wisdom fear. Shake me a little. Hold off thy hand, etc. Now let go.

HORATIO. Good my Lord, be quiet.

HAMLET. Why, I will fight with him upon this theme —Get off my toes!—until my eyelids will no longer wag.

(Hamlet and Laertes fencing.)

HAMLET. Come on, Sir. Strike slower. That's right. Now under. One—

LAERTES. No.

HAMLET. Judgment.

LAERTES. Well, again—When am I to hit you?

HAMLET. I'm to hit you first; I'll tell you when. Another hit; what say you?

LAERTES. Have at you now. Move round to my left; exchange swords; all right; now hit me; that 'll do.

And that will do also as a feeble illustration; but the subject might be elaborated to a most amusing extent.

Scenes in the "Green-Room" of the theatre have been frequently described, and are familiar to most readers. Nothing can be more absurd than the collections of costumed men and women which I have seen there during the performance of a play. Kings and bishops coquetting with soubrettes and ballet-girls; the funny man of the farce dilating, with tears in his eyes, on his domestic miseries; and ghosts regaling their mortal appetites with spiritual appliances. Then the witticisms, the compliments, the Joe Millarisms, and the titterings of those who see the joke, mingling with the grumblings of others who are ever finding fault with the manager or the play, or picking flaws in the character of that never-popular individual behind the scenes—however popular he may be before them—the "Star" of the evening.

Let me conclude these fragmentary reminiscences by paying a slight tribute to that important class of the community, the actors. In an experience of years, during which I have been a not infrequent witness of the performances behind the scenes of the theatre, I have never witnessed an immoral act or a vulgar proceeding. The restraints of the stage naturally produce relaxation of mind and body in the Green-Room, but I have seldom had even my tastes offended, and the exceptional instances have been equally condemned by those who witnessed them. As a general rule, great courtesy and kindliness of disposition characterize the personal intercourse of those whose business it is to play their mimic parts for our amusement. The actor is by force of circumstances a patient and enduring man, and by association and sympathy he is naturally liberal in his views and generous in his dealings with others. To enable a man to act even creditably he must possess an intelligent appreciation of his author, and a more than general comprehension of the relations of social life. Hence it is that the cultivated and well-bred comedian is a very desirable acquaintance for the man of letters or the student of society.

In the selection of any associates discrimination is of course a necessity, and this is imperative in the case before us, for the stage has its lower as well as its upper strata of morality and intelligence. But by society at large the condition of the actor as a man of value in the community is immensely underrated, and the moral delinquencies of the stage prodigiously exaggerated. In my opinion the vicious element in the theatre is proportionably much less behind than before the curtain, and the moral influence of the stage (a subject frequently discussed) is as valuable to the audiences which collect there as is the church to the congregations which gather there. The pulpit preaches to professed Christians, while sinners—those who most need the examples of vice and virtue to be illustrated for their benefit—are seldom drawn to the house of worship. As a rule, the dramas which best succeed are those which in the most graphic style depict the fall of evil and the triumph of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google good. The paint and the dazzle, the mock jewelry and the mimic movements, have nothing of evil in them, since they are known to be deceptive, and but external appliances wherewith to illustrate the sentiment and the moral. Compared to olden days the stage is free from looseness and profanity, and the audiences from proximity to barefaced vice. The taste for theatrical representations is inherent and permanent in all communities, and therefore he who denounces the stage, or keeps away from the theatre simply because it bears that title, is eminently absurd and wrong. The purification of the stage rests with the public, its supporters, and it can be made a temple worthy of honest and earnest support, if a mistaken sentiment shall not check its possible influence for good by denouncing it as an irreparable source of all that is evil.

TO BEGINNERS IN BOOKWRITING.

O THAT mine adversary had written a book! was the earnest exclamation of the patriarch Job. Had that most patient man lived in modern times it is lots to blanks but that his desire would have been gratified—that is, assuming his adversary had arrived at the years of discretion. Whether it be or be not a discreet thing to write a book, is a question the writer of this article will not undertake to decide. It is to be hoped, however, that before Job expressed the above wish he had ascertained the fact that his adversary was capable of writing a book. As there are many who need information upon that subject, the following regulations are submitted to them for their instruction by an ancient Bohemian:

RULE I. "Write a book which will sell."

The public exclaim against the character of the light literature of the day, but they buy it. Their preaching differs from their practice. It is not just to condemn those who are sometimes reluctantly compelled to supply their demands. The creation of a purer national taste rests with the clergyman and the schoolmaster; it is by no means the sole duty of the professional author, and, when it enters into the calculations of the publisher, he must place it, at present, on the debit side of his ledger. Serious discourses are excellent if the people would only purchase them; but no work looks well to a bookseller which remains long on his shelves. As things are, then, it will be well for young authors to remember

RULE II. "The public prefer morality in small doses."

Shameless! exclaims the unsophisticated reader; to which the writer gravely replies, Amen! the only difference between us being as to whether the shame rests on the author or the public. To the genuine Bohemian sermons or stories are a means to an end. If, gentle reader, you prefer candy to bread, that is your affair, but your wants must be supplied. Blame not the caterer, then, but your own appetite, which craves dainties and rejects more nutritious food. This brings us to

RULE III. "Secure all the pecuniary results of your labors."

The compensation required for the copyright is the principal item under this law, but there are others nearly equally important. In order to obtain the latter, the writer of this article, when he projected the compilation of a work of fiction, found it requisite to institute a tariff, and to enact other necessary regulations beneficial both to himself and the public, previous to commencing his manuscript. These laws he now begs respectfully to introduce for the benefit of the younger members of the literary fraternity. The work in question was entitled "The Smith Family," and for it the following schedule of duties was drawn up, with the reasons for establishing the same:

THE TARIFF.

It is certainly both correct and commendable that the writer of this history should, in the matter of imposts, follow the example set him by all civilized potentates. Whether it be politic to rob all the Peters in the country to pay a few of the Pauls, or to make Sam carry the bricks to build Jack's mill with, is left to other philosophers to settle, if ever they get through with their fighting. The writer of this being in Rome, is not to be blamed for doing as Romans do. The truth of this axiom, it is manifest, is equally applicable to Bohemia and Bohemians. Therefore, after due consideration, it is solemnly declared:

SEC. I., Case 1. That any article of merchandise which, with the name of its vendor, receives in this history "honorable mention," shall be taxed 25 per cent. ad valorum. But it is understood that in no instance, under this case, shall the "honorarium" be less than two dollars.

Case 2. If comparisons be instituted favorable to the same, 10 per cent. additional.

Case 3. If elaborated, the gross amount of the duty payable must be referred to the generosity of the parties implicated, care being taken to select only responsible and open-hearted individuals for such experiment: therefore, if, in the course of this narration, an article of jewelry should be depicted whose elegance of form, chastity of design, and delicacy of manipulation, should betray the genius and workmanship of the great house of Square, White, and Co., it is to be hoped that in return those gentlemen will not betray the confidence that is reposed in their honor, but assess themselves for the same in due and proper proportion.

Case 4. If, in addition to honorable mention, comparison, and elaboration, the article in question should form an integral part of the work, and the address of the vendor be inserted, although this may be considered as partially provided for under Case 3, it is submitted that it would be desirable for the duty to take the form of an annuity terminable with the life of the narrator: therefore

If a malefactor should have the hardihood to assault any member of the "Smith Family," and should be discovered, by having wrongfully in his possession a superb hat of the most perfect shape, texture, and make, which also is peculiarly distinguishable by its label, "Blows, the Hatter:" and which notification should prove to be the means of avenging the innocent and bringing the guilty to justice; the manufacturer spoken of must not be astonished if, the day after publication of this schedule, he should behold a Bohemian walk into his gorgeous store, and, in returning his courteous salutation, uncover a cranium with singular promptitude and respect.

[Note.—In all cases levies of this kind should be directly and personally applied for, and all fines under this section rigidly prosecuted. If they be not speedily liquidated all preceding statements must be in-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google stantly ridiculed and contradicted in a statesmanlike manner.]

CONTRABAND ARTICLES.

The parties of whom it is purposed to treat in this projected work being men and women, a true and faithful description of the same will of necessity exclude all ideas of perfection in any way, shape, or manner: therefore—

SEC. II., Case 1. Heroic perfection, either in male or female, is positively prohibited.

1. Because it is not attainable by any member of the "Smith" family.

2. Because, if it were attainable, it would be inexpedient, inasmuch as it would exclude its possessor from the joys of Paradise; as it would preclude the possibility of repentance.

3. Because, though very common in fiction, it is—to speak with discretion—more than uncommon in fact.

[Note.—Virtuous Dogs, Horses, etc., which may be mentioned, are not treated of under this rule.]

SEC. III. All spiritual manifestations, of any shape, sort, class, or kind whatever, are totally interdicted.

1. Because it is certain that happy or even contented spirits will have no desire to revisit the world, inasmuch as their comfort or felicity would not be enhanced by the contemplation of our unquiet and misery. Therefore, it is submitted that their presence among us can not reasonably be expected.

2. Because those spirits who are appointed to purge away their sins previously committed, if there be any such, ought, as a matter of duty, to remain where they are and perform that operation, and not be wasting their time in making excursions to the earth.

3. Because those spirits who are under condemnation have no business to be breaking the bounds of their prison and making night hideous here. Furthermore, if they can escape from their punishment, which is doubtful, it is certain that their company would be neither desirable nor profitable. For these reasons all ghosts, spectres, and disembodied spirits are declared contraband.

[Note.—It is not intended under this head to close the pages of this history to those who believe in, resort to, or traffic with such appearances: therefore, be it remembered,

That all Mesmerizers, Phrenologists, Biologists, Spiritualists, Madmen, Crazymen, Fools, and Idiots are not included under the above interdict: inasmuch as it would never answer to exclude from this work so considerable a portion of the human family.]

In addition to the above ordinances the following resolutions are declared, and will be enforced with regard to the compilation of the "Smith Family:"

1. That the modern method of commencing at the middle or end of a subject is not circumspect; but that the right way is to begin at the beginning and terminate with the termination.

2. That when another author's ideas are stolen it is only just to present them as originally written, and not to deface them with omissions, additions, or alterations.

3. That when an author indites a sentence he can not himself understand he pays the very highest compliment to the capacities of his readers.

4. That a woman can be amiable without being a fool, and that no man who is a devil can be considered a gentleman.

5. That gross villains shall not be deified; and, whatever it may be in fact, in fiction it is not fitting that sermons or serious discourses shall be delivered by malefactors.

6. That even the sanguinary public ought not, in romances, to be pampered with homicides in greater proportion than six to one marriage.

7. That a man or woman in a dying condition should not be permitted to marry, and that any contract made under such circumstances ought to be pronounced by the reading community null and void.

8. That it is the duty of Bohemians to be silent with regard to the company they keep; and that therefore thieves' jargon, not being edifying, is positively prohibited.

9. That uncommon modes of death be sparingly indulged in, and that the late ravages of spontaneous combustion be terminated.

10. That a human being who is positively killed shall remain dead: this is absolutely necessary for the repose of society.

11. That, if a little learning be a dangerous thing, a little French is a very dangerous thing.

12. That, if a hero retires to rest in New York, it is as well not to give him his breakfast in Seringapatam.

13. That a proper respect for the best feelings of humanity forbids the closing of a chapter in the middle of a murder.

14. That the inhabitants of Ceylon ought not to be allowed to indulge themselves in the luxury of skating; and that the people of Greenland should not be suffered to gorge themselves with pine-apples. At the same time the characters in this book ought neither to be starved by the lack of proper food, nor surfeited by eternally banqueting.

To sum up: It is the design of the writer "to hold the mirror up to nature"—if the reader will pardon his originating such a simile to express his idea. With this intent he will therefore depict professional men and politicians who may be introduced into his narrative as occasionally lying, and, more rarely, stealing, according to their custom; commercial men, manufacturers, and traffickers, as lying less but stealing more; while mechanics and laborers, being in such regards more virtuous, make up for the deficiency with swearing and drinking. Every beast after his kind, as the animals went into the ark.

Of the female characters it may be stated that, as is natural, their hatred toward their fallen sisters should increase in the exact proportion that they themselves approach and tamper with the crime they condemn. That their virtue shall be measured by their mercy, and their charity equaled by their pity. As regards their conduct in other respects (Quien sabe?) nothing need be said, except the novel truism that variety is charming; though it should not be permitted to influence them so much as to compel them to marry out of spite, or to elope with other men because they hate and despise the persons and principles of their seducers.

In conclusion, the writer boldly asserts that, in this production of his pen, he will nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice. In the Smith Family things will be exhibited as they are—imperfect—saving and excepting the medium through which it is presented to the public, viz., the press.

Thus terminates the code of laws the writer instituted for the purpose of enabling him to manipulate correctly a work of fiction. The compliment to the black angel in the last sentence was inserted in hopes of a proper return. The article being finished, he will now take his ease in his inn, retiring in the calm dignity of conscious virtue.

[N.B.—Persons wishing to avail themselves of the advantages suggested in Section II., Cases 1, 2, 3, and 4, will please send their cards addressed J. B., Post-Office, New York. It is desirable that a small sum in currency (say five dollars) should be inclosed by way of "retaining fee," and to compensate the writer for the time spent in preliminary examination.]

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Editor's Easy Chair.

"WHEN this old coat was new" Percival was one of the most noted and honorable names in American literature. In the gallery of portraits of famous poets which adorned any collection of American poetry the heads of the elect were those of Bryant, Percival, Halleck, Dana, and Sprague. How many youth of the present day read Percival? How many of his poems are known even by their titles? How much of his verse survives in familiar quotation? How much belongs to literature? We live in another generation, yet all of the five poets we have named, with the exception of Percival—who died in 1856, at the age of sixty—are still living, and how sincerely honored by all sincere lovers of our literature those lovers know. Their place is secure in our literary tradition, whether their works fall out of print and out of popularity or not. Whether, as Washington Irving used to say with pleasant modesty, it is because the rivalry was little, and very moderate performances in literature were gladly welcomed, or whether, from their intrinsic value, the works of these and other men are the first-fruits of our national literature, and will be always so regarded. And certainly Thanatopsis, parts of the Buccaneer, and Marco Bozzaris, are poems that live not by toleration or chance but by their own worth, and the number of recognized poets who have been added to these fathers of our song is not to be measured by the number of volumes of poetry that are published.

There is, indeed, one man who remembers Percival's poetry, for the Reverend Julius H. Ward says that among his earliest recollections of poetry is that of the poem of Percival's beginning

"There is a sweetness in woman's decay."

And with a tender respect and profound admiration for the poet he has edited his Life and Letters, in which there is abundant material for a just estimate of the character of the sad and solitary man, the news of whose death was the first intimation to so many of his countrymen that he was not dead long ago. A more melancholy book is not often written. It is the story of a man of remarkable gifts and extraordinary attainments, whose morbid sensitiveness and utter inability to adapt himself to the circumstances of life were such that his biography reads like a tragedy or one of Hawthorne's weird romances. Undoubtedly his morbid temperament was akin to insanity, and this simple and faithful revelation of his career will have the good effect of inspiring more intelligent sympathy with all men like him, who are as pure and artless and whimsical and impracticable as young children. One such man is a key to many; and the thoughtful reader of Mr. Ward's Life of Percival will more than once recall Goethe's Tasso.

Percival was the son of a country physician in Connecticut, and was born at the close of the last century. His devotion to poetry and his love of science were simultaneously developed at a very early age, and he was a scholar from the cradle. He was impatient both of school and college, shunning companionship, jealous of teachers, and instinctively defying the public, to which as a poet he no less instinctively appealed. Very poor and excited by his early success and reputation, his conception of his powers and of the recognition due to him was inordinate, and his demands of appreciation were despotic. But he fell upon a time when the pursuit of pure literature as a profession was impracticable, and his temperament forbade him to use wisely such opportunities as were offered. He soon despaired, and the jealousy of a shy recluse often took the form of the most unreasonable selfishness. Our nascent literary enterprise encountered the most cruel and crushing rivalry in the affluence of British genius and the systematic organization of British publishing. Byron and Scott, Campbell and Moore, could be furnished to the American reader for the cost of paper and printing. What special interest could any publisher have in encouraging the poetic genius of young Mr. Percival? He does not seem to have thought of this, and although he had many wise and patient friends, he distrusted and repulsed them at one moment while he expected the most devoted service of them at another.

Forced to engage in some kind of literary labor, he undertook the editing of an American edition of Malte-Brun from the English translation, and to pass Dr. Webster's Dictionary through the press. His vexations and difficulties and misunderstandings were innumerable, and he quarreled so freely upon all sides that he soon parted with Dr. Webster, and was finally poorly paid for his geographical editing. Following Irving's plan in issuing the "Sketch Book" in Numbers, and Dana's in the publication of the "Idle Man," Percival published three numbers of an original poetical miscellany which he called "Clio." It was well received, but made no remarkable impression, and evidently disappointed the poet. His morbid temperament drove him to the verge of suicide, which he seriously meditated. And after constant failures of many kinds, and the most extraordinary trifling with every chance, Percival became a recluse in New Haven, personally known to very few of his townsmen, and corresponding chiefly with Dr. Hayward and Professor Ticknor in Boston.

The poor scholar, for such he now was, relinquished poetry, and devoted himself to the study of languages and of exact science. His scholarship was remarkable, but unfruitful. He explored the mysteries of language, and composed in several tongues with facility and correctness. His habits were eccentric, and although whimsical and shy in manner, he was a profuse and brilliant talker with the few persons whom he intimately knew. Professor Shepard, who made with Percival the geological survey of Connecticut, describes him vividly and admirably. He was slender in form, rather under the middle height, his head fine but not large, his features delicate and symmetrical, the eyes dark, the complexion sallow, the hair dark-brown and thin over the forehead, fully revealing the striking brow.

"Percival's face when he was silent," says Professor Shepard, "was full of calm, serious meditation; when speaking it lighted up with thought, and became noticeably expressive. He commonly talked in a mild, unimpassioned undertone, but just above a whisper, letting his voice sink with rather a pleasing cadence at the completion of each sentence. Even when most animated he used no gesture except a movement of the first and second fingers of his right hand backward and forward across the palm of the left, meantime following their monotonous unrest with his eyes, and rarely meeting the gaze of his interlocutor. He would stand for

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google hours, when talking, his right elbow on a mantlepiece if there was one near, his fingers going through their strange palmistry, and in this manner, never once stirring from his position, he would not unfrequently protract his discourse till long past midnight. An inexhaustible, undemonstrative, noiseless, passionless man, scarcely evident to you by physical qualities, and impressing you, for the most part, as a creature of pure intellect.

"His wardrobe was remarkably inexpensive, consisting of little more than a single plain suit, brown or gray, which he wore winter and summer, until it became threadbare. He never used boots, and his shoes, though carefully dusted, were never blacked. A most unpretending bow fastened his cravat of colored cambric. For many years his only outer garment was a brown camlet cloak of very scanty proportions, thinly lined, and a meagre protection against winter. His hat was worn for years before being laid aside, and put you in mind of the prevailing mode by the law of contrast only. He was never seen with gloves, and rarely with an umbrella. The value of his entire wardrobe scarcely exceeded fifty dollars, yet he was always neat, and appeared unconscious of any peculiarity in his costume."

Percival was appointed to make a geological survey of the State of Connecticut, but devoted himself to the work so thoroughly and in such slow detail that the Executive impatience was worn out, and the poet had the same difficulties with the State authorities that he had already had with the publishers. After long delays his report of a part of the survey was made; but it was so learned and technical that it is doubtful if the worthy people of the State knew much more of the matter after reading it than before. Meanwhile his philological studies were indefatigable, and he developed a taste for music, becoming intimate with Richard Storrs Willis, then at college in New Haven, with whom he often musically passed the night away. He entered into the melodious Harrison campaign with great spirit, and was even called upon for a speech on one excited occasion. When Ole Bull came, Percival greeted him in a Norwegian ode, which the violinist received coldly, to the poet's disgust, and we may say to our surprise; for Ole Bull, if a sensitive and jealous man, was ardent in his recognition of homage and friendly sympathy.

At last, in 1853, Percival went to Wisconsin to make a geological survey of the State. He came home again, but returned, and died at Hazel Green, Wisconsin, on the 22d May, 1856, at the age of sixty. His powers seemed exhausted, and he ceased to live without pain or sorrow. He is buried there; nor is there any doubt that his grave will always be visited with interest and sadness, for the greater fames of the increasing nation can not altogether extinguish his name. Mr. Ward's biography of the poet, which is very interesting as a glimpse into our literary history of thirty and forty years ago, will undoubtedly cause the readers of Longfellow and Whittier and Lowell to turn back with curiosity to the pages of their predecessor. They will find him to be a man of an entirely different epoch and inspiration, and they will not be able to condemn the justice of the judgment which suffers the poems of a man, whose name will survive, to remain generally unread.

THE Railway-travel question has had a tragical impetus from the sad and fatal accident which befell Mr. Theodore Dwight at the New Jersey station in Jersey City. He had just taken leave of his daughter when he was thrown from the platform by the sudden starting of the cars and killed. His daughter was then, by her own account, coarsely and brutally treated by the conductor; and was, finally, put out upon the track with her son to make her way back to the station as she best could. This incident has led to some very plain strictures in the daily papers upon the subject of official management and manners upon railroads. Yet such strictures are much less common and severe than they should be. Nothing but a serious accident will induce any body "to take the law" of a railroad company, and consequently the smaller offenses go altogether unwhipped. Now publicity of misconduct always stings. A series or a shower of public letters in the newspapers, exposing the haughtinesses, which, like small thorns and pebbles in a shoe, are great inconveniences to the sufferer, would be a many-lashed whip of scorpions or wasps, or at least horse-flies, to scourge offenders into courtesy and care.

Nor should the castigation be directed merely against the officers of the railroads, but against the offending passengers also. History and our own pages will agree that, from this pulpit, the most scorching sermons upon the subject have been those which were leveled at the latter class of sinners. It is the poor passengers whom we have pommeled—the passengers among whom this frail Chair sits and sins. Inevitably it has put itself upon the most extraordinary good behavior. The censor will be regarded and studied as an example, and woe to him who preaches if he does not practice.

But before renewing the flagellation of the passengers, let us ask the management of railroads in this country if it is not possible to exclude drunken people from the cars; or rather, what in the name of common decency do they mean by not excluding drunkards from the cars? It may not be always possible to prevent their getting in, but it is always possible to put them out. As a passenger of some years' constant experience the Easy Chair now goes upon the stand, and lifting its right arm, solemnly deposes and says that it has often witnessed the most disgusting and annoying spectacles arising from the presence of drunken men in the cars. Only the other day one such man rose and looked around in the most belligerent manner, and was forcibly prevented by a companion from proceeding to give battle to his neighbors. A word from one of those neighbors to the conductor should have been enough either to stop the train at the next station and leave the offending member—or to immure him in some impromptu calaboose until the end of the journey was reached.

Indeed this matter is actionable. It hath a legal remedy. The Company which suffers drunken passengers to sit among honest, God-fearing folk, does not take the due and diligent care of life and limb to which it is solemnly bounden. To the bereaved and afflicted family either of the free-stone front or of the cot beside a hill what is the difference whether the father, husband, and protector returns with his head broken by a collision, a snapped rail, an open switch, a rush from the track, or by the fist of an inebriated fellow-creature? Easy Chair, C. J., distinctly holds that the Company which is liable in the one case is responsible in the other. If, upon refusal of the conductor to remove the offender, the passengers should stop the train and expel the dis-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

turbing agent, there is no court in which he could recover, if it could be, as it easily might be, established that the company were in bodily danger—of mayhem, let us suppose—from the presence of the drunkard. So in the case of insane persons. If, as the Easy Chair has sometimes seen, they are placed, even with their attendants, among the passengers, and any harm follows, the same great authority has no doubt whatever that an action will lie against the Company. Suppose the Company stores kegs of gunpowder under the car or on top of it and an explosion ensues, that part of the passengers which providentially remains may properly sue for criminal carelessness and recover.

This question is the more important that drunkenness is rapidly increasing. The renewed activity of the Temperance reform since the war unpleasantly reminds us that the war has produced the necessity of such activity. And this necessity will make itself apparent in the cars. The drunkard will be there. But he must not remain. Moral influences, the laws of nature and of society, reason, and time, will have no chance to prove themselves and work out the great result of reformation. In a railroad-car the aspect of the temperance question is very different from that of society at large. It is not how we shall reform the drunkard, but how we shall get rid of him.

But we must not forget our fellow-sinners of another kind, those over whom the Company can exercise but a very remote and limited influence—the ill-behaved. They have been our especial target, but as the Easy Chair travels by rail and contemplates its fellow-passengers it is conscious of feeling very much as the early Christian fathers might could they sit with Mr. Parton at a session of the New York Councilmen. The patriarchs would wonder a little as to the precise quality of the Christianity of Christendom. Mr. "K.," of Washington, has been interested in some of our feeble efforts in the cause of good railway manners, and contributes his evidence to the question in this way:

"To the Man in the Easy Chair:

"I rode in the street cars of Albany a great deal last winter, and in the course of it gave my seat to women of all ages and conditions more than thirty times. Only twice was I thanked. Once by a young woman, apparently a servant girl, and once by one with a basket of clothes, who was evidently a washerwoman.

"Many of those who took my seat without any acknowledgment, had it not been for that circumstance, I should have mistaken for ladies. I only remember seeing three other men thanked for seats during the entire season. Very seldom, indeed, did I see a woman have to stand while a man was seated. Far oftener did eight or nine women spread themselves over the seat meant for ten, while two or three men were standing. I speak thus positively, because I had the seat-question in my mind, and watched closely for developments.

"Different places have different customs. One of the Albany customs is set forth above. One very like it prevails in Bangor, where there are no street cars. When two women walking together there meet a man on the street crossings, which are wide enough for but two, they usually crowd him off into the mud or dust. An acquaintance of mine, on one such occasion, disliking to go into the mud, stopped at a short distance from two women. One fell behind the other, saying, as she did so, "Polite!"

"But to get into the cars again. Some two years since I was in one in this place. The seats were rather full, but not crowded. Two women got on to the platform, and as the foremost put her head into the door she said, loud enough to be heard over the whole car, "Got to stand, now we're here!" As soon as they came inside the man who sat next me, and I, gave them our seats. They thanked us. Presently a man entered, with whom they were acquainted, and while I was leaning on my cane in front of them, being quite lame at the time, they made room for him between them, and he sat down.

"Within the past three weeks I have offered my seat to more than a dozen females of various colors and sizes. Two ladies have declined it, saying they were going but a short distance. One young lady has thanked me, as did a little girl about the height of my cane. The rest, with one exception, have taken the seat and made no sign. The case of this one was amusing. I was sitting near the head of the car, next a young colored girl. A young white girl entered, and advanced to take the seat which I offered her. She did not see the colored girl till nearly seated. When she did she did 'git up and git,' without a word to me. The car grinned, and my neighbor enjoyed the joke as much as any one.

"Many men who keep their seats and let women stand do so, I think, because of an idea which most women have. This idea is well illustrated by a speech which a young lady recently made to me. She said she entered a car in New York, and 'there the young men sat reading their papers just as if they had a right to! When one of them did rise and offer me his seat he seemed to think he was doing me a great favor!' The young men sat as if they had a right to! They probably thought they had. Most men and few women agree with them. The man who did rise seemed to think he was doing her a favor. She thought she was only getting her rights. Womankind generally agrees with her in this, but, unfortunately, not in thanking the man, as she does, who gives her those rights. The result is that the men who don't give up their seats don't. K."

Here is a sad case of ruin, and who is responsible? Evidently Mr. "K." is a man of naturally sweet temper and courteous manners, and he speaks of the "rights" of women as given by men! The right of a woman to tender consideration and thoughtful politeness the boon of a man or of any number of men! This is the most melancholy illustration of the results of imperfect railway manners to the harm of the gentler creation that we know. It is its own argument and appeal. We entreat our readers of the sex whose conduct is so painfully portrayed by "K." not to multiply the number of such cases. Let them be persuaded. Let them reflect how easy it is to say a few gracious words, or even to smile, in recognition of any favor whatsoever; and knowing it and proving it, let the air of a crowded car at any station where "K." and his friends surrender their seats hum pleasantly with the musical murmur of "Thank you!"

THE poor Empress Carlotta, the wife of Maximilian, Louis Napoleon's Austrian Emperor of Mexico, is said to be insane, and it is one of the rumors which can not be doubted. Carlotta is a granddaughter of Louis Philippe, and daughter of old Leopold of Belgium, who was long considered one of the longest political heads in Europe. The length of Leopold's head is now measured by the fact that he ardently advised his son-in-law to try to sit down in the throne which Louis Napoleon intended to erect in Mexico; and it is most probable that, except for the strenuous advice of his father-in-law, the Archduke Max would have staid quietly at home at Miramar. But, like father like daughter, Carlotta was most earnest to try being an Empress, and her mild husband renounced his bird in the hand by solemn act, and proceeded to find the two birds which he hoped were in the bush.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Poor young gentleman! it was a burning bush, and his fingers are already terribly blistered.

And his heart must be well-nigh broken when he hears the doleful news from his wife. When all seemed darkest in those foolish halls of the Montezumas, in which the young Austrian pair had hoped to build their imperial nest, Carlotta went quietly on board ship and sailed away for Europe. She would have no interlocutor, no diplomatist, no delays and bows and rebuffs, but state the case face to face to Louis Napoleon: say to him, "You brought us into this strait. We are willing to push on, but you must help," and see what his response would be. It was given out, of course, that there was no significance in her visit—that she was merely going upon some home-sick errand of a visit to Miramar, or to her brother, the King of Belgium, or to buy a new bonnet in the Boulevards. But this was a story that nobody believed; and it is amusing to see how far behind all other progress in civilization is that of the invention of blinds to conceal public purposes. The whole world laughs now at diplomatic dodges and imperial phrases and royal non-committals. When Louis Napoleon solemnly says that France reserves to herself the liberty of acting as circumstances may require, universal good sense demands at once, "Why not say simply that you intend to do as you please?" So every body knew that the French-Austrian empire in Mexico was in mortal peril when it was announced that the Empress Carlotta had gone to Europe.

She was kindly received in Paris; but it was neither the Europe, nor the Paris, nor the Louis Napoleon that she left three or four years ago; and the America she came from was a very different America from that to which she sailed when the Pope blessed her and said good-by. Of course Louis Napoleon could only say that he had made the most solemn engagements to withdraw his troops, and that France would not suffer a ruler whose prestige was impaired to risk more men and money upon an enterprise which never had the sympathy of the country. The last suggestion was doubtless rather insinuated than expressed. But it is easy to imagine how stolid and hopeless and forbidding the sallow, expressionless face of the baffled imperial gamester became before the proud, passionate entreaty of the wife of his puppet. It is not probable that she spared reproaches, and reminded him that he had lured them into the snare —"And, Sire, your own honor, the glory of France, the lustre of your name and dynasty!"

"Yes, your Majesty; but water will not run up hill, nor pomegranates sprout in sand. The conditions have all failed. I am very sorry, but I can not risk civil war and the anger of the United States to hold your excellent husband upon a throne where nobody wants him to sit. I really can not. Ma foi! nothing could be more sad. It is tragical. But—Madame—but—"

So Carlotta was bowed out of Paris, and went to Rome. That of itself should have proved the poor lady out of her wits. To ask Papa Pio to do what his eldest son could not and would not was already a hopeless task. But to Rome went the Empress Carlotta, and to the Vatican, and to the Holy Father. Those of us who have seen him know how he looked and what he said. He was bland and portly and very feeble. He smiled upon her, and raised his hand in the apostolic benediction, and shoveled snuff into his capacious old nose, and wiped his dusty fingers upon his white robe. Then he listened to her with apathetic sweetness, and while she spoke possibly something deep down in his heart whispered, "Well, daughter, your empire is a prodigious sham, and mine—" But he was kind to the unhappy lady who had come so far to try if by her main strength she could lift the sinking empire out of the remorseless quicksand upon which it was built. If he could do nothing, he could talk. But when she pressed him for promises, poor man, he had none to give. He could only administer spiritual consolation, as it is fondly termed. But her spirit it did not console. She shudderingly said that if she went back to her hotel to dinner they would poison her. So the pitying Pope ordered a table to be spread for her in the library, he meanwhile dining in the sad solitude which the inhuman etiquette of his station requires. Does any body ever see that melancholy little table under the canopy where the Pope dines all alone without thinking of his dining-room as the Vatican chamber of torture? But after dinner she was still afraid to go. The air was full of terrors for her. It is very mournful—so far from her husband, so fruitless an errand, so disastrous and conspicuous a disappointment, her own responsibility for all so emphatic—her mind grew dark. You can see the unhappy woman roaming through the Vatican, and the kind, snuffy Pope, in his long white woolen robe trying to comfort her, like an old family nurse consoling a sick child. He ordered a chamber to be made ready, and the ghost of an Empress slept at the Vatican.

This calamity relieves the end of the Mexican empire of sheer ridicule, and invests it with the pathetic dignity of misfortune. But it brings into still more hateful relief the aspect of the originator of the plot, and will appeal to the chivalrous, theoretical humanity of the French against the conduct of the Emperor.

Apart from the election the peculiar sensation of the town during the earlier autumn was the acting of Ristori, who played at a small theatre in Fourteenth Street in New York and at the Academy in Brooklyn. The public mind had been fully and properly prepared, and the management of her appearances was as skillful as long experience and sagacity could make it. Yet the part selected for her début was not so happily chosen as that sagacity would have suggested. Medea is bald, monotonous tragedy, and of so antique a setting as to be quite alien to modern sympathy. The house was not uncomfortably full, as it should have been to produce the feeling of intense eagerness of expectation, and the Italian language not being familiar to the whole audience, the impression was not enthusiastic. But nothing could be more entertaining than the notices in the morning papers. What could be better than this?

"The attendance numerically was gratifying to the eminent artiste. It was full, and represented several well-known New York families of the Upper and Lower Ten. The applause was almost entirely judicious. Madame Ristori's great 'points' were recognized and appreciated. To enumerate these would be a task of length and time. For hasty purpose of the moment it must suffice that such passionate utterance as flowed most naturally from the womanly heart gave the greatest gratification to the audience. The plastic sway with which she accompanied each thought was not, we think, sufficiently appreciated. Ristori's movements are a gallery of sculpture, fired beyond the colored dreams of Phidean's fancy. Her 'attitudes,' if so degraded a word may be used, do not mean tea-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

pot; they are significant, binding the spirit to the body, and giving eloquence to those unutterable powers which neither flesh nor soul can separately express, but which both, in their dumbness, make overwhelming. Madame Ristori is master of every motion that should be known to the stage. Her nature—somewhat large, and therefore masculine—grasps the solitary passion of this play with a minuteness that is appalling. The elaboration of a long-waiting, patient, sacrificial love suddenly changed to a fierce hatred of all that it held dear has never been made so consummately. The play of 'Medea' we do not accept as intrinsically good. Euriaidas subjected himself to immortal ridicule in writing it."

Apparently "Euriaidas" wrote most of the plays in which Ristori has appeared, for they have been intrinsically bad. But whatever the play, and however extraordinary the criticisms, Ristori's performance is so finished and delightful that it will always be most pleasantly remembered. It must not be compared with Rachel's; and although one actress inevitably suggests the remembrance of a contemporary in the same part, the difference in the present case is as absolute as that between talent and genius. The weird, haunting, fiery, terrible power of Rachel, which was always present, whether in Phedre, or Thisbe, or the Moineau de Lesbie, or Adrienne, or Mary Stuart, like the light in a score of different-hued gems, was as unique as the charm of Jenny Lind, and as totally different as dark from fair. Of this power there is nothing in Ristori. A consummate elegance, and thoughtful propriety, and careful study and comprehension—a result symmetrically achieved—these all belong to Ristori's art, and assure her constant success.

It was in the rôle of Queen Elizabeth that she made the profoundest impression, and it was a fine and beautiful work. Those who have seen her in the part will hereafter remember Ristori when they think of Elizabeth, as we all owe our image of Shakespeare's Hamlet to Sir Thomas Lawrence's portrait of John Kemble in the part, or to the representation of Edwin Booth. The play of Elizabeth, by some Italian writer, is no play at all, if we may indulge in a Fenian expression. It is simply a series of historic tableaux of Elizabeth presented by Ristori. The only trace of a plot is the treatment of the story of Essex and the Queen. But from the moment Ristori appears to the end she is all Elizabeth and only Elizabeth. Her movement, her tone, her manner, her whole aspect is that of the great and unlovely Tudor. The five acts present her at five epochs, and in as many costumes. First we see the maiden Queen, and last the terrible Empress dying in the appalling solitude of royalty. Throughout the play the identification of the actress with Elizabeth is entire. Nothing could well be more satisfactory. The masculinity of her nature is the first impression and the last.

In the love passages with Essex Ristori was equally excellent. The conflict of tenderness with pride was even subtly rendered. In her whole representation the passion was without rant, and the quiet passages were truly tranquil. The elegance, moderation, and propriety, without inadequacy or tameness, were the more delightful from their strangeness upon our stage. There is, however, no remarkable impression of intellectual power. It is the traditional and, so to speak, the external Elizabeth that we see. The common conception of her personality is so vivid, it is so made up of costume and manner, that a careful study and faithful representation of these satisfy the imagination by giving us the popular figure of the Queen. The performance is not a revelation but a reminder.

But whatever it may be intrinsically, such a performance is refreshing by recalling heroic figures and times in a day when the drama seems to have become a picture of the demi-monde, and actresses to succeed mainly as they resemble the denizens of that unclean sphere. The difference between the spectacle of Miss Heron's Camille and of Ristori's Elizabeth is incalculable. We do not believe that the popularity of the latter is a mere fashion; and if the popular verdict upon Ristori's acting that it is the perfection of art (in the sense merely that it is attainable by the thorough and conscientious cultivation of talent) be correct, her success should stimulate us to utter dissatisfaction with the tawdry rhetoric and turgid declamation which are palmed upon us as fine acting.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 1st of November. The events of the preceding month present little of striking incident. Public interest has been mainly directed toward the elections which have been held in October, and those which are to ensue in November. These have indicated, and will indicate, the decision of the people of the United States between the two lines of policy to be pursued; the one being that proposed by the President, the other that sanctioned by a very decided majority in both Houses of Congress. As it has happened, the President, though elected as a "Republican," finds his chief support in the "Democratic" party, which opposed his election, while the action of Congress is sustained by the bulk of the "Republican" party. We shall therefore designate the party which supports the present Administration as "Democrats," that opposed to it as "Republicans."

THE OCTOBER ELECTIONS.

In Pennsylvania, Governor, State officers, and members of the next Congress were to be chosen. For Governor, General John W. Geary, Republican, had a majority of more than 17,000 over Hon. Heister Clymer, Democrat. The vote was the largest ever polled in the State, and the Republican majority was nearly 3000 less than at the Presidential election in 1864, when Mr. Lincoln had a majority of 20,000 over General M'Clellan. At the local election of 1865, a much smaller vote being cast, the average Republican majority was nearly 23,000. For members of Congress the Republicans have probably 18, and the Democrats 6. In the State Legislature the House will consist of 62 Republicans and 38 Democrats; the Senate of 24 Republicans and 12 Democrats.——In Ohio, the election was for State officers and members of Congress. For Secretary of State—the test question—Mr. W. H. Smith, Republican, had about 43,000 over Mr. B.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Le Fever, Democrat. The Republicans have 16 members of Congress, the Democrats 3.——In Indiana, the election was also for State officers and members of Congress. The Republican majorities for State officers were about 15,000, and they have 8 out of 11 members of Congress, and a large majority in the Legislature.——In Iowa, the Republican majority for Secretary of State was large, probably more than 25,000; but the full returns have not appeared. This party elected all the 6 members of Congress.

During the present political campaign elections have been held, mainly during the autumn months, in the eleven States of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Oregon, Vermont, Maine, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, and West Virginia. The general result in each of these States has been a decided acceptance of the policy laid down by Congress in distinction from that of the President.

THE NOVEMBER ELECTIONS.

Elections are to be held on the 6th of November in the following States: New York, Governor, State officers, House of Assembly, and 31 members of Congress; Massachusetts, Governor, Legislature, and 10 members of Congress; New Jersey, State Legislature and 5 members of Congress; Michigan, State officers, Legislature, and 6 members of Congress; Illinois, State officers, Legislature, and 14 members of Congress; Wisconsin, State officers, Legislature, and 6 members of Congress; Minnesota, Governor, Legislature, and 2 members of Congress; Missouri, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Legislature, and 9 members of Congress; Kansas, Governor, Legislature, and 1 member of Congress; Maryland, Legislature, and 5 members of Congress; Delaware, Governor, Legislature, and 1 member of Congress; Nevada (November 8), Governor, Legislature, and 1 member of Congress.

In the following States the elections do not take place until the spring and summer of next year: New Hampshire (March 12), Legislature, and 3 members of Congress; Connecticut (April 4), Governor, Legislature, and 4 members of Congress; Rhode Island (April 6), Governor, Legislature, and 2 members of Congress; Kentucky (August 5), Governor, Legislature, and 9 members of Congress.

The elections of members of Legislatures, held and to be held, involve the choice of several United States Senators, one from each of the following States: Pennsylvania, Indiana, New York, New Jersey, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, Nevada, Maryland, New Hampshire, Kentucky, Connecticut (already chosen), Oregon (already chosen); and two from Vermont (already chosen), and Kansas.

The present Congress closes its existence on the 4th of March. The Representatives and Senators, elected or to be elected, do not take their seats until December, 1867, unless Congress is in the interval between March and December convened by the President in extra session.

TEXAS.

The position of Texas in respect to the Amendment to the Constitution prohibiting slavery is somewhat singular. In August the Legislature was called upon to act upon that Amendment. The Committee to whom the subject was referred reported that this Amendment, having been adopted by three-fourths of the States, had become a part of the law of the land, and it was therefore unnecessary for the people of Texas to act upon it; the report of the Committee was accepted, and the Amendment was "respectfully returned to the Secretary of State" without any action having been taken upon it. The 14th Amendment was not long since referred to the Legislature; the Committee appointed to consider it reported against its ratification; and it was accordingly rejected by a vote of 67 to 5. The State Constitution has been so amended as to prohibit slavery. The Amendment says that "African slavery, as it heretofore existed, having been terminated within this State by the Government of the United States by force of arms, and its re-establishment being prohibited by the Amendment to the Constitution of the United States," therefore slavery and involuntary servitude, except as punishment for crime, shall not exist in the State, and Africans and their descendants shall be protected in their rights of person and property, and shall be "liable to the same punishment for crimes as whites; and, moreover, they shall not be prohibited, on account of color or race, from testifying in all cases in which any of them are involved, and the Legislature may authorize them to testify in other cases." This Amendment to the State Constitution, together with ordinances setting aside the ordinance of Secession, and repudiating the Confederate war debt, and assuming that of the Union, were adopted by the Convention without being submitted to the people.

THE FENIANS.

Several of the Fenian prisoners captured during the recent raid into Canada have been tried, convicted, and sentenced to death by the British Court at Toronto. Among these are Robert B. Lynch, who represented himself to have been a newspaper correspondent, whose only object was to report the proceedings of the invaders, but who, according to the testimony adduced on the trial, acted as a colonel of the Fenian force; and John M'Mahon, a Catholic priest, who averred that he went into Canada without any concert with the Fenians, was detained by them, and compelled to remain and administer the rites of the Church to their wounded. The judge instructed the jury that if Mr. M'Mahon was there to receive the confession of the wounded, then he was aiding and abetting the invasion, and must be convicted. Both Lynch and M'Mahon were found guilty by the jury, and sentenced to be hung on the 13th of December.—Mr. Seward, our Secretary of State, addressed a note to the British Minister at Washington, stating that these men "had been convicted in a colonial court in Canada, and sentenced to death upon a charge that, being citizens of the United States, they were actors in the assault made in the month of June last at Fort Erie, in that colony." He asked that a full record of the proceedings of these trials, and of any others of similar character, should be furnished to the Government of the United States, and that in the mean while the execution of the sentences should be suspended. He also urged that "the offenses involved in these trials are in their nature eminently political; and that it is the opinion of the Government of the United States that sound policy coincides with the best impulses of a benevolent nature in recommending tenderness, amnesty, and forgiveness in such cases." This suggestion, he said, "is made with freedom and earnestness, because the same opinions were proposed to us by all the Governments and publicists of Europe, and by none of them with greater frankness and kindness

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

than by the Government and statesmen of Great Britain."—The result of these trials has aroused no little excitement among the Irish population of the United States, and has apparently given a fresh impulse to the Fenian organization. On Sunday, October 28, a very large meeting was held at "Jones's Woods," in the outskirts of New York, which was addressed by James Stephens, the "Chief Organizer." He condemned the whole series of efforts which had been directed against the British American provinces as mere "fillbustering movements;" affirmed that if last year they had only had in Ireland "a few thousand more rifles at one particular point" the whole island would have been theirs in ten days, and "every English soldier on Irish soil would have been dead or captive." He attributed the failure of all previous movements in Ireland to the influence of the Catholic clergy; but affirmed that now the people had been taught to yield obedience to their priests only in spiritual matters, but in political affairs to "look to them only so far as they were worthy of being looked to;" and that now if "one of his officers led a body of men, and was met by one priest or fifty priests, and he should tell him to go back, they would not obey him."—The main point of the speech of the "Chief Organizer" was, however, contained in his affirmation, several times repeated in substance, that "we shall be fighting on Irish soil before the 1st of January, with as fair prospect of success as ever was known, and that I shall be there in the midst of my countrymen."

MEXICO.

While there are special accounts of various advantages gained by the Imperialists at different points, every thing indicates that with the approaching withdrawal of the French troops the Imperial Government of Maximilian will come to an end. It is said, on apparently good authority, that the Empress Carlotta has become insane in consequence of the failure of her diplomatic mission to Europe; and, upon evidence which still needs confirmation, that an Austrian steamer has already been dispatched to convey Maximilian from Mexico to Europe.—The position of our Government is clearly expressed in a letter from General Sheridan, dated October 23, to General Sedgwick, commanding the Sub-district of the Rio Grande, in Texas. General Sheridan says: "There is only one way in which the state of affairs on the Rio Grande can be bettered, and that is, by giving the heartiest support to the only Government in Mexico recognized by our own—the only one which is really friendly to us." All the adherents of any party or "pretended Government" in Mexico are to be warned that "they will not be permitted to violate the neutrality laws between the Liberal Government of Mexico and the United States," nor be allowed to remain in our territory and receive the protection of our flag; and that "these instructions will be enforced against the adherents of the Imperial buccaneers representing the so-called Imperial Government of Mexico," and also against sundry other factions, for "President Juarez is the acknowledged head of the Liberal Government of Mexico."

EUROPE.

Beyond the formal transfer of the fortresses of the "Quadrilateral," from Austria to France, and from France to Italy; the progress of the Reform agitation in Great Britain; reports of the failing health of the Emperor Napoleon; and contradictory rumors of new political complications, there is little requiring note in our European intelligence for the month. The old question of the fate of the Ottoman Empire, and the disposition to be made of the various portions of European Turkey, seems about to come into prominence. As a stand-point for future reference rather than as a part of the current events of the time, we give a general resumé of the long-vexed "Eastern Question:"

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

"The Eastern Question," involving primarily the fate of the Ottoman Empire, but ultimately the possession of Constantinople and the control of the great basin of the Lower Danube, and of the fertile region comprehended within European Turkey, is now beginning to loom up into importance. Turkey in Europe, including the semi-independent Principalities of Servia, Wallachia, and Moldavia, contains about 200,000 square miles, an area something greater than that of France, and exceeding by one half that of Prussia since her recent acquisitions. The population is about 14,500,000, of whom 10,500,000 are Christians of the Greek Church, about 750,000 each of Catholics and Jews, and only 2,500,000 Mohammedans, mostly belonging to the Ottoman race. The country is naturally one of the finest and most fertile on the globe, and is admirably situated for commerce. The special importance of the acquisition of this region by Russia arises mainly from the fact that it furnishes the only considerable outlet to the rest of the world for the Russian Empire; the northern outlet through the Baltic being not only commanded by Germany and Denmark, but is also blocked up by ice during several months of the year. The Straits of the Dardanelles are, politically and commercially considered, mouths of the Danube and Volga, and Constantinople is the natural entrepôt of all Southern Russia. Once in possession of this city and the Straits, Russia would soon be able to take rank as a great naval as well as military power. By affinity of religion the great majority of the population is allied to Russia, although mainly of a different race, and Russia has for four generations endeavored to assume the position of protector of the Greek Church, with a steady view to the ultimate acquisition of the country; and the prevention of this acquisition has formed one of the cardinal points of the policy of the other European Powers.

The tortuous, and often contradictory action of the two parties in this Eastern question—Russia on the one hand, France and England on the other, with the German Powers sometimes favoring the one and sometimes the other—forms a singular chapter in political history. At times all parties seemed agreed upon weakening the Turkish power; then again, one side or the other apprehended that the other would gain too much in the distribution of the spoils; and then all united in holding up the Ottoman State. Hence resulted such apparently contradictory European action as the destruction of the Turkish fleet at Navarino in 1827; the establishment of the kingdom of Greece in 1838, with a Bavarian Prince as King; the crushing out of the revolt of Mehemet Ali, of Egypt, in 1840; the establishment of that pachalik as a really separate power; the treaty of Unkiar Skelessi, in 1833, by which the Porte in effect recognized the Czar as protector of the Christian population of Turkey, and the attempt of Nicholas in 1854 to maintain the Greek Church in the possession of certain privileges secured by that treaty; the resistance of this claim

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

by Napoleon in behalf of the Latin Church, on the ground that it interfered with a treaty made in 1740; and finally the war in the Crimea, wherein France and Great Britain appeared as the nominal allies of the Porte, who had been dragooned into refusing the Russian demands. The nominal question at stake in the outset was trifling enough. It was simply whether for the purpose of passing into the Grotto of the Nativity at Bethlehem, the Latin monks should have a key to the great door of the church, or should be put off with a key to a smaller door. But underneath this lay the question whether Russia should put herself in a position to seize upon a large part of European Turkey in the event of a dissolution of the Ottoman Empire, which then seemed close at hand. The real result of the war, though nothing was said of it in the treaty of peace, was that the Russian designs upon Turkey were for the time foiled.

The old question has now begun to appear again. During the late troubles in Europe the people of Wallachia rose and deposed their "Hospodar" or hereditary prince, and elected in his place Prince Charles of Hohenzollern, a kinsman of the Prussian King and of the French Emperor. Russia opposed this election, but the Sultan finally acknowledged it, and so this important principality, nominally still a portion of the Ottoman Empire, is in effect under the protection of France and Prussia. But Prussia and Italy having gained so largely in the late contest, the Czar has more than once, by word and act, significantly hinted that he expects something in the final distribution of the European Powers. Austria also, having given up the last of her Italian possessions, is looking for compensation from some other quarter. Now neither of these empires can gain any thing except from the Ottoman Empire; and as it happens, there are portions of this convenient to both, if they can only agree upon the partition.

The Danube, an Austrian river in its upper course, is Turkish in its lower course. Austria would naturally wish to have the whole river; but its mouth is far up in the Black Sea, which the Czar must insist shall be a Russian lake if it ever passes out of the hands of the Turks—and every thing now seems to point to the speedy expulsion of the Turks from Europe. At a first glance upon the map the natural boundary between Austria and Russia, supposing these empires to divide European Turkey between them, would be the Danube, Russia taking Wallachia and Moldavia, the third part, north of that stream, and Austria the remainder. But apart from the inequality of the shares, this would give to Austria Constantinople and the Dardanelles, which Russia needs, and must have. We imagine, therefore, that the division would be that Russia should take, besides the Principalities, Bulgaria and Roumelia; while Austria would have Servia and Bosnia, which have long been half Austrianized, besides Herzegovina, Montenegro, and Albania. This would give her a long stretch of coast with several good ports on the Adriatic, and more than compensate her for the loss of Italy; while Russia would have the whole Black Sea, Constantinople, the Straits, and a considerable tract on the shores of the Archipelago. Possibly, in order to equalize the division, and to make a show of disinterestedness, Macedonia and Thessaly, the population of which are Greek by race and language, might be assigned to the Kingdom of Greece.

Such a remodeling of the map of Europe would of course be opposed by France, Prussia, and Italy; but we think it would be worth striving for by Russia and Austria, and considering the relative numerical and military strength of the two parties, and above all the geographical relations of the region, the chance of ultimate success would, we think, lie with Russia and Austria.

We leave Great Britain wholly out of the question; for her statesmen of the present generation seem disposed to interfere as little as may be with the politics of Continental Europe. They have enough to do to take care of British interests in Asia, Australia, and America. Indeed, it would seem to be for her present good that no European power should acquire the marked preponderance which is now threatened by Prussia, which bids fair to be another name for all Germany. And since, also, she can no longer hope to be sole mistress of the seas—that position being henceforth certainly to be disputed by France—she will naturally wish that other States should be in the position of naval powers. The growth of Russia in the direction of the Mediterranean does not at present threaten England, and would, moreover, tend to postpone, if not wholly to avert the long-threatened collision in Asia. Between some such adjustment as we have suggested, and the establishment of a new Hellenic State, including what is now Turkey in Europe and the present little kingdom of Greece, we see no possibility of any lasting settlement of the Eastern question; for the proposition which has been advanced to make Constantinople a "free city" under protection of all the European Powers, the navigation of the Dardanelles to be open alike to all the world, is wholly too Utopian to be considered, except as a mere temporary makeshift. Russia must ever strive for Constantinople until she gains it, or until it is proved to be wholly unattainable; and its unattainability will never be recognized until it is in the hands of a power capable of holding it—a State, that is, which shall rank among the Great Powers of Europe. A new Hellenic State, having all of Turkey in Europe, might within a generation become such a power; and the consequence would be that Russia, shut out from the rest of Europe, would become an Oriental, not an Occidental empire.

We have assumed throughout that the term of the Ottoman occupation of any part of Europe is approaching its close. For quite half a century it has existed only by sufferance, and by the mutual jealousies of the European Powers. Two and a half millions of Tartar marauders have for four centuries encamped upon and held what is really only military possession of one of the fairest regions on earth; for two centuries they have not increased their numbers, during which time the population of the civilized world has fully trebled itself. So utterly has this governing race misgoverned, that the country is to-day less prosperous than it was fifty years ago, and was less prosperous fifty years ago than it was two hundred years before. We can not doubt that the period of the domination of these Tartar hordes is approaching its close. European Turkey has been in a state of chronic insurrection, at isolated points, for two generations. The recent uprising in Candia, whatever may be its immediate fate, seems to us a premonition of the end. How that end will be wrought out will depend upon the drift of the current of European politics. We anticipate that this issue will form the key-note of the history of Europe for the period toward which we are now approaching.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Editor's Drawer.

OUR friend from the Rio Grande who sends the two following is welcome to the Drawer:

When the colored troops were first organized it was necessary for all applicants for commission in that body to undergo examination before a Board, of which Major-General Casey was President. Many good things are told of sharp sayings on both sides; for while the General wasn't to be deceived a great deal as to the calibre of the examinee, he was quite prone to see and appreciate any thing racy. An aspiring candidate for promotion, who used to reside not a great ways from Philadelphia, was among the early applicants. The usual question came up:

"Mr. H——, what was your occupation before you entered the army?"

"A telegraph operator, Sir," was the response.

"Well, Sir, what is the motive-power used in telegraphing?"

"Electricity."

"Will you please tell us the nature of electricity?"

"Why, General, I have seen it, felt it, and heard it; but I was never yet able to hold on to it long enough to examine it."

"Indeed, Sir! But they say Franklin succeeded in putting lightning in a bottle and corking it."

"Oh yes, Sir; I have often seen what they called 'bottled lightning' down in Jersey, but I believe that has never been successfully used in telegraphing!"

Mr. H—— received a Lieutenant's commission a few days after, and is still serving with his regiment on the Rio Grande.

PERHAPS another little anecdote of the same officer may be worthy of mention:

Entering the Adjutant's office the other day, the first thing that caught his eye was a bottle of bay rum standing on the toilet-table. Without stopping to ask questions or look closely at the label, Mr. H—— "made for" the bottle, and had already imbibed a pretty large swallow, when Adjutant J——, raising his eyes from the desk, and not noting which bottle it was, remarked, rather indignantly, "Hold on, Lieutenant H——! I don't like that!" "Hem, ahem!" [spitting and spluttering] "nor I don't either!" called back Mr. H—— from the doorway, leaving J—— to think he rather did "like it," after all.

SOME years ago there lived in the village of C——, New Hampshire, a local politician named Price. He was an admirer of Andrew Jackson, and sought upon all occasions to magnify his great name. When attending a County Convention he availed himself of an opportunity offered to make a speech. As usual, Andrew Jackson was his theme. Warming with his subject, he exclaimed: "General Jackson, at the glorious battle of New Orleans, regained all the disgrace lost upon the frontiers of Canada!"

WHEN Minnesota was a Territory Squire F—— acted as Justice of the Peace in the town of H——. He was more noted for his frankness, and the pointed manner in which he expressed his opinions, than for his choice selection of words. One day, when a suit was on trial before him, the counsel for the defendant claimed that the allegations contained in the plaintiff's complaint were false, and moved to have them stricken out. Squire F—— patiently heard the counsel for the plaintiff in support of his complaint and in opposition to the motion, and the counsel for the defendant in reply. He then gave his decision in the following language:

"It is the opinion of this Court that the allegations in the plaintiff's complaint are false, and" (pointing to the plaintiff's counsel) "that that are alligator knew it when he made them!"

DEAR DRAWER,—Your telegram anecdote in a late Number reminds me of a "good one" which occurred in this city. One of our large commercial houses is in the habit of sending agents through the different States soliciting orders. Not long since their agent for Pennsylvania (a genuine Celt) started with his price-list on a tour. A few days subsequent, the new tariff having increased the price of some articles thirty to forty per cent., the correspondent of the house telegraphed him "not to sell certain styles of goods at his prices;" adding, that he would send details by mail. Imagine our worthy friend's surprise the next day on receiving by mail the following: "I received your telegraph dispatch yesterday, but not recognizing your handwriting I paid no attention to it, and inclose the dispatch to know if it is all right!"

A MASSACHUSETTS friend sends the following:

Some years ago, on the occasion of a funeral in a part of our town yclept Bow-wow, a good old preacher of the Methodist persuasion officiated, and at the close had a word of inquiry and advice, as is customary, with many of the audience. Among others he approached a lady, a stranger to him, who was visiting in the neighborhood, and after shaking hands, asked her "if she was on the road to heaven?" "Yes, Sir," she promptly answered; "and if you come that way I should be pleased to have you call!" The good old man, horrified at such seeming discourtesy, turned away without reply, when a friend sitting near remonstrated with Mrs. ——, who, still more horrified at her mistake, said she understood him to ask "if she was on the road to Hudson," where she resided when at home. An immediate apology, to the satisfaction of the minister, followed, and a hearty laugh when relating the circumstance were the natural results of an explanation.

DEAR DRAWER,—A friend of mine in a neighboring village is blessed with four little boys, the oldest of whom are twins. He also has in his garden a dwarf pear-tree, which blossomed this year, and bid fair to bring to maturity six or eight fine pears. He naturally felt quite anxious that they should not be molested until they should ripen. One day, when he was going away with his wife, it was decided to leave the boys at home with an aunt. He called the twins (who are about four years old), and told them they must not pick any of the pears. Upon his return he missed one from the tree. Calling the boys to him he asked them if they had picked any. One of them, who at such times was by common consent spokesman, replied, "No, thir; me shake de tree and him drop off."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Not wishing to punish them, the father talked to them, telling them they ought not to have shaken the tree, and then let them go. A few days after he was again going away, and before starting he called the boys and told them they must not pick the pears nor shake the tree. Upon his return he repaired to the tree, and to his surprise he found one pear hanging by the stem, and carefully eaten entirely around the centre nearly to the middle of the core. He was disconcerted and yet amused at the ingenuity displayed by the boys in their efforts to dodge his instructions, and calling them he asked them if they had picked any pears? "No, thir," said the spokesman. "Did you shake the tree?" "No, thir." "Well, what did you do?" "Me bite him to see if him was wipe, and him WAS wipe!" Gravity was nowhere, and the boys "camped" on the field.

A FRIEND in Iowa says:

In a certain town, not a hundred miles from here, a couple who are noted for two peculiarities—one, that the husband is of the most silent and reserved habits, while his wife is diametrically his opposite, being the gossip and having the gossip of the whole town. The other peculiarity is that the wife is the most inveterate of borrowers—food of all kinds, clothing, kitchen-ware, any thing and every thing that is capable of being borrowed she endeavors to get from her neighbors on some pretense. One day some neighbors were talking about this lady, and in the conversation some surprise was expressed that her husband should have chosen her as a partner for life, when a young shaver, who was by listening, created considerable laughter by exclaiming, "Perhaps she borrowed him!"

THOSE familiar with country sights will be amused at the following display of city ideas in a young child:

Little Chester, of four years, went on a visit with his father and mother into the country for the first time. On stopping at a farm-house some of the natives took him out to the barn to see the litter of little pigs that were the delight of the children generally. After viewing them for a few minutes with great interest, Chester ran into the house exclaiming: "Oh! mamma, I've been to see the pigs, and the little pigs are eating the big pig up!"

AN Illinoisan writes: As I am a dear lover of the many amusing and interesting scraps contained in the Drawer, I have concluded to send the following, which contains more sad truth than funny poetry:

Doctor V——, of R——, in our State, being kept away from a certain gathering by his wife, was asked by a friend afterward why he was not present? Upon telling the reason, the friend remarked that he thought the Doctor was the head of his family. "So I am," says Doctor V——, "but heads always have necks, which control and turn the head wheresoever they will. So I'm the head of my family, but my wife is the neck, you know."

A DOWN-EASTER says: Having taken many good things out of the Drawer, allow me to put one in. One of our oldest inhabitants is a disciple of Galen, and don't like tobacco, but his son and clerk does, and keeps some cigars for sale. A man purchased one and began to light it, when the Doctor exclaimed, "You can't smoke that cigar in this shop!" "That's queer," says the customer, "that a man can't smoke a cigar in the shop where he buys it." "Humph!" replies the Doctor, "supposing a man buys an emetic of me, d'ye s'pose I'd allow him to vomit all over the shop?"

AT a revival meeting in one of the African Churches in a neighboring city a number of white gentlemen and ladies were present. The meeting was protracted for several hours, and the crowd was great. At length the atmosphere became decidedly unpleasant; and as the brethren grew excited, and streams of perspiration poured from the exhorting and shouting members, some of the ladies signified to the leader that they must either faint or retire.

With commendable promptness he stepped to the front of the platform, and interrupted the member who was holding forth by exclaiming, in a stentorian voice: "Make way dere, bruddern! make way! Missus Prim and Missus Cumin can't stan' dis no longer!" It is needless to say that this speech upset the whole party, and they availed themselves of the opportunity to seek the open air and give vent to their feelings.

ON one occasion a gentleman was relating a painful story of a little boy who was called from his play to go to a neighbor's for some milk. As he was returning from his errand the cars ran over him, killing him instantly. The gentleman was very pathetic, and at the close of his narrative there was a dead silence in the room, broken at last by one of the ladies of the company asking, gravely, "And what became of the milk?"

DURING a recent political campaign in the State of Massachusetts two orators set out together for the purpose of rousing a certain district to the spirit of the times. One (whom we will call Davis), being well known in this capacity, was to speak last, as it was feared, if he spoke first, that his colleague (Pratt by name) would be left minus an audience. They had charge of a very extensive district, and at each little town and village Davis delighted his hearers with the same speech until Pratt lost all patience. Finally, this repetition became a source of such annoyance that he set seriously to work to devise a way to put a stop to this method of speech-making. Being a fellow of some wit, he finally hit upon a plan which he thought might prove successful, and resolved to put it into execution at the next meeting. Accordingly, when the appointed hour arrived, and he was called upon for a few remarks, he rose, and, without the slightest hesitation, repeated Davis's speech, word for word! Poor Davis was utterly at a loss what to do; he rose in embarrassment, mumbled off a few words, and ended by saying that "the gentleman who had preceded him had exhausted the subject!"

"BEFORE the war" there lived on Pearl River a planter who prided himself greatly in being the possessor of a large number of very fine cattle, and made it a rule to kill a beef every Saturday. One Sunday a number of his friends took dinner at his house, and after the meal was finished the gentlemen retired to the piazza to enjoy their cigars. The host (who was very bald) was, as usual, boasting of his "fat cattle." A young gentleman, who had very frequently enjoyed the "fat cattle" homily, managed to get the subject of conversation changed. Another gentleman, seeing the host was very bald,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

asked why his hair was falling so badly? and before any one could reply the young gentleman said he knew. The host asked the reason. The young gentleman replied: "He has eaten so much of his 'fat beef' that he had to build an oak-bark fire on the top of his head to melt the tallow out of his mouth!"

Soon after the battle of Pittsburg Landing, in the spring of 1862, large supplies of filtered rain-water were forwarded to the army near Corinth, by the Sanitary Commission, for the use of the sick and wounded. Several barrels of this water were sent to the head-quarters of the Tenth Indiana Regiment, the heads of which barrels bore this inscription: "XX Old Rye Whisky." Now there happened to be in the Tenth Regiment a soldier familiarly known as "Quart," who was alike distinguished for his love of fun and an inordinate partiality for intoxicating beverages. The sight of the brand on the barrels lying in rear of the Colonel's tent led Quart into an error; he doubted not the correctness of the label, and lingered lovingly about head-quarters. He resolved to make a "raid" on the "Sanitary Stores" under the cover of darkness. He accordingly waited with considerable impatience until after tattoo roll-call in the evening, and having seen the last light in the camp extinguished, he noiselessly crept to the rear of the Colonel's quarters, armed with three canteens and a half-inch gimblet. He reached without observation the place where the precious stores were deposited; soon bored a hole in one of the barrels; filled his canteens hurriedly, and started back to his quarters; before reaching which, however, he stopped and took a "pull" at the contents of one of the canteens. Smacking his lips doubtingly, Quart raised the canteen to his mouth again and took another drink. Then, soliloquizing in so loud a tone that he was distinctly heard by the sentinel of the camp-guard on the nearest post, he said: "Well, I've voted an unscratched Democratic ticket for fifteen years, but, if this is whisky, by the powers I've lost my taste!"

While the —th Indiana Regiment was stationed at Raleigh, North Carolina, a few months after the surrender of Johnston's army, Colonel K——, one bright Sunday morning, astonished his Adjutant by ordering him to "make a detail of fifty men for fatigue duty, to report to the Chaplain at ten o'clock and hear him preach!" Whether the joke was on the soldiers composing the detail, the Chaplain, or the Colonel, the readers of the Drawer will have to decide when they are informed that the Chaplain good-humoredly took charge of the detachment, preached to it for two hours, and, on the evening of the same day, received into the Church three of the soldiers, who had not listened to a sermon before during the whole term of their service.

Of Father Homer a good story is told: He had a whining voice, and used to be much annoyed by any interruptions in his sermons. On one occasion he was reading the Scriptures, and a small dog that had strayed in began to whine. Father Homer read, in his whining tone: "'O make a joyful noise unto the Lord'—put out that dog!—'Sing unto the Lord a new song.'"

Dear Drawer,—Every one who has ever visited Madison, Wisconsin (the Saratoga of the West), must recollect Squire Seymour and his curious sayings. The Squire experienced a stroke of paralysis some years ago, and he has never fully recovered the possession of his faculties since; hence the queer sayings that he "gets off" are the more noticeable. A few days ago he was entertaining an admiring audience on the steps of the Vilas House with some of his yarns when somebody remarked: "Squire, we've been having some pretty hot weather this summer." Upon which the Squire replied, "Hot weather! I guess we have. Last week the thermometer stood at 102 in a cool place!"

A pastor's wife in Michigan sends the two following to the Drawer:

A friend who had spent the greater part of a day in writing invitations to a funeral undertook, in his preoccupied state of mind, to ask a blessing at table, and commenced—"Friends, relatives, and acquaintances!" A suppressed titter brought him to his senses.

Little M——, three years old, was just recovering from a pain under her apron. As soon as her tears were dry she asked: "Mamma, where does pain live?—with God in heaven, or in the woods with bears?"

The same little one was recovering from a dangerous illness, at two years old, and lay in my arms drooping and weak. She had been in her father's study many times when persons called desiring spiritual advice, and so was accustomed to language above her years. On this occasion, as I held her up to a window to see people pass to church, she exclaimed, with a voice weakened by illness: "Mamma, I ish I as a Kisten." "Why, my baby?" said I, clasping her close, lest she should fly from my arms to heaven. Imagine my relief and surprise when she replied, "To have a muff!" She saw the ladies passing with winter furs on their way to church—hence her pious wish.

Recently a number of gamblers were indicted before the Circuit Court held in B—— for indulging in certain practices contrary to the statute in such cases made and provided. The delinquents, finding that the prosecuting Attorney had a "sure thing on them," concluded not to come before the Court in person, but retained Mr. H—— to appear for them, plead guilty, and pay the fine. Accordingly, when the case was called, Mr. H—— rose, and the following colloquy ensued:

Mr. H——. "I appear for the defendants, and plead guilty."

Judge (entering on the docket). "Mr. H—— appears, pleads guilty, and is fined—"

Mr. H——. "But, your Honor, I have not yet received the money for the fine. I expect it to-morrow."

Judge. "It makes no difference, Sir. You are fined, and stand committed to jail until it is paid."

H——'s blank look, as he drew out his private pocket-book and muttered, "You won't catch me again in this way," was slightly amusing.

A Nebraska friend says:

Many years since, in the town of B——, in Vermont, lived old Uncle D——, who, although a pillar of the Church, was somewhat waggishly inclined. Also Benoni J——, who, for short, went by the name of Nony, a thin, spare old bachelor, of some fifty years—one of those half wits and half fools who get off a good many foolish things, and some

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

pretty sharp ones. Uncle D—— and Nony were in the hay-field, Uncle D—— pitching hay upon the wagon, and Nony loading, the not uncommon rivalry active between them—the pitcher trying to bury the loader in hay, and the loader crying, "More hay!" The load was high, and nearly finished, when Uncle D——, watching his time and chance, threw up a very large forkful, taking Nony in the rear with such force that he and the hay went down in somewhat of a hurry to the ground on the opposite side of the load. Uncle D——, stepping quickly around, cried out: "Why, Nony, what are you down here for?" "After more hay, Sir!" sharply replied Nony.

A LITTLE girl, whose mother often talked to her of heaven in such a way that she considered it a glorious shining place above the sky, crept in between the curtain and window one evening, and stood for a long time gazing into the sky. Suddenly she bounded to her mother's side, exclaiming, "Mother! oh, mother! I know now what the stars be! God punches holes in his floor, and that lets the shine down!"

UNCLE TOM DICKENS sold a horse to Judge A——, of Washington County, but while the process of bargaining was going on very conscientiously informed the Judge that the animal, although sound in wind and limb, had two grave faults. He refused to say what they were, and the Judge (who was a good judge at least of horse-flesh), liking the looks of the animal, concluded to buy him at a venture. He did so, and after taking a receipt for the money again besought Uncle Tom to tell him the faults. "Well," said the old man, "since you have bought him at your own risk, I don't care if I do. His first fault is, he won't allow you to catch him in the field." "Oh, Uncle Tom," said the Judge, "that is a trifling fault; pray what is the other?" "The other?" said Tom; "why, Judge, the other is, that after you do catch him he ain't worth having!"

A "DISBANDED VOLUNTEER," just returned from the Lower Mississippi, relates, among interesting incidents, one occurring on the river steamer en route to Cairo. Among the passengers was Major C——, commanding a battalion of regulars, an intelligent, sociable officer, and a Mrs. D——, of Natchez, the widow of a "Confederate" General who had fallen during the rebellion. The Major as well as the Madame was a fluent and agreeable conversationist, and during the trip—after an introduction—was not remiss in courtesies to the widow, whose natural hauteur had abated nothing under the rigueurs du guerre which, as a chivalrous Southern wife, she had endured. She entered with ardor into the recitals of her war experiences, and as she would conjure up the imagined wrongs of her "noble South," her emotional hate and bitterness found expression in the scowling face and flashing eye, while her tongue tired not with anathemas against the Yankee hireling invaders. The imperturbable Major hugely enjoyed the lady's spirited exhibit of her chivalrous adherence to the lost cause, and continued the discussion to the entertainment of a gathering audience in the parlor, adding fuel to the fire by sarcastic allusions to the impoverished appearance of the South, its exhausted manhood, its devoted and faithful, but helpless womanhood.

"Ay, Sir!" she exclaimed, "well may you spare my sex; but, Sir, for them I spurn your mercy as we ever did! We fed and clothed and nursed our soldiers in the field, and would have filled their places in the front, even with Richmond lost, but for the timorous counsels which prevailed in our surrender. And, Sir, when every Confederate fortress was taken, every city besieged, every cannon captured, and every soldier dead on the battle-field, the women of the South, jealous of the victory which their sons, husbands, and brothers had found in the grave, would have bared their bosoms to your Yankee bayonets, and dared you to the charge!"

"Pardon me, Madame," interposed the Major, "but I must take exception to your last remarks. Such a magnificent spectacle of your countrywomen's valor and sacrifice could never have been. Your own authorities would never have sanctioned such imprudent and absolutely illegal conduct of its own people."

"I do not comprehend you, Sir," said Madame.

"I mean, simply," rejoined the Major, with all seriousness, "that, conceding all admiration for the heroism, self-sacrifice, and noble devotion of the women of the South, not even in the direst alternative would they have bared their heaving bosoms to our bristling bayonets, as you avow; for, Madame, you must know that it was an inviolable law of the Confederate Government not to expose its cotton to the United States forces!"

The spell-bound listeners of either side joined in rapturous laughter, and all arising dispersed with convivial summons to the Major, who during the remainder of the trip magnanimously abstained, in the presence of the interesting but discomfited widow, from any further allusion to the Cotton Confederacy.

A CALIFORNIAN says he can't forbear from sending the following:

In the town of Santa Cruz there is an old settler named W——, who is troubled with a variety of pains, among them what he calls a "crick in his back." A few days ago I inquired how his "crick" was? and he, sitting down on an empty box, delivered himself thus: "Las' night, abeout sundown, as I was comin' home from milkin', carryin' two buckets of milk, I come along by that thar fence, and I had an awrful crick ontew my back, and just then I had tew sneeze, and ef I hadn't hev dropped them milk-buckets and grabbed hold on the fence, why I'll be blowed ef it wouldn't hev throwd me!"

ANOTHER old fellow in the same place (a carpenter by trade) has a most singular way of mixing up words that sound alike—for instance, he calls an "avenue" a revenue, a "portico" a port-folio, a "*pro*jection" an *in*jection, etc. He was building a pulpit for a church once, and at a meeting of the congregation, when the "pulpit" question was discussed, he got up and said: "Ef I was goin' tew build another pulpit I would give it abeout six inches more injection on the front, and hev the carvin's made so that they wud hang in glisters [clusters] areound the sides!"

A—— J——, who has been raised on a farm in these parts, but who has exchanged that invigorating life for the more seductive pursuit of clerking in one of the stores of a Western town, was a short time since accosted by a lady customer, who inquired if they were supplied with that very useful article known as "ladies' hose?" A—— replied in the affirmative, and, proceeding into a back apart-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ment, returned with a small garden-hoe, generally used by children, but which A—— no doubt supposed would be suitable for the gentle sex. As may be supposed, the lady was a little "took aback;" but fortunately another clerk, who was better acquainted with ladies' wearing apparel, came to the rescue, and supplied the customer's wants. As she retired A—— wondered why in thunder she couldn't say stockings! He has recovered.

HERE is a reminiscence of our old regiment the —st Heavy Artillery:

Tom S—— and Sim L—— had been absent on "sick leave," and had reached Washington on their way to rejoin the regiment, both "dead broke" and both very dry. Marching into a saloon on Pennsylvania Avenue, Tom inquired if they took stamps. "Certainly, Sir," said the bar-keeper. "Then set on yer pisen," said Tom; and the "pisen" was produced. Both drank, and then, stepping back from the bar, began to "mark time" with great gravity and a good deal of noise. "What are you trying to do? What do you mean by stamping in that manner?" said the proprietor. "Paying for the drinks! Didn't you say you took stamps?" said Sim, with his face a yard long.

DEAR DRAWER,—I have been on a visit among the classic hills of Old Virginia, and have had a pleasant time among the genial "reconstructed." Of course I picked up an anecdote or two worth saving. You have heard of the "demoralized" Jersey soldier? The story is told differently as it really originated at the battle of Malvern Hill. In the terrible fire from the Union artillery some gray-coated regiments got well scared, but generally stood killing remarkably well. At this time General Lee met a loose-jointed, angular specimen, that looked as if his limbs were made of long saplings, with an extra supply of knee and hip joints, like the fifth wheel of an artillery wagon—in case of accidents.

"Where are you going, Sir?" said the General, in that cool, gentle tone he never seemed to lose.

"Well, Jineral, I'm gwine back to the wagons," said Joints.

"Are you wounded?" asked the Commander.

"No, I ain't wounded," was the reply, "but I'm gwine back to the wagons."

"A stout man like you leaving the field!—are you sick?" asked General Lee.

"No, I ain't sick nor wounded nuther, but, Jineral, I'm terrible demoralized!" said the soldier.

At this the General smiled and remonstrated; shamed him with being cowardly, until the fellow reluctantly turned his steps to the front. He had gone but a short distance before he turned and spoke again:

"Jineral," said he, "I ain't no coward—no sich a thing—but I've been down yander, and it ain't no fittin' place for nobody!"

He went back to the wagons.

I HEARD one of General Jubal Early that ought not to be lost:

Early, up to the last minute, was a Union man, and to the last never would acknowledge secession or take its oaths. He called it revolution, and sneered at the right of secession as a cowardly compromise. On this account neither he nor his regiment was popular with the South Carolinians, who called him and his men Union men, Yankees, etc. It happened, at the first battle of Bull Run, Early and his regiment advancing met one of the most irritating of these regiments in full retreat. He "let on," and cursed as perhaps no living man but he can, asking where in the —— they were going? He was informed, in a hundred voices, that the enemy were too hot for them; and with a parting curse he raised in his stirrups, and said:

"Virginians! open ranks and let the South Carolina chivalry pass through!"

And they did, and never liked old Early afterward.

FROM Louisville, Kentucky, come the two following:

Fry Lawrence, our gay and genial legislator, who loves a good pun as much as he does fish chowder on "Floyd's Fork," and "yours truly" were riding to Louisville when he noticed that some one had felled one of his fine trees. In a vexed tone he said: "Look! some thieving scoundrel has cut down one of my fine trees!"

"Never mind, Fry," I said, gravely, "the fellow who cut it down will be apt to cut it up!"

He considered himself paid, but hinted the next time I wanted to make a joke I should use the axe on my own trees instead of his. It was too expensive.

I GOT George M'G—— in nearly the same way. Our Blind Asylum, near Louisville, has about a thousand windows in it and "nary shutter." Riding down one day, he made the usual remark about so much light for those who didn't need it, and asked why there were no shutters to the windows.

"So there are," I replied, "but they are of the fashionable kind, and have the 'blinds' on the inside!"

A FRIEND in Baltimore sends the two following:

Who has not heard of "love in a cottage," "love by the sea-shore," and "love under difficulties?" I have heard of each, but never until a few days ago did I hear of "love in a car." This I not only heard, but was an eye-witness to the comedy. Having business that required my attention in the northwestern section of the city until a late hour, I, at half past eleven o'clock, found myself seated in a Madison Avenue car (the number I shall not state). At the corner of Franklin and Eutaw streets a young gentleman and lady entered the car, and occupied a seat in the corner of the car opposite myself. Being a great admirer of females I stole a glance at the lady, and was recompensed by beholding a very handsome young miss, with black hair and eyes—the latter appearing as if Cupid, the God of Love, had rented the premises, and was determined to dispute the sway of man. Her companion was one of that species of bipeds known as the genus homo. He was attired in a bran-new suit of Harrison Street store clothes, and appeared as gay as a peacock. The first thing he did after seating himself was to encircle the neck of the lady with his left arm, while his right hand lovingly grasped her soft and delicate left. Not being used to such scenes (being a bachelor), I kept my t'other eye open, and noted down the proceedings in my mind.

"Clara!" began the passionate lover, "ain't this nice? I swon it's a good deal better 'n ridin' in the old wagin!"

"Yes, Josh," feebly articulated Clara. "But don't hug me so; the folks are lookin' at us."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Well, let 'em look!" retorted Josh. "Guess they'd like tu be in my place a spell, enny how!" (I, for one, did most heartily envy him the position.)

"Yes; but, Josh, you know they will laugh at us," meekly rejoined his companion.

"Let them laugh!" exclaimed the irate lover. "Don't I love you, and don't you love me, and ain't we a-goin' to git married to-morrer?"

Josh at this moment appeared as though a brilliant idea had struck him, for he suddenly bent over and kissed his fair companion square in the mouth.

"There!" said he, exultingly, "ain't that nice? You don't allers git them sort!" Then, turning to the occupants of the car, he exclaimed, "Strangers, me and this young woman have come down from the country to git married. She is a nice gal, and I'm a-goin' to do the right thing by her!"

During the delivery of this concise speech Clara's face was suffused with blushes; noticing which her ardent lover remarked, "Don't git so all-fired red about the gills, Clara. You know that we are a-goin' to be married, and what's the use to fluster up so?"

This last speech settled the business of the passengers. They gave one shout, and relieved their bodies of a charge of laughter that had almost strangled them. At the corner I vacated the car, leaving the happy couple as contented as if the future denoted nothing but sunshine and pleasure—and such I trust it may prove to them.

A YANKEE gentleman, from "away down East," by the name of B——, not long since purchased a farm in York County, Pennsylvania, built himself a pretty little cottage, and became "the aristocratic farmer" of that section. As customary, he removed his family for the summer season to dwell upon his country seat, and enjoy all the luxuries of a country life; but in doing this it was his lot to become acquainted with many of the "low Dutch" inhabitants of that section, who know only enough to "wote enny ticket mit a Shackson on it," and "make Misder Climer in offis." A few days after Mr. B——'s family had become settled in their new home they were called upon by some of the "Dutch dignities," and in the course of conversation the following tribute was paid to the worth of a departed wife:

MRS. B——. "How is your wife, Hans?"

HANS. "Ish haben no vife now."

MRS. B——. "Then you have been married?"

HANS. "Oh, yaw, Ish haben been married, but she be dett now—she be gone!"

MRS. B——. "What a pity! I am very sorry for your lot, Hans—very sorry indeed; but you must remember it is decreed the best of friends must some day part."

HANS. "Her name vas not Lot, ef you bleese; her name vas Shoanna, an' she makes me a gude vife, a very gude vife while she be livin'; she be sich a gude ooman to me an' my farm. Oh, she vas sich a gude worker dat Ish feel her loss very mooch indeedt."

MRS. B——. "But, Hans, you can get another, can't you?"

HANS. "Oh yaw, Ish could haben annudder vife, but den she be not so mooch gude as Shoanna vas to me an' my farm. 'Pon my vort, mam" (puting his hand to his breast), "Ish feels her loss very mooch indeed; she vas wordt to me more as all my children togedder. Do you pleef me ef I shall dell you dat she vas more as haff uf my wordt? You see dat pig parn uf mine shust as you bass my house, on der left uf der hill dare?—vell, Missers B——, dat parn cost me more as dree tousand dollar, unt shust so shure as I lif, I would shust so leaf as dat parn tu be burn down den fur my vife Shoanna to hef died!"

DEAR DRAWER,—The amusing story, related in a recent Number, of the printers who made a mistake on account of the word who being spelled hue in the "copy," reminds me of a lawyer with whom I became acquainted in Indiana, while teaching school there, some fifteen years ago. Although a very respectable lawyer, yet he had studied his spelling-book a little too carelessly in his younger days. At one session of the court he was engaged in the prosecution of a man for the fraudulent sale of some property, and called the attention of the jury to the dishonest appearance of the defendant as an evidence of his guilt. "Why, gentlemen of the jury," said he, "don't his very looks convict him? Can't you read on his countenance, unmistakably written there, the word f-r-o-a-d, frod?"

THIS lawyer had a brother who was a minister, and who was not only careless in literary matters, but really very ignorant. One Sabbath morning, having selected a text from the first chapter of the second epistle of John, he made the following announcement to his congregation: "Beloved hearers, my text may be found in the one-eyed chapter of two-eyed John." The same man, in writing the word God, always commenced it with a small j. On one occasion, being called upon to speak in a political meeting, he began by saying that he should make only a few dulcetory (desultory) remarks.

A TRAVELER, in relating his adventures, told his listeners that he and his servant had made fifty wild Arabs run. Observing the looks of incredulity which greeted this astonishing narration, he added that there was no great matter in it, "for," said he, "we ran, and they ran after us!"

A GOOD parody was that involved in the story of a young English nobleman with a large number of titles and a very small amount of brains. Several young ladies were discussing his many names—Lord this, Viscount that, and so on ad infinitum. "My fair friends," said the witty N——, "one of his titles you appear to have forgotten." "Oh!" was the universal exclamation, "what is that?" "He is Barren of Intellect," was the rejoinder.

OF the same character (as far as the insinuation is concerned) a good anecdote is told of a well-known professor at Edinburgh. Walking out one day, he met an individual who had the disagreeable reputation of a fool. "Pray," said the professor, accosting him, "how long can a person live without brains?" "I dinna ken, Sir," replied the fellow, scratching his pate; "how long have you lived yourself?"

A GOOD story is told of the naval hero of the late war, Admiral Farragut. The Drawer can not vouch for its authenticity, but gives it as related by an eminent theologian and divine. Bishop Clark, of Rhode Island, is eminent for his devotion to the interests of his diocese, and yet loves to unbend in genial society. One day he was recreating at Newport, and fell into the company of the Admiral. The Bishop was smoking, and politely offered a cigar to his companion. Turning his bronzed face

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

upon the Bishop, Farragut soberly remarked: "No, thank you, Bishop; I never smoke, but I sometimes swear a little!" The answer took the Bishop aback somewhat, but he quickly recovered himself, and replied: "Ah, I see, smoking and swearing don't go together!" It was "diamond cut diamond."

We have in our city (New Haven) a curious genius, J. B——, who might with propriety be called one of the "oldest inhabitants." He is not as much noted for his respect for religion and ministers as for his odd sayings and his attachment to the Democratic party. A few days since he was met on the street by our city missionary, Deacon S——, and the Deacon, thinking B—— was a good subject for missionary labor, asked him, with tender solicitude, "Are you, Mr. B——, in view of your advanced age and that journey which you soon must take, laying up stores above?" "Well, Deacon," replied B——, "I can't exactly tell; but I've always been a good Democrat!"

An Episcopal clergyman, who is on the best of terms with the Presbyterian clergy, happened, when conversing with one of them concerning his spiritual experience among his flock, to inquire whether he did not find certain proceedings somewhat embarrassing. "Now, with us Episcopal ministers," said he, "it is not usual to ask individuals to join in prayer with us, unless upon particular occasions of sickness or distress; whereas with you, I understand, it is customary to do so at all times and seasons. Is not the introduction of this matter sometimes a little awkward?"

The Presbyterian, a most excellent and pious man, protested that he did not experience any such feeling; "but," added he, "I confess that when I first entered the ministry a little unpleasantness did arise from the custom of which you speak. Finding myself alone with a member of my congregation—an honest but rather subservient tradesman in a small way of business—I seized the opportunity of improvement, and asked him to unite with me for a few minutes in devotional exercise.

"'Certainly, Sir,' returned he, 'if it's the smallest gratification to you!' which was, I confess, exceedingly embarrassing."

The anecdotes in the September Drawer of the absent-minded gentleman who threw the pig in the well and so kindly placed the toad in the shade of his carriage and then drove on, bring to mind an incident, affording no little amusement, which occurred when the writer hereof was a boy. Our neighbor S—— had several boys—good fellows too—who one morning, while feeding their stock, caught a rabbit alive, which Hiram was carrying home in his arms. Before reaching home another one started up, creating the usual excitement; and with yells that would have done credit to Comanches the boys "went" for him. Whereupon Hiram, stepping into a fence-corner, very carefully set his rabbit down and gave chase with the rest. He discovered his mistake too late: his rabbit didn't stay where he set it.

I think, writes a correspondent, that Western New York should contribute to the Drawer, and therefore send an account of an accident that happened to a house-painter and his assistant, some years since, while at work about my house: The painter was Squire W——, a good man, a member of the Church, and, of course, not addicted to swearing himself, albeit "he swore others;" his assistant, on the other hand, being a "terrible swearer" when his boss was absent. The Squire and his assistant were painting the inside of the roof of the veranda; they were seated on a plank suspended from the roof, with a large pail of paint between them. Suddenly the rope gave way, and down came Squire W—— and the pail of paint squash on the floor, the paint flying about and completely covering the head, face, and person of Squire W——. This was too much for human nature to endure quietly, and Squire W——, springing from his prostrate position, raised his clenched fist, and brought it down with the exclamation: "By—Golly!"—pausing a moment between the two words. His assistant, who for an instant had clung to the roof, dropped beside the excited boss, and raising his fist, and bringing it down with "a vim," exclaimed—"Or something stronger!"

We are afraid the Maine Liquor Law made many "temperance houses" like that of which our correspondent writes as follows:

Dear Drawer,—A few years ago, when the Maine Liquor Law was in full force in Vermont, Judge C——, of ——, was on a journey. He stopped at a tavern in the town of —— for the night. After supper the Judge asked the worthy landlord "for a glass of gin." The landlord said "he was sorry he could not accommodate him. I am obliged by the law to keep a temperance house." It was late, so the Judge could not go on that night, but told the landlord he would leave early the next morning before breakfast. "Very well; I will carry your valise and show you to your room." The Judge was taken to a fine room; the landlord said, "I hope you will be comfortable." There was an open stove in the room, where Judge C—— found a bottle of brandy. He then went to his wash-stand and opened it; he found a bottle of gin, water, glasses, etc. The Judge then went to a cupboard, and there was a bottle of old Bourbon. The Judge, after helping himself, went down and told the landlord he would not leave early. After breakfast the next morning Judge C—— paid his bill, and said to the landlord, "I have been a great opposer of 'temperance houses,' and always refused to stop at one, but I like the hang of yours, and will call whenever I come this way." The landlord said, "I'm sorry I could not let you have some gin last evening; but the law is so strict, and my neighbors keep close watch, so I am obliged to keep a 'temperance house.'"

A Connecticut Yanker sends the two following:

Having occasion to travel over part of this State in a stage-coach, and the roads being very bad, we (the passengers), to relieve the tedium of the journey, resorted to relating anecdotes. One was particularly relished as being "spun" by a reverend gentleman, and I will relate it as nearly as I can in his own words. Said he: "I was stopping a short time since in a country town in Pennsylvania, and while there a short, fat, beer-drinking Dutchman and a young Dutch lady were introduced to me as wishing to be united in the holy bonds of matrimony. Of course I was willing to give them my help, and after the ceremony was performed and the 'fee' paid, the newly-made bride thought it proper for her to say something to the 'dominie.' Acting

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

upon the thought she stepped up to me, and throwing both arms around my neck, she said: 'Oh, doctor, doctor, I feel so goot! I feel so goot!' I thought I was amply repaid for helping them through their difficulty."

Not a great distance from this place there is a certain church, in the congregation of which one old lady is a constant attendant and a devout believer. This old lady had a custom of saying to herself, when any thing pleased her more than usual in the sermon, "Glory to God!" or "Glory, Hallelujah!" One day the minister getting interested and excited, the old lady also partook of the excitement, and commenced to say very loud, "Glory to God!" very much to the surprise of the congregation. Getting excited again, she said, louder yet, "Glory, Hallelujah!" which caused one of the deacons to speak to her, telling her she was disturbing the rest of the people, but she paid him no attention whatever. Suddenly they heard, "Glory to God!" again. This time the deacon said to her if she did it again he should have to take her out of the church. No attention did she pay him, however; and again "Glory to God!" came forth sharp and clear. This, however, exasperated the deacon beyond measure, so, motioning to another of his brethren, they formed a chair of their hands and carried the old lady toward the door. Just as she reached the door she burst forth with: "Glory to God in the highest! I have more honor than my Master! He was carried on one ass, while I have two!"

A FRIEND in Detroit, from whom the Drawer is always glad to hear, gives, as follows, his reminiscences of a distinguished but eccentric man:

Hon. A. B. Woodward, a native of Virginia, was appointed by President Jefferson, in 1805, Chief Justice of Michigan Territory. The Judge was a bachelor, and used to buy a dozen shirts, with broad cambric ruffles, at a time; and would put one of the dozen on, and wear it until it became soiled; then put on shirt No. 2 over the first, and so one after another, until he had the whole twelve upon his person at the same time. When the exterior one was too dirty to wear longer this one was taken off, and No. 11 came into view. Thus he proceeded until the entire lot (save No. 12) had been twice exposed to view. Then the whole dozen were sent to his laundress, and he would lie in bed until they were purified and returned to him, when he would go through the same rotation, month after month, until they were all worn out, and then he got another dozen. The Judge would buy at a slop-shop one flannel under-shirt, put it on and wear it, without change and unwashed, until it literally came off him in shreds.

In a newspaper office one hears many good things. I send the Drawer the last I heard:

A few days ago a countryman came into the office to pay his subscription. After doing so he loitered round for some time, putting questions about the standing and capabilities of several educational establishments advertised in our paper. One of these was presided over by a gentleman who affixed the letters A.M. to his name. Our countryman was rather multitudinous in his inquiries concerning this institution, and particularly wanted to know if they were good at teaching "figures" there (meaning arithmetic). Rather annoyed at his interminable questioning, at length I said, rather gruffly, pointing to the two magic letters:

"A man that can add those letters to his name surely ought to be able to teach arithmetic."

"Oh! yes, I see!" was the response; "he is a Arithmetical Master! I didn't notice that before."

I retired immediately, that the dignity of the office might not be compromised by my laughter. The countryman retired too, evidently satisfied that that institution was capable of teaching the rising generation how to "figure."

A FRIEND in Missouri says:

Your anecdotes of children I consider the most attractive feature of the Drawer. I am a physician, and was called one morning, not long since, to a gentleman of the village laboring under an attack of inflammatory rheumatism. I bled him, and after I was through performed the same operation for another member of the family who was indisposed. One of the little girls, three or four years old, seeing so much blood-letting going on, became alarmed, and, breaking out into tears, asked her mother if the doctor was going to bleed them all? She thought it was like vaccination, and had to go all around.

A BOSTON correspondent sends the two following:

The year 1857 found me on board one of the many ships sent from New Bedford to catch whales. Our officers and crew were mostly ignorant, uneducated persons, and some of them very much so. One of this class, who hailed from Rhode Island, had been christened "Jonathan," from his excessive verdancy. On approaching the "line" Jonathan had been shown it through the telescope (by the old trick of stretching a hair across the glass), and for several days after appeared to be in deep study. On being asked the cause of his thoughtfulness, he replied: "When I'm at home I live close to the line, but I didn't think it run way down here; and, by thunder, I don't see what holds it up!"

WHEN lying in port on the Peruvian coast I was one evening called on deck by Jonathan to see the "greatest sight ever seen;" and on gaining the deck found half a dozen of the crew gazing with astonishment at a comet, and was just in time to hear some one exclaim: "I swon that star's on fire!" One individual suggested it was a comet, to which Jonathan replied: "Of course it is; I've seen lots of 'em!" And when his informant ventured to remark that they were not to be seen very often, he continued: "Maybe they ain't out here, but there's any quantity of them in Rhode Island!"

THE sermon which a "Naval Officer" sends to the Drawer has been preached more than once, but it will do no harm to repeat it again, and may do good:

Happening to be in Western New York some years ago, I was induced to go and hear a farewell sermon. The congregation was large, and expectation on tip-toe, because the minister had been unfortunate enough to incur the hostility of a part of his people, and his salary had been but partially paid. This, however, was nothing unusual, and gave point to the following remarks in his discourse:

"The minister that you want here must have three qualifications. First, he must be young and unmarried, that he may be able to accept the salary that you promise; Secondly, he must have a small appetite, to be able to live on what you pay; Third-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ly, he must be a good man, so that he may live in heaven all the week, come down and preach for you on Sunday, and go back again in time for tea!"

In the spring of 1865 Surgeon C——, United States Volunteers, was stationed at Chattanooga. The Doctor is an Irishman, full of Fenianism, and of a pugilistic temperament. The Doctor paid a visit to Nashville, and, after finishing his business and buying a new uniform, determined to enjoy himself. With several friends he went to see the play at the new theatre. After the second act one of the party getting up, said, "Isn't it time to go and liquor?" Not having heard the phrase before the Doctor was surprised. He sprang up, and doubling his fists and looking around in a very threatening manner, said: "Lick who?" It is needless to add the party smiled hugely. The subject is still a very sore one with the Doctor.

The following curious incidents are vouched for by the clerical party who narrates them:

On the first occasion of my interring a parishioner the sexton had made a mistake in the dimensions of the grave, and during the service in church this same clerk coolly came with a piece of tape and measured the coffin, exclaiming to me, by way of apology for the interruption: "I want to see how long er be." He came again a few minutes afterward and repeated this operation, nodding even more familiarly than before: "I want to see how broad er be," said he. But even these most unreasonable interruptions were in vain, for when the body was carried into the church-yard the grave was still too small for its reception. I of course waited for the arrangements to be completed, and endeavored to look as unconscious as I could, while the clerk confidently exhorted me in a broad whisper to "Go on wi' it, bless yer. Why can't ye let us have er when you ha' done wi' er?"

I dare say it will surprise some folk to learn that this man is parish clerk still, although, it is true, with greatly improved manners; and I wish one-half of the folk in my parish were as honest and kind-hearted as he, or as zealous in securing to the Church her proper dues. There is a certain cobbler in the village who, although a worthy fellow, entertains unorthodox opinions, and with whom the clerk is therefore always at variance; and the latter gives me this curious account of his failing to obtain from the son of Crispin our Easter dues:

"I am come for your Easter offering, Mr. Last," observed the ecclesiastical official, looking over the half-door behind which the little cobbler sits cross-legged at his work.

"And what is an Easter offering, and why should I give it?" inquired the skeptic.

"Well, never you mind about that; only give it, that's all."

"Won't you step in and take a bit of bacon with me, Mr. Clerk, for I am just a-going to have my dinner?"

"No, thank yer; I want my Easter offering."

"Well, then, take a drap o' summit warm; I've got some ale yonder upon the hob."

The clerk could not help looking wishful, but he replied stoutly, as before, that he only wanted the Easter offering.

"At least you will take a pipe," insisted the cobbler: "here is tobacco and the box of lucifers."

The clerk resolutely shook his head.

"Very well," said the cobbler, with a chuckle; "I've tried ye with a meat-offering, with a drink-offering, and with a burnt-offering, and now you will have no other sort of offering from me, I promise ye." And he kept his word.

An English curate says: The first great astonishment that I received after entering upon the duties of my profession was when baptizing a male infant.

"Name this child."

"Nero," replied one of the godfathers, with the greatest gravity.

"My good man," said I, "I do not know whether I am justified in positively refusing to christen your infant by such a name, but I adjure you to pause before you give it him. Nero was a vile and cruel tyrant, and persecuted Christian folk."

"I don't know about that, Sir," replied the father of the child, scratching his head; "but I should like him to have a Bible name."

"But the name of Nero does not occur in the Bible."

"Oh yes, it do, Sir;" and with that he produced a copy of the sacred volume which had been presented to him by my own wife; and certainly the word "Nero" was to be found there, though printed in the margin and in diamond type.

The same clergyman says: It is often very troublesome to a young curate, particularly if unaccustomed to the particular dialect of his parish, to catch the exact name which the sponsor wishes to be conferred, and this difficulty is increased when the word happens to begin with a vowel. A young girl once came to my house to have her name entered in the list of the students for confirmation.

"Very well, my good girl, what is your Christian name?" and I waited, pen in hand, to set it down.

"Anner, Sir."

"Is it Anna or Hannah?" said I.

"Anner, Sir."

"Please to spell it. I want to know whether there is an H in it."

"Yes, Sir: H, HA, HEN, HEN, HA, H."

There were six.

Old Dr. A—— was a quack, and a very ignorant one. On one occasion he was called by mistake to attend a council of physicians in a critical case. After considerable discussion the opinion was expressed by one that the patient was convalescent. When it came Doctor A——'s turn to speak: "Convalescent!" said he; "why that's nothing serious; I have cured convalescence in twenty-four hours!"

A New England Doctor of Divinity sends the two following:

A very intelligent lady, riding lately in the rear car of a long train, remarked to her companion that the train seemed to move very slowly; and a moment after added, with a most Partingtonian unconsciousness: "But perhaps it's because we are in the last car!"

A primary school class being up for examination, the teacher asked: "Now, children, what makes an eclipse?" All silent, with much facial twisting, as if to screw out the mystery. At last a carroty-headed urchin, shutting tightly his eyes, with evident determination "to do or die," jerked out at the top of his voice the singularly true but inappropriate answer: "God Almighty!" There was a profound pause.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CC.—JANUARY, 1867.—Vol. XXXIV.

At the Area Gate.

I walked up from the ferry through the close and dusty street, Where all of the meaner forms of living seemed to meet;
Where children, with faces old and hardened before their time,
Wrangled and clawed for bones in the gutter's stagnant slime.

There were rows of the vilest stalls that misery could collect—
The squalid trade that comes with the loss of self-respect—
And kills by its lying pretense of value for value given
The last pure hope that falls from vainly pitying Heaven.

Some cleanness of self-respect at the door of a dwelling lay,
Though pressed by squallor around only half kept at bay;
And behind the area gate on the pavement undefiled
Sat in the narrow shade a white-clad, year-old child.

White by the dusty sidewalk it looked through the iron bars,
Clasped by its pearly fingers, pure as the midnight stars—
Looked with blue-eyed wonder that was terrible to see—
So near to horror, a shade might change it eternally.

But the child was too late from God, too perfect to take the stain
Of the infinite black experience of want and woe and pain;
And the hopeless street grew bright with hopefulness untold,
As on the gate the fingers kept their yet unconscious hold.

Measureless light and beauty transfigured the dismal place,
Shed from the innocence of that wonder-lifted face,
And out of the street the passers carried the golden rays
To their separate devious paths through the city's wastes and ways.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1866, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Vol. XXXIV.—No 200 —K

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

From The Fairy Book of All Nations. By EDOUARD LA BOULAYE, Member of the Institute of France. Translated by MARY L. BOOTH. Harper and Brothers.

YVON AND FINETTE.

A FAIRY TALE OF BRITTANY.

I.

ONCE upon a time there lived in Brittany a noble lord, who was called the Baron Kerver. His manor-house was the most beautiful in the province. It was a great Gothic castle, with a groined roof and walls, covered with carving, that looked at a distance like a vine climbing over an arbor. On the first floor six stained glass balcony windows looked out on each side toward the rising and the setting sun. In the morning, when the baron, mounted on his dun mare, went forth into the forest, followed by his tall greyhounds, he saw at each window one of his daughters, with prayer-book in hand, praying for the house of Kerver, and who, with their fair curls, blue eyes, and clasped hands, might have been taken for six Madonnas in an azure niche. At evening, when the sun declined and the baron returned homeward, after riding round his domains, he perceived from afar, in the windows looking toward the west, six sons, with dark locks and eagle gaze, the hope and pride of the family, that might have been taken for six sculptured knights at the portal of a church. For ten leagues round, all who wished to quote a happy father and a powerful lord named the Baron Kerver.

The castle had but twelve windows, and the baron had thirteen children. The last, the one that had no place, was a handsome boy of sixteen, by the name of Yvon. As usual, he was the best beloved. In the morning, at his departure, and at evening, on his return, the baron always found Yvon waiting on the threshold to embrace him. With his hair falling to his waist, his graceful figure, his willful air, and his bold bearing, Yvon was beloved by all the Bretons. At twelve years of age he had bravely attacked and killed a wolf with an axe, which had won him the name of Fearless. He deserved the title, for never was there a bolder heart.

One day, when the baron had staid at home, and was amusing himself by breaking a lance with his squire, Yvon entered the armory in a traveling dress, and, bending one knee to the ground,

"My lord and father," said he to the baron, "I come to ask your blessing. The house of Kerver is rich in knights, and has no need

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google of a child; it is time for me to go to seek my fortune. I wish to go to distant countries to try my strength, and to make myself a name."

"You are right, Fearless," replied the baron, more moved than he wished to appear. "I will not keep you back; I have no right to do so; but you are very young, my child; perhaps it would be better for you to stay another year with us."

"I am sixteen, my father; at that age you had already fought one of the proudest lords of the country. I have not forgotten that our arms are a unicorn ripping up a lion, and our motto Onward! I do not wish the Kervers to blush for their last child."

Yvon received his father's blessing, shook hands with his brothers, embraced his sisters, bid adieu to all the weeping vassals, and set out with a light heart.

Nothing stopped him on his way. A river appeared, he swam it; a mountain, he climbed it; a forest, he made his way through it with the sun for a guide. On—the Kerver! he cried, whenever he met with an obstacle, and went straight forward in spite of every thing.

For three years he had been roaming over the world in search of adventures, sometimes conquering, sometimes conquered, always bold and gay, when he received an offer to go to fight the heathen of Norway. To kill unbelievers and to conquer a kingdom was a double pleasure. Yvon enlisted twelve brave comrades, freighted a ship, and hoisted from the main-mast a blue standard, with the unicorn and motto of the Kervers.

The sea was calm, the wind fair, and the night serene. Yvon, stretched on the deck, watched the stars, and sought the one which cast its trembling light on his father's castle. All at once the vessel struck upon a rock; a terrible crash was heard; the sails fell like tinder; and an enormous wave burst over the deck, and swept away every thing upon it.

"On—the Kerver!" cried Yvon, as soon as his head appeared above the water; and he began to swim as tranquilly as if he had been bathing in the lake of the old castle. Happily the moon was rising. Yvon saw, at a little distance, a black speck among the silvery waves—it was land. He approached it, not without difficulty, and finally succeeded in gaining a foothold. Dripping wet, exhausted with fatigue, and out of breath, he dragged himself on the sand; then, without more anxiety, said his prayers, and went to sleep.

II.

In the morning, on awaking, Yvon tried to discover in what country he had been cast. He saw in the distance a house as large as a church, with windows fifty feet in height. He walked a whole day before reaching it, and at last found himself in front of an immense door, with a knocker so heavy that it was impossible for a man to lift it.

Yvon took a great stone and began to knock. "Come in!" cried a voice, that sounded like the roar of a bull. At the same instant the door opened, and the little Breton found himself in the presence of a giant not less than forty feet in height.

"What is your name, and what do you want here?" said the giant, taking up Yvon between his thumb and finger, and lifting him from the ground so as to see him better.

"My name is Fearless, and I am seeking my fortune," answered Yvon, looking at the monster with an air of defiance.

"Well, brave Fearless, your fortune is made," said the giant, in a mocking tone. "I am in need of a servant, and I will give you the place. You can go to work directly. This is the time for leading my sheep to the pasture; you may clean the stable while I am gone. I shall give you nothing else to do," added he, bursting into a laugh. "You see that I am a good master. Do your task, and, above all things, don't prowl about the house, or it will cost you your life."

"Certainly I have a good master; the work is not hard," thought Yvon, when the giant was gone. "I have plenty of time to sweep the stable. What shall I do meanwhile to amuse myself? Shall I look about the house? Since I am forbidden to do so, it must be because there is something to see."

He entered the first room, and saw a large fire-place, in which a great pot was hanging, suspended from a hook. The pot was boiling, but there was no fire on the hearth.

"What does this mean?" thought Yvon;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"there is some mystery here." He cut off a lock of his hair, dipped it into the pot, and took it out all coated with copper.

"Oh, oh!" cried he, "this is a new kind of soup: any body that swallows it must have an iron-clad stomach."

He went into the next room; there also a pot was suspended from a hook, and boiling without fire. Yvon dipped a lock of hair into it, and took it out all coated with silver.

"The broth is not so rich as this in the Kerver kitchen," thought he, "but it may have a better taste."

Upon this, he entered the third room. There also a pot was suspended from a hook, and boiling without fire. Yvon dipped a lock of hair into it, and took it out all coated with gold. It shone so brightly that it might have been mistaken for a sunbeam.

"Good!" cried he. "In our country the old women have a saying, 'Every thing gets worse and worse;' here it is just the contrary, every thing gets better and better. What shall I find in the fourth room, I wonder—diamond soup?"

He pushed open the door, and saw something rarer than precious stones. This was a young woman of such marvelous beauty that Yvon, dazzled, fell on his knees at the sight.

"Unfortunate youth!" cried she, in a trembling voice, "what are you doing here?"

"I belong to the house," answered Yvon; "the giant took me into his service this morning."

"His service!" repeated the young girl. "May Heaven preserve you from it!"

"Why so?" said Yvon. "I have a good master; the work is not hard. The stable once swept, my task is finished."

"Yes, and how will you set to work to sweep it?" said the lady. "If you sweep it in the usual way, for every forkful of dung that you throw out of the door ten will come in at the window. But I will tell you what to do. Turn the fork and sweep with the handle, and the dung will instantly fly out of itself."

"I will obey," said Yvon; upon which he sat down by the young girl and began to talk with her. She was the daughter of a fairy, whom the wretched giant had made his slave. Friendship soon springs up between companions in misfortune. Before the end of the day Finette (for that was the lady's name) and Yvon had already promised to belong to each other, if they could escape from their abominable master. The difficulty was to find the means.

Time passes quickly in this kind of talk. Evening was approaching, when Finette sent away her new friend, advising him to sweep the stable before the giant came home.

Yvon took down the fork, and attempted to use it as he had seen it done at his father's castle. He soon had enough of it. In less than a second there was so much dung in the stable that the poor boy knew not which way to turn. He did as Finette had bid him; he turned the fork and swept with the handle, when behold! in the twinkling of an eye the stable was as clean as if no cattle had ever entered it.

The task finished, Yvon seated himself on a bench before the door of the house. As soon as he saw the giant coming he lolled back in his seat, crossed his legs, and began to sing one of his native airs.

"Have you cleaned the stable?" asked the giant, with a frown.

"Every thing is ready, master," answered Yvon, without troubling himself to move.

"I am going to see for myself," howled the giant. He entered the stable grumbling, found every thing in order, and came out furious.

"You have seen my Finette," cried he; "this trick did not come from your own head."

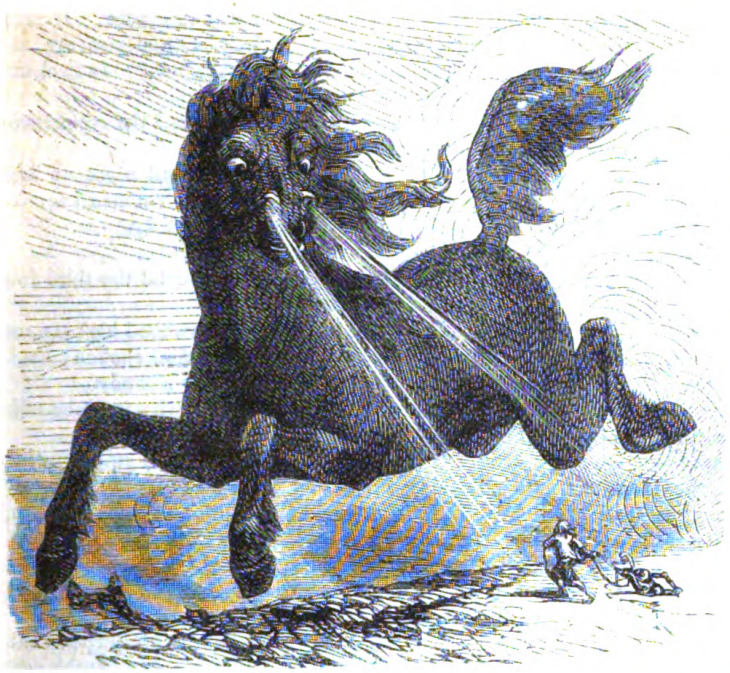
"What is myfinette?" asked Yvon, opening his mouth and shutting his eyes. Is it one of the animals that you have in this country? Show it to me, master."

"Hold your tongue, fool!" replied the giant; "you will see her sooner than you will want to."

The next morning the giant gathered his sheep together to lead them to the pasture; but, before setting out, he ordered Yvon to go in the course of the day in search of his horse, which was turned out to graze on the mountain. "After that," said he, bursting into a laugh, "you can rest all day long. You see that I am a good master. Do your task; and, above all things, don't prowl about the house, or I will cut off your head."

Yvon winked his eye as the giant left. "Yes, you are a good master," said he, between his teeth. "I understand your tricks; but, in spite of your threats, I shall go into the house and talk with your Finette. It remains to be seen whether she will not be more mine than yours."

He ran to the young girl's room. "Hurrah!" cried he; "I have nothing to do all day but to go to the mountain after a horse."



"Very well," said Finette; "how will you set to work to ride him?"

"A fine question," returned Yvon. "As if it was a difficult thing to ride a horse! I fancy that I have ridden worse ones than this."

"It is not so easy as you think," replied Finette; "but I will tell you what to do. Take the bit that hangs behind the stable-door, and, when the animal rushes toward you breathing fire and smoke from his nostrils, force it straight between his teeth; he will instantly become as gentle as a lamb, and you can do what you please with him."

"I will obey," said Yvon; upon which he sat down by the side of Finette and began to talk with her. They talked of every thing; but, however far their fancy strayed, they always came back to the point that they were promised to each other, and that they must escape from the giant. Time passes quickly in this kind of talk. The evening drew nigh. Yvon had forgotten the horse and the mountain, and Finette was obliged to send him away,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google advising him to bring back the animal before his master's arrival.

Yvon took down the bit that was hidden behind the stable-door and hastened to the mountain, when lo! a horse almost as large as an elephant rushed toward him at full gallop, breathing fire and smoke from his nostrils. Yvon firmly awaited the huge animal, and, the moment he opened his enormous jaws, thrust between them the bit, when lo! the horse instantly became as gentle as a lamb. Yvon made him kneel down, sprang on his back, and tranquilly returned home.

His task finished, Yvon seated himself on the bench before the door of the house. As soon as he saw the giant coming he lolled back in his seat, crossed his legs, and began to sing one of his native airs.

"Have you brought back the horse?" asked the giant, with a frown.

"Yes, master," answered Yvon, without taking the trouble to move. "He is a fine animal, and does you credit. He is gentle, well-trained, and as quiet as a lamb. He is feeding yonder in the stable."

"I am going to see for myself," howled the giant. He entered the stable grumbling, found every thing in order, and came out furious.

"You have seen my Finette," said he; "this trick did not come from your own head."

"Oh, master," returned Yvon, opening his mouth and shutting his eyes, "it is the same story over again. What is this myfinette? Once for all, show me this monster."

"Hold your tongue, fool,' returned the giant; "you will see her sooner than you will want to."

The third day, at dawn, the giant gathered his sheep together to lead them to the pasture; but, before setting out, he said to Yvon:

"To-day you must go to the bottomless pit to collect my rent. After that," continued he, bursting into a laugh, "you may rest all day long.—You see that I am a good master."

"A good master, so be it," murmured Yvon, "but the task is none the less hard. I will go and see my Finette, as the giant says; I have great need of her help to get through to-day's business."

When Finette had learned what was the task of the day, "Well," said she, "how will you go to work to do it?"

"I don't know," said Yvon, sadly; "I have never been to the bottomless pit, and, even if I knew the way there, I should not know what to ask for. Tell me what to do."

"Do you see that great rock yonder?" said Finette; "that is one of the gates of the bottomless pit. Take this stick, knock three times on the stone, and a demon will come out all streaming with flames, who will ask you how much you want. Take care to answer, 'No more than I can carry.'"

"I will obey," said Yvon; upon which he took a seat by the side of Finette, and began to talk with her. He would have been there till this time if the young girl had not sent him to the great rock, when the evening drew nigh, to execute the giant's commands.

On reaching the spot pointed out to him, Yvon found a great block of granite. He struck it three times with the stick, when lo! the rock opened, and a demon came forth all streaming with flames.

"What do you want?" he cried.

"I have come for the giant's rent," answered Yvon, calmly.

"How much do you want?"

"I never want any more than I can carry," replied the Breton.

"It is well for you that you do not," returned the man in flames. "Enter this cavern, and you will find what you want."

Yvon entered, and opened his eyes wide. Every where he saw nothing but gold, silver, diamonds, carbuncles, and emeralds. They were as numerous as the sands on the sea-shore. The young Kerver filled a sack, threw it across his shoulder, and tranquilly returned home.

His task finished, our Breton seated himself on the bench before the door of the house. As

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google soon as he saw the giant coming he lolled back in his seat, crossed his legs, and began to sing one of his native airs.

"Have you been to the bottomless pit to collect my rent?" asked the giant, with a frown.

"Yes, master," answered Yvon, without taking the trouble to stir. "The sack is there right before your eyes; you can count it."

"I am going to see for myself," howled the giant. He untied the strings of the sack, which was so full that the gold and silver rolled in all directions.

"You have seen my Finette," he cried; "this trick did not come from your own head."

"Don't you know but one song?" said Yvon, opening his mouth and shutting his eyes. "It is the old story, myfinette, myfinette. Once for all, show me this thing."

"Well, well," roared the giant with fury, "wait till to-morrow, and you shall make her acquaintance."

"Thank you, master," said Yvon. "It is very good of you; but I see from your face that you are laughing at me."

III.

The next morning the giant went out without giving Yvon any orders, which troubled Finette. At noon he returned without his flock, complaining of the heat and fatigue, and said to the young girl:

"You will find a child, my servant, at the door. Cut his throat, put him into the great pot to boil, and call me when the broth is ready." Saying this, he stretched himself on the bed to take a nap, and was soon snoring so loud that it seemed like thunder shaking the mountains.

Finette prepared a log of wood, took a large knife, and called Yvon. She pricked his little finger; three drops of blood fell on the log.

"That is enough," said Finette; "now help me to fill the pot."

They threw into it all that they could find—old clothes, old shoes, old carpets, and every thing else. Finette then took Yvon by the hand, and led him through the three antechambers, where she ran in a mould three bullets of gold, two bullets of silver, and one bullet of copper, after which they quitted the house and ran toward the sea.

"On—the Kerver!" cried Yvon, as soon as he saw himself in the country. "Explain yourself, dear Finette; what farce are we playing now?"

"Let us run—let us run!" she cried; "if we do not quit this wretched island before night it is all over with us."

"On—the Kerver!" replied Yvon, laughing, "and down with the giant!"

When he had snored a full hour, the giant stretched his limbs, half opened one eye, and cried, "Is it ready?"

"It is just beginning to boil," answered the first drop of blood on the log.

The giant turned over, and snored louder than ever for an hour or two longer. Then he stretched his limbs, half opened one eye, and cried out, "Do you hear me? Is it almost ready?"

"It is half done," answered the second drop of blood on the log.

The giant turned over, and slept an hour longer. Then he yawned, stretched his great limbs, and cried out, impatiently,

"Isn't it ready yet?"

"It is ready now," answered the third drop of blood on the log.

The giant sat up in bed, rubbed his eyes, and looked around to see who had spoken; but it was in vain to look; he saw nobody.

"Finette," howled he, "why isn't the table set?"

There was no answer. The giant, furious, sprang out of bed, seized a ladle, which looked like a caldron with a pitchfork for a handle, and plunged it into the pot to taste the soup.

"Finette!" howled he, "you haven't salted it. What sort of a soup is this? I see neither meat nor vegetables."

No; but, in return, he saw his carpet, which had not quite all boiled to pieces. At this sight he fell into such a fit of rage that he could not keep his feet.

"Villains!" said he, "you have played a fine trick on me; but you shall pay for it."

He rushed out with a stick in his hand, and strode along at such a rate that in a quarter of an hour he discovered the two fugitives still far from the sea-shore. He uttered such a cry of joy that the earth shook for twelve leagues around.

Finette stopped, trembling. Yvon clasped her to his heart.

"On—the Kerver!" said he; "the sea is not far off; we shall be there before our enemy."

"Here he is! here he is!" cried Finette, pointing to the giant not a hundred yards off; "we are lost if this charm does not save us."

She took the copper bullet and threw it on the ground, saying,

"Copper bullet, save us, pray,
Stop the giant on his way."

And behold, the earth cracked apart with a terrific noise, and an enormous fissure, a bottomless pit, stopped the giant just as he was stretching out his hand to seize his prey.

"Let us fly!" cried Finette, grasping the arm of Yvon, who was gazing at the giant with a swaggering air, defying him to come on.

The giant ran backward and forward along the abyss like a bear in his cage, seeking a passage every where and finding none; then, with a furious jerk, he tore up an immense oak by the roots, and flung it across the gap. The branches of the oak nearly crushed the children as it fell. The giant seated himself astride the huge tree, which bent under his weight, and crept slowly along, suspended between heaven and earth, entangled as he was among the branches. When he reached the other side,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Yvon and Finette were already on the shore, with the sea rolling before them.

Alas! there was neither bark nor ship. The fugitives were lost. Yvon, always brave, picked up stones to attack the giant, and to sell his life dearly. Finette, trembling with fear, threw one of the silver bullets into the sea, saying,

"Silver bullet, bright and pliant,
Save us from this frightful giant."

Scarcely had she spoken the magic words when a beautiful ship rose from the waves like a swan spreading its white wings. Yvon and Finette plunged into the sea; a rope was thrown them by an invisible hand; and when the furious giant reached the shore the ship was receding rapidly at full sail, leaving behind it a long furrow of shining foam.

Giants do not like the water. This fact is certified to by old Homer, who knew Polyphemus; and the same observation will be found in all natural histories worthy of the name. Finette's master resembled Polyphemus. He roared with rage when he saw his slaves about to escape him. He ran hesitatingly along the shore; he flung huge masses of rock after the vessel, which happily fell by the side of it, and only made great black holes in the water; and, finally, mad with anger, he plunged head foremost into the sea, and began to swim after the ship with frightful speed. At each stroke he advanced forty feet, blowing like a whale, and like a whale cleaving the waves. By degrees he gained on his enemies; one more effort would bring him within reach of the rudder, and already he was stretching out his arm to seize it, when Finette threw the second silver bullet into the sea, and cried, in tears,

"Silver bullet, bright and pliant,
Save us from this frightful giant."

Suddenly from the midst of the foam darted forth a gigantic sword-fish, with a sword at least twenty feet in length. It rushed straight toward the giant, who scarcely had time to dive, chased him under the water, pursued him on the top of the waves, followed him closely whichever way he turned, and forced him to flee as fast as he could to his island, where he finally landed with the greatest difficulty, and fell upon the shore dripping, worn out, and conquered.

"On — the Kerver!" cried Yvon; "we are saved."

"Not yet," said Finette, trembling. "The giant has a witch for a godmother; I fear that she will revenge on me the insult offered to her godson. My art tells me, my dear Yvon, that if you quit me a single instant until you give me your name in the chapel of the Kervers, I have every thing to dread."

"By the unicorn of my ancestors," cried Yvon, "you have the heart of a hare and not of a hero! Am I not here? Am I going to abandon you? Do you believe that Providence has saved us from the fangs of that monster to wreck us in port?"

He laughed so gayly that Finette laughed in turn at the terror that had seized her.

IV.

The rest of the voyage passed off admirably. An invisible hand seemed to impel the ship onward. Twenty days after their departure the boat landed Yvon and Finette near Kerver Castle. Once on shore, Yvon turned to thank the crew. No one was there. Both boat and ship had vanished under the waves, leaving no trace behind but a gull on the wing.

Yvon recognized the spot where he had so often gathered shells and chased the crabs to their holes when a child. Half an hour's walk would bring him in sight of the towers of the old castle. His heart beat; he looked tenderly at Finette, and saw, for the first time, that her dress was fantastic, and unworthy of a woman about to enter the noble house of Kerver.

"My dear child," said he, "the baron, my father, is a noble lord, accustomed to be treated with respect. I can not introduce you to him in this gipsy dress; neither is it fitting that you should enter our great castle on foot like a peasant. Wait for me a few moments, and I will bring you a horse and one of my sister's dresses. I wish you to be received like a lady of high degree. I wish my father himself to meet you

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google on your arrival, and hold it an honor to give you his hand."

"Yvon, Yvon!" cried Finette, "do not quit me, I beg you. Once returned to your castle, I know that you will forget me!"

"Forget you!" exclaimed Yvon. "If any one else were to offer me such an insult I would teach him with my sword to suspect a Kerver. Forget you, my Finette! you do not know the fidelity of a Breton."

That the Bretons are faithful no one doubts; but that they are still more headstrong is a justice that none will deny them. It was useless for poor Finette to plead in her most loving tones; she was forced to yield. She resigned herself with a heavy heart, and said to Yvon:

"Go without me, then, to your castle, but only stay long enough to speak to your friends; then go straight to the stable, and return as soon as possible. You will be surrounded by people; act as if you saw no one, and above all, do not eat or drink any thing whatever. Should you take only a glass of water evil would come upon us both."

Yvon promised and swore all that Finette asked, but he smiled in his heart at this feminine weakness. He was sure of himself; and he thought with pride how different a Breton was from those fickle Frenchmen, whose words, they say, are borne away by the first breath of the wind.

On entering the old castle he could scarcely recognize its dark walls. All the windows were festooned with leaves and flowers within and without; the court-yard was strewn with fragrant grass; on one side were spread tables groaning under their weight; on the other, musicians, mounted on casks, were playing merry airs. The vassals, dressed in their holiday attire, were singing and dancing, and dancing and singing. It was a great day of rejoicing at the castle. The baron himself was smiling. It is true that he had just married his fifth daughter to the Knight of Kervalec. This marriage added another quartering to the illustrious escutcheon of the Kervers.

Yvon, recognized and welcomed by all the crowd, was instantly surrounded by his relatives, who embraced him and shook him by the hand. Where had he been? Where did he come from? Had he conquered a kingdom, a duchy, or a barony? Had he brought the bride the jewels of some queen? Had the fairies protected him? How many rivals had he overthrown? All these questions were showered upon him without reply. Yvon respectfully kissed his father's hand, hastened to his sisters' chamber, took two of their finest dresses, went to the stable, saddled a pony, mounted a beautiful Spanish jennet, and was about to quit the castle, when he found his relatives, friends, squires, and vassals all standing in his way, their glasses in their hands, ready to drink their young lord's health and his safe return.

Yvon gracefully thanked them, bowed, and made his way by degrees through the crowd, when, just as he was about to cross the drawbridge, a fair-haired lady, with a haughty and disdainful air, a stranger to him, a sister of the bridegroom, perhaps, approached him, holding a pomegranate in her hand.

"My handsome knight," said she, with a singular smile, "you surely will not refuse a lady's first request. Taste this pomegranate, I entreat you. If you are neither hungry nor thirsty after so long a journey, I suppose at least that you have not forgotten the laws of politeness."

Yvon dared not refuse this appeal. He was very wrong. Scarcely had he tasted the pomegranate when he looked round him like a man waking from a dream.

"What am I doing on this horse?" thought he. "What means this pony that I am leading? Is not my place in my father's house at my sister's wedding? Why should I quit the castle?"

He threw the bridle to one of the grooms, leaped lightly to the ground, and offered his hand to the fair-haired lady, who accepted him as her attendant on the spot, and gave him her bouquet to hold as a special mark of favor.

Before the evening was over there was another betrothed couple in the castle. Yvon had pledged his faith to the unknown lady, and Finette was forgotten.

V.

Poor Finette, seated on the sea-shore, waited all day long for Yvon, but Yvon did not come. The sun was setting in the fiery waves, when Finette rose, sighing, and took the way to the castle in her turn. She had not walked long in a steep road, bordered with thorn trees in blossom, when she found herself in front of a wretched hut, at the door of which stood an old woman about to milk her cow. Finette approached her, and making a low courtesy, begged a shelter for the night.

The old woman looked at the stranger from head to foot. With her buskins trimmed with fur, her full red petticoat, her blue jacket edged with jet, and her diadem, Finette looked more like an Egyptian princess than a Christian. The old woman frowned, and shaking her fist in the face of the poor forsaken girl, "Begone, witch!" she cried; "there is no room for you in this honest house."

"My good mother," said Finette, "give me only a corner of the stable."

"Oh," said the old woman, laughing, and showing the only tooth she had left, which projected from her mouth like a bear's tusk, "so you want a corner of the stable, do you? Well, you shall have it if you will fill my milk-pail with gold."

"It is a bargain," said Finette, quietly. She opened a leather purse which she wore at her belt, took from it a golden bullet, and threw it into the milk-pail, saying:

"Golden bullet, precious treasure,
Save me, if it be thy pleasure."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

And behold the pieces of gold began to dance about in the pail; they rose higher and higher, flapping about like fish in a net, while the old woman on her knees gazed with wonder at the sight.

When the pail was full the old woman rose, put her arm through the handle, and said to Finette, "Madam, all is yours, the house, the cow, and all the rest. Hurrah! I am going to the town to live like a lady with nothing to do. Oh dear, how I wish I were not more than sixty!" And, shaking her crutch, without looking backward, she set out on a run toward Kerver Castle.

Finette entered the house. It was a wretched hovel, dark, low, damp, bad-smelling, and full of dust and spiders' webs—a horrible refuge for a woman accustomed to living in the giant's grand castle. Without seeming troubled, Finette went to the hearth, on which a few green boughs were smoking, took another golden bullet from her purse, and threw it into the fire, saying,

"Golden bullet, precious treasure,
Save me, if it be thy pleasure."

The gold melted, bubbled up, and spread all over the house like running water, and behold, the whole cottage, the walls, the thatch, the wooden rocking-chair, the stool, the chest, the bed, the cow's horns, every thing, even to the spiders in their webs, was turned to gold. The house shone in the moonlight, among the trees, like a star in the night.

When Finette had milked the cow and drank a little new milk, she threw herself on the bed without undressing, and, worn out by the fatigue of the day, fell asleep in the midst of her tears.

Old women do not know how to hold their tongues, at least in Brittany. Finette's hostess had scarcely reached the village when she hastened to the house of the steward. He was an important personage, who had more than once made her tremble when she had driven her cow into her neighbor's pasture by mistake. The steward listened to the old woman's story, shook his head, and said that it looked like witchcraft; then he mysteriously brought a pair of scales and weighed the guineas, which he found to be genuine and of full weight, kept as many of them as he could, and advised the owner to tell no one of this strange adventure. "If it should come to the ears of the bailiff or the seneschal," said he, "the least that would happen to you, mother, would be to lose every one of these beautiful bright guineas. Justice is impartial; it knows neither favor nor repugnance; it takes the whole."

The old woman thanked the steward for his advice, and promised to follow it. She kept her word so well that she only told her story that evening to two neighbors, her dearest friends, both of whom swore on the heads of their little children to keep it secret. It was a solemn oath, and so well kept that at noon the next day there was not a boy of six in the village that did not point his finger at the old woman, while the very dogs seemed to bark in their language, "Here is the old woman with her guineas."

A girl that amuses herself by filling milk-pails with gold is not to be found every day. Even though she should be something of a witch, such a girl would none the less be a treasure in a family. The steward, who was a bachelor, made this wise reflection that night on going to bed. Before dawn he rose to make his rounds in the direction of the stranger's cottage. By the first gleam of day he spied something shining in the distance like a light among the woods. On reaching the place he was greatly surprised to find a golden cottage instead of the wretched hut that had stood there the day before. But, on entering the house, he was much more surprised and delighted to find a beautiful young girl, with raven hair, sitting by the window, and spinning from her distaff with the air of an empress.

Like all men, the steward did himself justice, and knew, at the bottom of his heart, that there was not a woman in the world that would not be too happy to give him her hand. Without hesitating, therefore, he declared to Finette that he had come to marry her. The young girl burst out laughing, upon which the steward flew into a passion.

"Take care!" said he, in a terrible voice; "I am the master here. No one knows who you are or whence you came. The gold that you gave the old woman has raised suspicions. There is magic in this house. If you do not accept me for a husband this very instant I will arrest you, and before night, perhaps, a witch will be burned before Kerver Castle."

"You are very amiable," said Finette, with a charming grimace; "you have a peculiar way of paying court to ladies. Even when they have decided not to refuse, a gallant man spares their blushes."

"We Bretons are plain-spoken people," replied the steward; "we go straight to the point. Marriage or prison, which do you choose?"

"Oh!" cried Finette, laying down the distaff, "there are the fire-brands falling all over the room."

"Don't trouble yourself," said the steward, "I will pick them up."

"Lay them carefully on the top of the ashes," returned Finette. "Have you the tongs?"

"Yes," said the steward, picking up the crackling coals.

"Abracadabra!" cried Finette, rising. "Villain, may the tongs hold you, and may you hold the tongs till sunset!"

No sooner said than done. The wicked steward stood there all day with the tongs in his hand, picking up and throwing back the burning coals that snapped in his face, and the hot ashes that flew in his eyes. It was useless for him to shout, pray, weep, and blaspheme;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

no one heard him. If Finette had staid at home she would doubtless have taken pity on him; but after putting the spell upon him she hastened to the sea-shore, where, forgetting every thing else, she watched for Yvon in vain.

The moment that the sun set the tongs fell from the steward's hand. He did not stop to finish his errand, but ran as if the devil or justice were at his heels. He made such leaps, he uttered such groans, he was so blackened, scorched, and benumbed, that every one in the village was afraid of him, thinking that he was mad. The boldest tried to speak to him, but he fled without answering, and hid himself in his house, more ashamed than a wolf that has left his paw in the trap.

At evening, when Finette returned home in despair, instead of the steward she found another visitor little less formidable. The bailiff had heard the story of the guineas, and had also made up his mind to marry the stranger. He was not rough, like the steward, but a fat, good-natured man, that could not speak without bursting into a laugh, showing his great yellow teeth, and puffing and blowing like an ox, though at heart he was not less obstinate or less threatening than his predecessor. Finette entreated the bailiff to leave her alone. He laughed, and hinted to her, in a good-natured way, that, by right of his office, he had the power to imprison and hang people without process of law. She clasped her hands, and begged him with tears to go. For his only answer he took a roll of parchment from his pocket, wrote on it a contract of marriage, and declared to Finette that, should he stay all night, he would not leave the house till she had signed the promise.

"Nevertheless," said he, "if you do not like my person, I have another parchment here on which I will write an agreement to live apart; and if my sight annoys you, you have only to shut your eyes."

"Why," said Finette, "I might decide to do as you wish if I were sure of finding a good husband in you; but I am afraid."

"Of what, my dear child?" asked the bailiff, smiling, and already as proud as a peacock.

"Do you think," said she, with a pettish air, "that a good husband would leave that door wide open, and not know that his wife was freezing with cold?"

"You are right, my dear," said the bailiff; "it was very stupid in me. I will go and shut it."

"Have you hold of the knob?" asked Finette.

"Yes, my charmer," answered the happy bailiff; "I am just shutting the door."

"Abracadabra!" cried Finette. "May you hold the door, villain, and may the door hold you till daybreak."

And behold, the door opened and shut, and slammed against the walls like an eagle flapping its wings. You may judge what a dance the poor captive kept up all night. Never had he tried such a waltz, and I imagine that he never wished to dance a second one of the same sort. Sometimes the door swung open with him in the street; sometimes it flew back and crushed him against the wall. He swung backward and forward, screaming, swearing, weeping, and praying, but all in vain; the door was deaf, and Finette asleep.

At daybreak his hands unclasped, and he fell into the road head foremost. Without waiting to finish his errand, he ran as if the Moors were after him. He did not even turn round for fear that the door might be at his heels. Fortunately for him, all were still asleep when he reached the village, and he could hide himself in bed without any one seeing his deplorable plight. This was a great piece of good fortune for him, for he was covered with whitewash from head to foot, and so pale, haggard, and trembling that he might have been taken for the ghost of a miller escaped from the infernal regions.

When Finette opened her eyes she saw by her bedside a tall man dressed in black, with a velvet cap and a sword. It was the seneschal of the barony of Kerver. He stood with his arms folded, gazing at Finette in a way that chilled the very marrow of her bones.

"What is your name, vassal?" said he, in a voice of thunder.

"Finette, at your service, my lord," replied she, trembling.

"Is this house and furniture yours?"

"Yes, my lord, every thing, at your service."

"I mean that it shall be at my service," returned the seneschal, sternly. "Rise, vassal! I do you the honor to marry you, and to take yourself, your person, and your property under my guardianship."

"My lord," returned Finette, "this is much too great an honor for a poor girl like me, a stranger, without friends or kindred."

"Be silent, vassal!" replied the seneschal. "I am your lord and master; I have nothing to do with your advice. Sign this paper."

"My lord," said Finette, "I don't know how to write."

"Do you think that I do, either?" returned

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the seneschal, in a voice that shook the house. "Do you take me for a clerk? A cross—that is the signature of gentlemen."

He made a large cross on the paper, and handed the pen to Finette.

"Sign," said he. "If you are afraid to make a cross, infidel, you pass your own death sentence, and I shall take on myself to execute it. He drew his heavy sword from the scabbard as he spoke, and threw it on the table.

For her only answer Finette leaped out of the window and ran to the stable. The seneschal pursued her thither; but, on attempting to enter, an unexpected obstacle stopped him. The frightened cow had backed at the sight of the young girl, and stood in the doorway with Finette clinging to her horns, and making of her a sort of buckler.

"You shall not escape me, sorceress!" cried the seneschal, and, with a grasp like that of Hercules, he seized the cow by the tail, and dragged her out of the stable.

"Abracadabra!" cried Finette. "May the cow's tail hold on, villain, and may you hold the cow's tail till you have both been around the world together."

"And behold, the cow darted off like lightning, dragging the unhappy seneschal after her. Nothing stopped the two inseparable comrades; they rushed over mountains and valleys, crossed marshes, rivers, quagmires, and brakes, glided over the seas without sinking, were frozen in Siberia and scorched in Africa, climbed the Himalayas, descended Mont Blanc, and at length, after thirty-six hours of a journey, the like of which had never been seen, both stopped out of breath in the public square of the village.

A seneschal harnessed to a cow's tail is a sight not to be seen every day; and all the peasants in the neighborhood crowded together to wonder at the spectacle. But, torn as he was by the cactuses of Barbary and the thickets of Tartary, the seneschal had lost nothing of his haughty air. With a threatening gesture he dispersed the rabble, and limped to his house to taste the repose of which he began to feel the need.

VI.

While the steward, the bailiff, and the seneschal were experiencing these little unpleasantnesses, of which they did not think it proper to boast, preparations were being made for a great event at Kerver Castle, namely, the marriage of Yvon and the fair-haired lady. Two days had passed in these preparations, and all the friends of the family had gathered together for twenty leagues round, when, one fine morning, Yvon and his bride, with the Baron and Baroness Kerver, took their seats in a great carriage adorned with flowers, and set out for the celebrated church of St. Madore.

A hundred knights, in full armor, mounted on horses decked with ribbons, rode on each side of the betrothed couple, each with his vizor raised and his lance at rest in token of honor. By the side of each baron, a squire, also on horseback, carried the seigniorial banner. At the head of the procession rode the seneschal, with a gilded staff in his hand. Behind the carriage gravely walked the bailiff, followed by the vassals, while the steward railed at the serfs, a noisy and curious rabble.

As they were crossing a brook, a league from the castle, one of the traces of the carriage broke, and they were forced to stop. The accident repaired, the coachman cracked his whip, and the horses started with such force that the new trace broke in three pieces. Six times this provoking piece of wood was replaced, and six times it broke anew, without drawing the carriage from the hole where it was wedged.

Every one had a word of advice to offer; even the peasants, as wheel-wrights and carpenters, were not the last to make a show of their knowledge. This gave the steward courage; he approached the baron, took off his cap, and, scratching his head,

"My lord," said he, "in the house that you see shining yonder among the trees, there lives a woman who does things that nobody else can do. Only persuade her to lend you her tongs, and, in my opinion, they will hold till morning."

The baron made a sign, and ten peasants ran to the cottage of Finette, who very obligingly lent them her gold tongs. They were put in the place of the trace; the coachman cracked his whip, and off went the carriage like a feather.

Every one rejoiced, but the joy did not last long. A hundred steps farther, lo! the bottom of the carriage gave way; little more, and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the noble Kerver family would have sunk quite out of sight. The wheel-wrights and the carpenters set to work at once; they sawed planks, nailed them down fast, and in the twinkling of an eye repaired the accident. The coachman cracked his whip, and the horses started, when behold, half of the carriage was left behind; the Baroness Kerver sat motionless by the side of the bride, while Yvon and the baron were carried off at full gallop. Here was a new difficulty. Three times was the carriage mended, three times it broke anew. There was every reason to believe that it was enchanted.

Every one had a word of advice to offer. This gave the bailiff courage. He approached the baron, and said, with a low tone,

"My lord, in the house that you see shining yonder among the trees, there lives a woman who does things such as nobody else can do. Only persuade her to lend you her door for the bottom of the carriage, and, in my opinion, it will hold till morning."

The baron made a sign, and twenty peasants ran to the cottage of Finette, who very obligingly lent them her golden door. They put it in the bottom of the carriage, when it fitted as if it had been made expressly for it. The party took their seats in the carriage, the coachman cracked his whip, the church was in sight, and all the troubles of the journey seemed ended.

Not at all! Suddenly the horses stopped, and refused to draw. There were four of them. Six, eight, ten, twenty-four more were put to the carriage, but all in vain; it was impossible to stir them. The more they were whipped, the deeper the wheels sunk into the ground like the coulter of a plow.

What were they to do? To go on foot would have been a disgrace. To mount a horse, and ride to the church like simple peasants, was not the custom of the Kervers. They tried to lift the carriage, they pushed the wheels, they shook it, they pulled it, but all in vain. Meanwhile the day was declining, and the hour for the marriage had passed.

Every one had a word of advice to offer. This gave the seneschal courage. He approached the baron, alighted from his horse, raised his velvet cap, and said,

"My lord, in the house that you see shining yonder among the trees, there lives a woman who does things such as nobody else can do. Only persuade her to lend you her cow to draw the carriage, and, in my opinion, she will draw it till morning."

The baron made a sign, and thirty peasants ran to the cottage of Finette, who very obligingly lent them her golden-horned cow.

To go to church drawn by a cow was not, perhaps, what the ambitious bride had dreamed of, but it was better than to remain unmarried in the road. The heifer was harnessed, therefore, before the four horses, and every body looked on anxiously to see what this boasted animal would do.

But before the coachman had time to crack his whip, lo! the cow started off as if she were about to go around the world anew. Horses, carriage, baron, betrothed, coachman—all were hurried away by the furious animal. In vain the knights spurred their horses to follow the pair; in vain the peasants ran at full speed, taking the cross-road and cutting across the meadows. The carriage flew as if it had wings; a pigeon could not have followed it.

On reaching the door of the church the party, a little disturbed by this rapid journey, would not have been sorry to alight. Every thing was ready for the ceremony, and the bridal pair had long been expected; but, instead of stopping, the cow redoubled her speed. Thirteen times she ran round the church like lightning, then suddenly made her way in a straight line across the fields to the castle, with such force that the whole party were almost shaken to pieces before their arrival.

VII.

No more marriage was to be thought of for that day; but the tables were set and the dinner served, and the Baron Kerver was too noble a knight to take leave of his brave Bretons until they had eaten and drank according to custom—that is, from sunset till sunrise, and even a little later.

Orders were given for the guests to take their seats. Ninety-six tables were ranged in eight rows. In front of them, on a large platform covered with velvet, with a canopy in the middle, was a table larger than the rest, and loaded with fruit and flowers, to say nothing of the roast hares, and the peacocks smoking beneath their plumage. At this table the bridal pair were to have been seated in full sight, in order that nothing might be lacking to the pleasures of the feast, and that the meanest peasant might have the honor of saluting them by emptying his cup of hydromel to the honor and prosperity of the high and mighty house of Kerver.

The baron seated the hundred knights at his table, and placed their squires behind their chairs to serve them. At his right he put the bride and Yvon, but he left the seat at his left vacant, and calling a page, "Child," said he, "run to the house of the stranger lady who obliged us only too much this morning. It was not her fault if her success exceeded her good-will. Tell her that the Baron Kerver thanks her for her help, and invites her to the wedding-feast of his son Lord Yvon."

On reaching the golden house, where Finette, in tears, was mourning for her beloved, the page bent one knee to the ground, and, in the baron's name, invited the stranger lady to the castle to do honor to the wedding of Lord Yvon.

"Thank your master for me," answered the young girl, proudly, "and tell him that if he is too noble to come to my house, I am too noble to go to his."

When the page repeated this answer to his

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google master the Baron Kerver struck the table such a blow that three plates flew into the air.

"By my honor," said he, "this is spoken like a lady, and for the first time I own myself beaten. Quick! saddle my dun mare, and let my knights and squires prepare to attend me."

It was with this brilliant train that the baron alighted at the door of the golden cottage. He begged Finette's pardon, held the stirrup for her, and seated her behind him on his own horse, neither more nor less than a duchess in person. Through respect, he did not speak a single word to her on the way. On reaching the castle he uncovered his head, and led her to the seat of honor that he had chosen for her.

The baron's departure had made a great excitement, and his return caused still greater surprise. Every one asked who the lady could be that the baron treated with such respect. Judging from her costume, she was a foreigner; could she be the Duchess of Normandy or the Queen of France? The steward, the bailiff, and the seneschal were appealed to. The steward trembled, the bailiff turned pale, and the seneschal blushed, but all three were as mute as fishes. The silence of these important personages added to the general wonder.

All eyes were fixed on Finette, who felt a deadly chill at her heart, for Yvon saw but did not know her. He cast an indifferent glance at her, then began again to talk in a tender tone to the fair-haired lady, who smiled disdainfully.

Finette, in despair, took from the purse the golden bullet, her last hope. While talking with the baron, who was charmed with her wit, she shook the little ball in her hand, and repeated, in a whisper:

"Golden bullet, precious treasure,
Save me, if it be thy pleasure."

And behold, the bullet grew larger and larger, until it became a goblet of chased gold, the most beautiful cup that ever graced the table of baron or king.

Finette filled the cup herself with spiced wine, and calling the seneschal, who was shrinking behind her, she said, in her gentlest tones: "My good seneschal, I entreat you to offer this goblet to Lord Yvon. I wish to drink his health, and I am sure that he will not refuse me this pleasure."

Yvon took the goblet, which the seneschal presented to him on a salver of enamel and gold, with a careless hand, bowed to the stranger, drank the wine, and setting the cup on the table before him, turned to the fair-haired lady who occupied all his thoughts. The lady seemed anxious and vexed. He whispered a few words in her ear that seemed to please her, for her eyes sparkled, and she placed her hand again in his.

Finette cast down her head and began to weep. All was over.

"Children," cried the baron, in a voice of thunder, "fill your glasses. Let us all drink to the noble stranger who honors us with her presence. To the noble lady of the golden cottage!"

All began to huzza and drink. Yvon contented himself with raising his goblet to a level with his eyes. Suddenly he started and stood mute, his mouth open and his eyes fixed, like a man that has a vision.

It was a vision. In the gold of the goblet Yvon saw his past life as in a mirror: the giant pursuing him; Finette dragging him along; both embarking in the ship that saved them; both landing on the shore of Brittany; he quitting her for an instant; she weeping at his departure. Where was she? By his side, of course. What other woman than Finette could be by the side of Yvon?

He turned toward the fair-haired lady, and cried out like a man treading on a serpent. Then, staggering as if he were drunk, he rose and looked around him with haggard eyes. At the sight of Finette he clasped his trembling hands, and, dragging himself toward her, fell on his knees and exclaimed, "Finette, forgive me!"

To forgive is the height of happiness. Before evening Finette was seated by the side of Yvon, both weeping and smiling.

And what became of the fair-haired lady? No one knows. At the cry of Yvon she disappeared; but it was said that a wretched old hag was seen flying on a broomstick over the castle walls, chased by the dogs. And it was the common opinion among the Kervers that

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the fair-haired lady was none other than the witch, the godmother of the giant. I am not sure enough of the fact, however, to dare warrant it. It is always prudent to believe, without proof, that a woman may be a witch, but it is never wise to say so.

What I can say on the word of an historian is, that the feast, interrupted for a moment, went on gayer than ever. Early the next morning they went to the church, where, to the joy of his heart, Yvon married Finette, who was no longer afraid of evil spirits; after which they ate, drank, and danced for thirty-six hours, without any one thinking of resting. The steward's arms were a little heavy, the bailiff rubbed his back at times, and the seneschal felt a sort of weariness in his limbs, but all three had a weight on their conscience which they could not shake off, and which made them tremble and flutter, till finally they fell on the ground and were carried off. Finette took no other vengeance on them; her only desire was to render all happy around her, far and near, who belonged to the noble house of Kerver. Her memory still lives in Brittany; and among the ruins of the old castle any one will show you the statue of the good lady, with five bullets in her hand.

HEROIC DEEDS OF HEROIC MEN.

BY JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

XVI.—THE CAPTURE, IMPRISONMENT, AND ESCAPE.

Capture of Colonel Hurd; of Colonel Raynor; of Colonel Murphy.—Life in Prison.—Anecdotes.—The Escape from Prison.—Wanderings through the Wilderness.—Perils and Sufferings.—Reaching the Potomac.—The Crossing.—Adventures in Maryland.—Received on Board United States Cutter.—Arrival in Washington.

IN the summer of 1861 three young patriot officers found themselves fellow-captives of war within the gloomy walls of the old tobacco-warehouse called Libby Prison, in Richmond. One of these, Colonel J. R. Hurd, then Captain, was a Kentuckian, faithful found among many faithless. The love of adventure had lured him in very early years from his home, and, reveling in the wild and semi-barbaric life of a frontiersman, he had become inured to hardship, peril, and self-reliance.

When the treasonable bombardment of Sumter rolled its echoes over our land young Hurd was at Nashville, in Tennessee. He immediately returned to Kentucky, resolved to exert all his influence to induce the State to be true to the nation, and not to take that position of neutrality which it then seemed disposed to assume. In about four weeks he raised a company of volunteers, which was soon mustered into service at Camp May, near Cincinnati, Ohio, for three years, in the Second Kentucky regiment of infantry. With scarcely any time in camp for drill, the regiment embarked in steamers for Western Virginia, and landed three days after at Guyandotte.

J. R. HURD.

The regiment soon moved into the Kanawha Valley, and encamped near Pocotaligo. General Wise was in this vicinity, threatening to sweep down the valley with a large rebel force, and to cross into Ohio. On the 17th General Cox ordered about fifteen hundred men to capture a rebel camp, about five miles above him. The expedition started early in the morning, under Colonel Lowe. They crossed the Kanawha River in a steamer to take a road leading across the country to Scaryville. They were instructed to drive out the rebels if they found them in a position from which they could easily be dislodged; but if not, they were to take some strong position, and hold it until the main body of the army could come to their aid.

The column, with a march of about five miles before them, moved cautiously, with scouts on both sides of the road. About 3 o'clock in the morning, as Captain Rogers's cavalry, which was in the advance, was rounding the brow of a hill they were met by volleys from a battery, which killed one man and dispersed the rest. Captain Totten's artillery was immediately brought forward, and took position near the top of the hill. They could see, about five hundred yards before them, on the opposite slope, the huge breast-work of the enemy. The rebels had two rifled 6-pounders; we the same. In fifteen minutes our better-trained artillerymen, if not braver men, had silenced their guns. The infantry now advanced, pouring in volleys of musketry, which were distinctly heard at the camp on the other side of the river. Scaryville was a mere hamlet of a dozen log-huts. The rebel infantry were in these

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

huts, firing through the chinks between the logs. Captain Totten turned his artillery upon them, and his percussion shells could be seen, in their terrible explosion, scattering logs and guns and the limbs of men. And now the order was given to charge. The Twenty-first Ohio, with a few companies of the Twelfth, rushed down the hill, forded a stream knee-deep, and rushed upon the hostile intrenchments. Reinforcements just then came to the rebels. Our troops, who had nearly exhausted their ammunition, were compelled to retire, having lost nine killed and thirty-eight wounded. The rebels did not pursue.

A messenger had, however, arrived at the patriot camp, with the erroneous information that we were victorious, and that the rebels had broken and fled. Colonel Woodruff, Colonel De Villiers, Lieutenant-Colonel Neff, and Captains Austin and Hurd, left the camp to see the retreat. Galloping to the picket-line they again heard that our troops were the victors. Ascending the banks, on the same side with their encampment, they came to a point nearly opposite the battle-field. Here they found a ferry-boat, and after some little deliberation in view of the peril, being impressed with the conviction that our troops were in possession of the field, they crossed the Kanawha.

The boat would carry but two mounted men at a time. Colonels Woodruff and De Villiers crossed first. As soon as they reached the opposite bank De Villiers galloped forward, while the more cautious but equally brave Woodruff, who had been persuaded contrary to his own judgment to cross the river, waited for his companions. Not far from the spot where they landed the road running in the direction of the rebel camp forked, one branch leading directly up the river, and the other bearing off to the right. When the three officers came to the fork they could not ascertain which road De Villiers had taken.

The evening twilight was now deepening, so that, though they examined the road narrowly, they could not trace his horse's tracks. After waiting a little while in hopes that De Villiers would return, and having no good reason to doubt that our troops were in possession of the battle-field, they cautiously moved forward. Woodruff was evidently impressed with the imprudence into which he had been gradually and so naturally led, and he ordered one of the company to ride in advance, and reconnoitre so as to give the alarm in case any suspicious circumstances should appear. Thus they approached within a hundred yards of the rebel camp. A large fire was blazing which brilliantly illuminated the whole scene, a cooper's shop being in flames.

Our men at that time wore dark-gray pants, and the resemblance of the rebel uniform to our own increased the conviction that they were approaching their own comrades. To add to this delusion, as they halted for a moment a rebel rode up in citizen's dress and said:

"Why, halloa, friends! I see you are Federal officers. Please ride up to the fire and stop your men from destroying my property."

"What is your name?" inquired Woodruff.

"My name is Morgan," he replied. "I own this property. After your men had gained the field they set fire to my buildings."

Completely deceived by the rebel's artful story, the three patriot officers rode directly up to the fire, and Woodruff, who was determined not to allow our men wantonly to destroy the property of non-combatants, demanded in a loud and authoritative voice why they were burning that shop, and ordered them immediately to go to work to extinguish the flames. The rebels were as much astounded at this apparition of three Federal officers in the midst of them as our officers were destined soon to be in view of the company into which they had plunged. For a moment the rebel soldiers were quite confounded, probably expecting instantly to see, emerging from the gloom, solid columns of national troops. But as the serried ranks did not appear they soon recovered themselves, cocked their guns, and ordered unconditional surrender. The astonishment and chagrin of our friends may be imagined, but certainly can not be described.

Sullenly they delivered up their arms, and were conducted across Scary Creek to the quarters of Colonel Jenkins, the rebel officer in command. He received them politely, shook hands with them, and congratulated them upon their lucky captivity. They were then escorted to a brick house, and were allowed the range of the house and yard upon their giving their parole. They had hardly passed through this ceremony when they were informed that Colonel De Villiers was also a captive. They were then ordered, under a guard, to Charlestown, Virginia. The ride was long and dreary, and they reached the city at daylight on the morning of the 19th of July. Here they were assigned comfortable rooms, and upon giving their parole were allowed the limits of the city.

The news of the arrival of the Yankee officers spread like wild-fire. Captain Hurd ventured to take a stroll through the streets. He was soon followed by an excited and ever-increasing crowd. And as he returned to the hotel and, through the throng, entered the door, he was greeted with many not very amiable epithets, and sundry expressions of desire to see how he would look pendent from a sour apple-tree. The landlord soon after came to the prisoners and urged them not to expose themselves, as he greatly feared that they would be mobbed. De Villiers, an impulsive French gentleman, who had no comprehension of this kind of chivalry, was exceedingly irate. He sprang from his chair, exclaiming:

"I not 'fraid to die. I not vant to be killed like a spy. If I be guilty, let me be tried by one court-martial, and den, if guilty, den shoot me like one soldier. I send for General Wise."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

During the day the captives were visited by several officers and citizens. Several of these reproached Captain Hurd that he, a Kentuckian, should espouse the cause of the National Government against the South. They declared that there was perfect unanimity throughout the South in favor of the war, and that so long as there was a single man or woman left they never could be subjugated.

In the afternoon General Wise called, with his son and a member of his staff. In reply to the indignant remonstrances of Colonel De Villiers, the ex-Governor stated that as long as they were under his charge they should receive kind treatment, and that if they were molested he would call out the troops and suppress all riotous demonstrations. He observed that the war would teach the South many valuable lessons, that manufactures of all kinds would spring up, and that they would no longer be dependent as heretofore upon the North. He very obligingly allowed the captives to remain in Charlestown until they could receive their baggage, and assured them that he would do all in his power to induce the authorities to release them upon their parole.

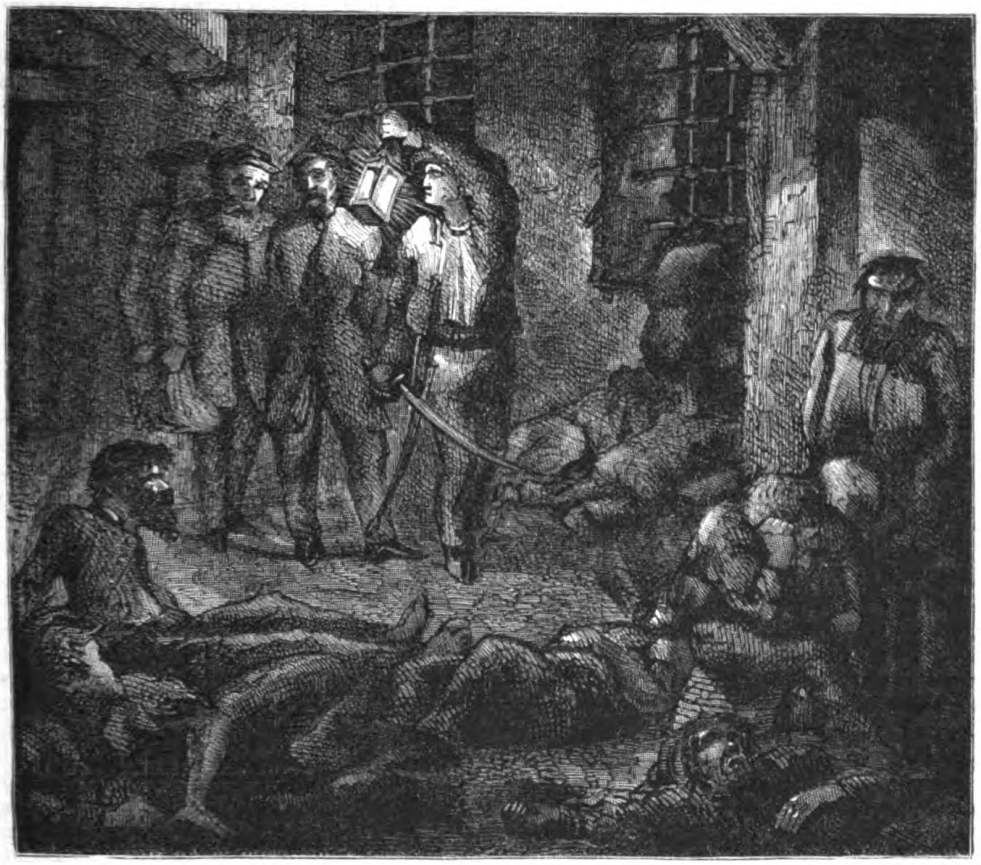
Early Saturday morning, July 20, they were told to prepare for their journey to Richmond. At 11 o'clock an antiquated Virginia vehicle halted before the door of the hotel. In addition to the Northern captives there was a Southern Union man, heavily ironed, to be of their party. Major Duffield and Richard Wise, with a guard, accompanied them. At Gauley Bridge they stopped for supper, and at midnight reached a celebrated ledge of rocks called the Hawk's Nest.

Captain Hurd writes: "What my feelings were in that lone midnight hour I shall not attempt to describe. Suffice it to say that a project for escaping was uppermost in my mind. My sense of honor would not permit me to violate my parole, but I made up my mind never to accept of another when released from the one which then bound me."

The night was dark, the road rough, the carriage rolled and pitched uncomfortably over the ruts, and the most gloomy thoughts oppressed the minds of the captives. In the morning they stopped for breakfast at the house of a noted secessionist, Dr. Tyrell, near the foot of Sewell's Mountain. Colonel De Villiers, always attentive to his toilet, had arrayed himself before starting in full uniform, with epaulets, etc. Naturally an impulsive, eccentric man, he had during the morning expressed himself very severely in denunciation of the rebels, and particularly of the Southern women as prominent instigators of this cruel and unnatural war. As soon as he left the room, Mrs. Tyrell turned very angrily to Colonel Wise and said:

"Why do you permit that contemptible French Yankee to talk in that style? You ought to handcuff him, and strip him of his gay uniform and distribute it among the poor Confederate soldiers. You treat the Yankee prisoners altogether too kindly."

Immediately after breakfast they resumed their journey. The road led over Sewell's Mountain, which they crossed with jaded steeds, climbing an ascent four miles in length. Sunday evening they halted in the little town of Levensburg. Here they met quite a number of Kentuckians, who, false to their country's flag, had joined the ranks of rebellion. After much effort Major Duffield succeeded in obtaining three two-horse wagons to convey the party to White Sulphur Springs. It was now raining in torrents. The roads were miry, the wagons poorly covered; still, through storm and mud they were driven on, until they reached the Springs just before dark. Here they were happily delayed three days before transportation could be found to convey them to Jackson, at the terminus of the Virginia Central Railroad.



Captain Hurd writes: "Justice constrains me to say that we could not have been better treated than we were by Major Duffield and young Wise; nor is it possible that we could have enjoyed ourselves better under similar circumstances."

Thursday morning, just as they were preparing to move, they received tidings of the disaster to our arms at Bull Run—a disaster which a kind Providence seemed so to overrule as to convert it into one of our most signal blessings. The rebels were jubilant over the victory, and represented to our distressed prisoners that their army had captured twenty thousand Union troops. Colonel De Villiers's prompt response was: "It is one lie."

A sad ride of twenty-one miles took them to Jackson. Here they remained until 2 o'clock the following morning, when they took the cars. They met here quite a number of Confederate officers, who had been taken prisoners by the Union army, and whom General M'Clellan had generously liberated on parole, hoping probably that the Confederate authorities might thus be influenced to imitate the example. These officers assured the Union captives that they would be liberated on their parole as soon as they reached Richmond. Breakfasting at Gordonsville, they there became convinced that the rebels had gained a victory at Bull Run. Through the windows of their cars they could see many wounded and prisoners, who seemed to be treated with great rigor.

It was after dark before the train left Gordonsville on its way to Richmond, where they arrived about midnight. They were conducted to an office, where they were ordered to remain until their arrival should be reported to the authorities. From the assurance given them by General Wise, and the oft-repeated declarations of the Confederate officers whom they had met, they had no apprehension that the rebel authorities would so violate the usages of civilized warfare as to place them in close confinement. After the absence of a couple of hours Major Duffield returned with another

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE PRISON.

officer, to whom he introduced his captives, and informed them that he would "conduct them to their quarters."

It was now two o'clock in the morning. Taking a friendly leave of Major Duffield they followed their new guard in a long walk through the dark streets until they came to an old tobacco warehouse. They passed two sentinels, who presented their pieces to the guard, entered a door, and found themselves the inmates of a Southern prison. But they were not alone. Through the gloom of the dimly-lighted apartment they could discern many prostrate forms, some in sweet sleep, perhaps dreaming of distant homes, while through the barred windows the heavy tramp of the sentinels could be distinctly heard. They were hungry, weary, and cold, and yet neither fire, bedding, nor food was provided for them. A humane man would not so treat his horse.

An officer, whom they soon ascertained to be Lieutenant Tomkins of the United States Army, disturbed by the noise of their entrance, raised his head from his cot and inquired if they had just come in. The conversation which ensued collected quite a number of fellow-sufferers around, who with brotherly kindness fed them with such food as they had, and shared with them their scant bedding. Tired as the captives were, the gloom which oppressed their minds did not allow them much refreshing sleep. With the earliest dawn they rose and thoroughly inspected their prison. There was not a chair, or a table, or any article of furniture whatever, to relieve the comfortless aspect of the apartment.

Breakfast was brought in. It consisted of a large kettle containing a decoction of hot water and burned sweet-potatoes and rye, in which it was said that there was a slight mixture of damaged coffee. Then came two negroes, one with a large wooden bowl of bread, and the other with a pan of meat. These articles were placed upon the floor, and the officers were invited to breakfast with the words, "Yankees, your grub is ready!"

The prison was situated on Main Street. It was three stories high. Our captives were on the lower floor. Through the centre of the room there was a row of tobacco presses. Companions in misery soon become acquainted with each other. The Hon. Mr. Ely and Mr. Huston, a brother-in-law of Secretary Seward, were confined there. Privates and non-commissioned officers were incarcerated in the rooms above. The room was crowded. There was no bedding, and but few blankets. The prisoners had no opportunity to wash their clothes, and the most earnest entreaties could not obtain permission to walk outside.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

W. H. RAYNOR.

Let us now turn to the capture of another of the inmates of this dismal prison. The awful disaster at Bull Run occurred on the 21st of July, 1861. It was a beautiful Sabbath day, though oppressively hot. The First Ohio, under Colonel M'Cook, in a brief lull of the battle, was prostrate upon the ground, panting in utter exhaustion. The joyful thought echoed along the lines, "The day is ours! The rebels are running!" The Ohio troops sprung to their feet and with parched lips gave new wings to the cry. They could not, however, cross the Run until the pioneers had hastily constructed a bridge. While waiting, a young officer, subsequently Colonel W. H. Raynor, went, in company with two sergeants, a short distance to the left to get some water. Just as they had reached the much-coveted stream they heard a trampling through the thick underbrush of the forest, followed by that unearthly savage yell with which our troops afterward became so familiar, and a squadron of rebel horsemen came thundering down upon them, crashing and roaring like an avalanche. Bewildered and almost stunned by the sudden onset, Colonel Raynor instinctively drew his pistol and fired, just as a buckshot from the foe struck his instep and numbed his foot. He dropped upon his knees behind a large tree and gazed with awe and admiration upon the appalling scene. The snorting and trampling of the excited horses, the demoniac yells of the men, the rattling fire from their pistols and carbines, all blending with the roar of the battle raging around, seemed like the phantom of a delirious dream.

One of the horsemen, who had already fired his piece at Raynor, swung his carbine in passing in lieu of a sabre, and brought it down with all his force upon the head of the wounded soldier. A few scintillations of light flashed through his eyes, a pang of acutest anguish shot through his brain, and he fell senseless to the earth, apparently dead. After the lapse of some time he was brought slightly to consciousness by some one tugging at his clothes. In utter bewilderment he raised himself upon his elbow, and found that a rebel soldier, who was stripping the dead, had already taken possession of all his accoutrements, sword, pistol, canteen, and cap, and was endeavoring to get off his coat. The robber was so terrified at this sudden resurrection, as of a corpse, that he sprung upon his horse and disappeared in the forest as though a ghost were pursuing him.

CAPTURE OF RAYNOR.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

As Colonel Raynor gradually regained his senses and recalled what had happened, he found that the rebel cavalry had swept over him in their impetuous charge, had apparently met a repulse, and had retired in as great haste as they had made the onset. He staggered to his feet by the aid of the tree which had protected him from being trampled to death, and while standing, covered with blood and half-bewildered, the woods all around being still filled with the exchange of hostile shots, he saw two rebel horsemen approaching. One said: "There's a Yankee; bring him along!"

They immediately rode up to him, and the two powerful men seized him by each wrist, and dragged him violently between them for some distance, until the woods partially sheltered them from our fire, which was quite severe. As Colonel Raynor was thus forced along he saw several rebels drop from their horses, struck by our bullets. At length he was lifted upon the horse in front of one of his captors and carried behind the shelter of a small hill, where several of the rebel wounded had been collected. Quite a group gathered around the prisoner, cursing him in the strongest epithets of denunciation they could coin. But their victim, faint from his wounds, suffering excruciating pain and deadly sick, closed his eyes and paid no heed to curses or questions.

This silence enraged the rebels. One drew out a formidable knife, saying: "Let us cut out his cursed abolition tongue; he's got no use for it." Another struck him a violent blow with his clenched fist. A feeble effort of the half-dead captive to resent the insult provoked peals of derisive laughter. At the same time another rebel came up, covered with blood and with his right arm in a sling, and presenting, with his left hand, a pistol to the head of their helpless prisoner, exclaimed, with one of the most brutal oaths: "This is the infernal hound who shot my horse and gave me this broken arm. I'll kill him!" In the attempt to execute his threat he fired his pistol. But another at the instant struck up the assassin's arm, so that the ball just passed over his head into the tree against which he was leaning. This cowardly act raised quite a commotion, and several cried out vehemently against it, declaring it to be shameful to kill a wounded prisoner. Others, however, defended the act, contending that every prisoner should be instantly put to death. "What did he come down here for," they exclaimed, "but to kill us, steal our slaves, ravish our women, and destroy our property? Don't they all deserve hanging?"

In this hour of weakness, pain, and despair death seemed not an unwelcome visitor; and the bleeding captive almost regretted that the ball had not pierced his brain. He was, however, soon lifted upon a horse behind a rebel soldier and conveyed about four miles to the Junction. The battle was still raging at Bull Run, and many fresh rebel troops were met hurrying to the field. Our blood-stained captive, almost blinded with weakness and pain, was assailed with the most profane abuse, and many a wish was expressed to try the effect of a bullet or a bayonet-thrust through his heart.

It was early in the evening when they reached the Junction, and the captive was taken to a stable, where quite a number of the wounded rebels had been conveyed. His guard, a kind-hearted man, immediately sought a surgeon to examine his wounds. The surgeon, as he looked at him, said, disdainfully, "Why, that's a Yankee; let him wait; enough of our own men to attend to now!" Another surgeon was found who was more compassionate. His wounds were washed, and he was made as comfortable as the circumstances would permit. The generous guard, J. H. Lemon, of Radford's Cavalry, truly acted the part of the good Samaritan. He got some ice, pounded it up in his own handkerchief, and tenderly bound it around the throbbing brow of his captive. He inquired if he had any money, evidently intending to give him some if he were destitute. In reply to Raynor's earnest expression of gratitude he said: "I only hope to get the same treatment from your men if I ever fall into their hands. If you will relieve the distresses of a suffering brother mason when in your power I shall be well paid."

As he said this he pointed to a masonic pin in Colonel Raynor's shirt-bosom, and hastily mounting his horse rode away, leaving the wounded soldier in pain and despondency, surrounded by the dying and the dead. In the morning the captive was removed to another barn, where he found some twenty Union officers, and learned for the first time the extent of our calamity. All these prisoners were then transferred to a train of cars to be taken to Richmond. The constant arrival of fresh captives delayed the departure of the train until after noon. All Monday night, and until the evening of Tuesday, the train crept slowly along, being constantly impeded by trains from Richmond crowded with troops hastening to reinforce Beauregard's rebel army.

As no preparation had been made for such delay the sufferings of the prisoners from hunger was extreme. Scarcely any of them had eaten any thing since Sunday morning, and some of them had not tasted a mouthful of food since Saturday night.

At every station large crowds gathered to gaze upon the prisoners, and many were the insults heaped upon the "abolition hirelings who had desecrated the sacred soil." "What did you come down here for?" was the indignant and constant query from both old and young. Many, however, especially of the women, manifested an eager desire to obtain some relic of the Yankees. Buttons were in great demand, and frequently passed for dimes in the purchase of food. The prisoners reached Richmond after dark on Tuesday evening, the 23d, and were immediately marched to the tobacco warehouse, and over a thousand in number,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

many of them wounded, were crowded into the second and third stories of the building. So dense was the crowd that it was impossible to lie down. The weather was excessively hot and sultry even in the open air. No one dared to approach a window, for whoever did so was sure to be fired upon by the South Carolina troops who were guarding the prison, and who seemed to be inspired by an intense desire to shoot a Yankee.

No tongue can tell the horrors of the night which ensued. Two officers had been wounded as they attempted to catch a breath of fresh air at the windows; others had met with a very narrow escape. No food, no water, no rest; darkness, suffocation, misery. It was horrible! It was reserved for Richmond to emulate the world-renowned savagery of the Black Hole at Calcutta. There was no provision for those demands of nature which these frail bodies require. The wounded were trodden upon by the swaying mass. The heat and trampling caused a pungent gas to ascend from the loathsome, saturated floor, which seized the bronchial tubes and lungs, rendering respiration painful and almost impossible. It is strange that any could have survived the horrors of that night. In consequence of its tortures hundreds sank subsequently through the stages of emaciation and agony into the grave. Before the morning dawned two were found dead upon the floor. The rebel authorities who could perpetrate such a crime merit the eternal execrations of humanity. Another day and another night passed away and there was no relief. The scene presented was too revolting to be described. The awful condition of the floor; the sick, the wounded, the dying! The heart sickens at the contemplation of such woes! And who are the criminals whom the world should hold accountable for such atrocities? They were the leading men of the rebellion.

On Thursday about sixty of the officers were removed to the first floor of an adjoining warehouse. Here they found a room, about 100 feet long and 40 wide, divided in the centre by massive tobacco-presses. One half of this room was assigned to these officers, and the other half to their guard. Every day additions were made to their numbers. The second night several Union officers were brought in from Western Virginia. Among them Colonel Raynor recognized, with both grief and joy, the face of an old friend and school-mate, Captain John R. Hurd, the narrative of whose capture we have already given, and who shared the remainder of his captivity, and contributed greatly to their escape.

And now let us turn to the capture of Lieutenant C. J. Murphy. Though still quite a young man he had done good service in Mexico, serving under General Taylor when but sixteen years of age. Loathing war, and all its scenes of cruelty and blood, of which he had witnessed more than enough, when rebellion raised its flag he immediately joined the Thirty-eighth Regiment of New York Volunteers, leaving his happy home and his young wife, to defend his country. In the disastrous battle of Bull Run, though a staff-officer, he seized the musket of a man who had fallen, and fought in the ranks until the regiment was broken up and entirely dispersed. The ground was then covered with the dying and the dead. A document, signed by five of the army-surgeons and other officers, gives the following emphatic testimony to his heroism on that occasion:

C. J. MURPHY.

"Lieutenant Murphy remained with the surgeons at Sudley Church, after the battle of Bull Run, and devoted himself to the care of the wounded, and chose rather to risk death or imprisonment than leave the brave soldiers to die on the field uncared-for. His aid to the surgeons, by his energy and activity, was greater than that of any other five men; and from the close of the fight until the following night, when he was removed to Manassas, he did not take a moment's rest, but, like a noble-hearted and generous man, as he is, gave himself entirely up to the suffering men around him. The conduct of Lieutenant Murphy merits the warmest commendation, in that, with ample means of escape, he sacrificed even his liberty for those who had no just claims on him."

At Manassas the officers who were prisoners were placed in a barn. Here Calvin Huston, Esq., District-Attorney of Rochester, was found of the number. He had been merely a spectator on the field. But he was destined never to see his home again. He lingered for several months through the sorrows and sufferings of the most cruel imprisonment until he died.

The night which ensued was awful. The air was filled with the groans of the wounded, and the eye could rest only upon spectacles of misery. Lieutenant Murphy writes:

"Morning dawned upon as strange a looking group as were ever huddled together in so small a space. Imagine our surprise at hearing the voice of a woman, and an aged one. She was the wife of a Michigan soldier, Mrs. Jane Hinsdale, who had followed her husband to the battle-field. General Beauregard had given her a pass, and, with the ready and kind service of a woman, she passed in and out, bringing us many a bucket of water, which was eagerly seized upon. We often spoke of her

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google kindness after she had left us, and wished her God-speed on her journey home, which we afterward heard she reached in safety."

One sufferer was brought in with a bullet through his brain. He was totally blind and unconscious, though such vitality still remained that he was able to walk about, groping ever his way, a melancholy spectacle, through the crowd. Thus he lingered for forty-eight hours. The prisoners were kept in the barn for four days, fed upon extremely salt ham, and with but very little water to drink. They were then put into box cars and sent to Richmond, where they arrived at 11 o'clock at night. Under a strong guard they were marched through the streets to the tobacco warehouse, where they were all huddled together, officers and men, in the third story, in a crowd almost as dense as they could stand. In the morning the officers were sent down to the first floor, and here Lieutenant Murphy met Colonel Hurd and Colonel Raynor, with whom he afterward effected his escape.

As we have mentioned, Colonels Hurd and Raynor had been companions and friends in childhood. They now became inseparable. Through a friendly guard they obtained a few yards of calico, and some cotton and thread, with which they made a quilt, which, with a block of wood for their pillow, constituted their only bed. Mr. Murphy was regarded as a surgeon by the rebels, and was consequently allowed, under close surveillance, to visit the hospitals where our wounded were languishing. He was thus enabled to contribute very much not only to their relief but to the aid of his suffering companions in the warehouse. In one of these hospitals he found Mrs. Major-General Ricketts, who heroically had consented to become a prisoner-of-war that she might attend upon her wounded husband. This noble woman moved through the sad wards of that hospital at Richmond an angel of mercy, another Florence Nightingale, sharing the misery she attempted to alleviate. Officers and soldiers alike were cheered by her tender hand and her sympathizing heart. "She was obliged," writes Mr. Murphy, "to quarter in the same room with her husband and some six other officers, with only a small shawl used as a screen to shield her from observation."

And here we can not refrain from paying a brief tribute of respect and gratitude to the Sisters of Mercy, who were untiring, day and night, in their devotion to the sufferers. They asked no questions whether the patient were on this side or that in the strife. The fact that there was a brother before them bleeding, fainting, perhaps dying, moved all their sympathies, and, with humanity ennobled and intensified by Christian faith, they devoted themselves, as taught by their Lord, to the relief of those who were sick and in prison.

As the captives gradually became accustomed to their prison-life messes were formed of from four to twelve, as persons were drawn together by sympathy. These messes generally used every thing in common—ate together, slept near each other, and maintained very intimate social relations. Each officer in turn took one week in catering for the mess, and each contributed according to his means toward providing articles not furnished in the meagre diet of the prison. One officer was permitted each day to go to market, accompanied by two guards.

Colonel Hurd soon indicated to some of his companions his resolve, if possible, to effect an escape. Both Mr. Ely and Mr. Huston endeavored to dissuade him from the undertaking, assuring him that the chances of success were very small, and that the penalty, if recaptured, would be very severe. They also thought that influences were at work with our Government which would in a few weeks secure their release by exchange. The drear monotony of prison life can not be described. Hours, days, weeks, months, linger heavily along, and the "iron enters the soul."

All efforts at cleanliness were rendered abortive by the condition of the rooms above. The two upper stories were crowded with soldiers; and as there was but a limited supply of water, and they had no change of clothing, they were soon swarming with vermin. The flooring being very open, all the dirt from the first story was sifted down upon the second, and thence to the lower floor. Even while eating it was necessary to keep a cover over one's food to prevent the vermin from falling into it. One day Colonel De Villiers had his French blood inflamed to the hottest by finding three huge specimens of the pediculidæ vestimenti falling upon his bread. The irate European officer ran about from one mess to another, exhibiting the well-fatted specimens, and exclaiming,

"Mon Dieu! Look at zis; one, two, three fall on my bread while I eat. Mon Dieu! I no stay longer to feed Jeff Davis's cattle. I wish I had him here. I cram dese down his troat."

The guard and jailers were changed every two or three weeks. On the 4th of August, 1861, Lieutenant Todd, a brother-in-law of President Lincoln, was assigned command of the prison. All alike testify that he was one of the most brutal and unfeeling wretches who at any time had charge of the captives. He sought every opportunity to prove that he had no sympathy, as he expressed himself, "with his d—d abolition brother-in-law's hirelings." One of his suffering captives writes: "He was the incarnation of malignant inhumanity and bitter cruelty."

The jailers and guard from Virginia and South Carolina were generally found brutal in the extreme, while those from Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana were frequently humane and courteous. The Madison Infantry consisted of a fine battalion of gentlemanly young men from Louisiana. They had charge of the prison for four or five weeks, and secured the cordial respect of their captives. Many good-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google natured tricks were banded between them and their prisoners.

There were several gas-burners in the room, which were allowed to burn at full flow until ten o'clock, when the order was given by the officer of the night, "Lights out!" Then the prisoners were required to turn off all but one, which was left dimly burning. One night, by mutual agreement, all the prisoners lay down and apparently fell asleep with every light in full flow. At ten o'clock the usual order was given, "Lights out!" No one stirred. The requisition was sternly repeated. As well give orders to the slumberers in the grave-yard, their feigned sleep was so profound. A Lieutenant was on duty whose kindliness of heart, it was well known, would allow of no rash act. He was embarrassed to know what to do in view of this strange insubordination. Such oblivious and stentorian sleep had never been witnessed in the prison before.

After a little delay the Lieutenant brought in a squad of soldiers, and then the order was given, "Put out those lights or take the consequences!" Still not a muscle moved. The order was repeated: "Put out those lights, or in two minutes the guard will fire upon you!"

There was such silence that the ticking of the watch, which the Lieutenant held in his hand, could be almost heard as the two minutes glided swiftly away. The order, "Make ready!" was given. Every musket was brought to the shoulder. Still not a prisoner moved. They all knew that a kind heart throbbed in the bosom of the Lieutenant. There was a moment's pause; a brief consultation with the guard, and then a corporal of the guard went around and turned off the burners.

Soon a suppressed titter was heard among the prisoners, then a laugh, which was followed by burst after burst of such hearty peals that all the captives in the adjoining prisons were awakened, and the prison-guards in alarm turned out. It was some time before the excitement was allayed.

The next night the prisoners were beautifully outwitted in their turn. They endeavored to re-enact the scene. Another Lieutenant of the same company was the officer for the night. He ordered "All lights out!" None of the prostrate throng in their sound slumber could heed the order. "Put out those lights instantly," was the stern command, "or you will regret the consequences!" Every person continued as motionless as so many marble statues. There was a whispered consultation among the officers, and then one stepped forward and blew out each gaslight, leaving the gas streaming up into the room. This would never do, for every man would soon be suffocated. One of the prisoners with a yawn, as though just awaking from a profound sleep, exclaimed: "Say, there; why don't you turn off the gas? Don't blow out the light!" Another, looking up, said: "Why, he don't know any thing about gas; he was raised down in the swamps."

The rebel officer continued to make his way among the pretended sleepers, taking care to tread upon as many as possible until each light was blown out. In a few moments the room was filled with the escaping gas, and the coughing, half-strangled prisoners sprung to the gas-burners and turned them off. The guard now commenced laughing, clapping their hands, stamping their feet, and pounding the floor with their muskets, until, in the excess of their delight at having "outwitted the Yankees," they created a clamor which exceeded that of the preceding night.

During the first two weeks many visitors came to see the captives. The officer on duty, like the keeper of a menagerie, piloted them through the room, pointing out the celebrities. Many of these visitors were courteous; others were overbearing and insulting. "What did you come down here for?" was invariably the first question. "Do you think you can subjugate us?" was the second. This was so often repeated that when a fresh batch of visitors came in, often twenty prisoners would shout out at once, "What did you come down here for?" "Do you think you can subjugate us?" Frequently the crowd, astounded at having their own questions thrown into their teeth, would turn and hastily go out. On Sunday great crowds would collect in front of the prison, the greater portion of whom were women of the aristocratic class, in their carriages.

Among the visitors was Edward Ruffin, a gray-haired rebel, who, with great self-complacency and insolence, called attention to the fact that he was the one who fired the first gun at Sumter. The pitiable old man, after the fall of Richmond, became the avenger of his own crime, and committed suicide by blowing out his brains with a pistol.

With every prisoner the all-engrossing thought was how to escape. Many plans were suggested, pondered, and abandoned. Numerous attempts were made, nearly all of which failed. Some succeeded in getting out of the city, and one found his heart throbbing as he caught sight of the star-spangled banner, when he was cruelly seized by rebel scouts and dragged back to bondage. Captain Hurd was a man of immense physical energy, and was endowed with nerve and resolution to brave any peril and to endure any privation. The risk of recapture was so very great, and the penalty so severe in being brought back and confined in irons, that it required great courage and almost recklessness to make the endeavor.

In the mean time all conceivable measures were adopted to beguile the weary hours. One mode of pastime was the organization of a society called the Richmond Prison Association. Mr. Ely was President. The Society met three times a week. Each member was bound to contribute to the general entertainment, either by a declamation, a story, or by singing a song. The meetings were conducted in strict accordance with parliamentary rules. They held also

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 mock-trials. There was one very serious case brought forward of "breach of promise." Captain Hurd was the aggrieved maiden. The faithless swain gave his name to the Court as Lieutenant Jawbones. Colonel Woodruff and Mr. Huston were counsel for the plaintiff. Major Potter and the Chaplain of the Fifth Maine Regiment appeared for the defendant. Mr. Ely was judge. The arguments of the opposing counsel and the charge filled the gloomy old prison with such peals of merriment as to help the prisoners, for the moment, to be oblivious of their misery.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

As the days lingered along, and the hope of release by exchange grew darker, the mind became prepared for more desperate endeavors for escape. There were a large number of the prisoners, sick or wounded, distributed through buildings called hospitals in close proximity. But one surgeon was detailed for about seven hundred men. The suffering was so terrible that several Union surgeons who were prisoners, were, at their earnest solicitations, permitted to assist. Upon giving their parole they were provided with a red rosette, and were permitted to pass from one prison to another, and also to go about the city. Among these, as we have mentioned, was Colonel Murphy. But he had been deprived of the right in consequence of his earnest endeavors to meliorate the condition of the sufferers. Colonel De Villiers, who had paid some attention to medical studies in Europe, succeeded in passing himself off as a surgeon, obtained this great privilege of the freedom of the city on parole. He exerted himself to the utmost to help his comrades, and by his indefatigable perseverance he obtained an interview with Jeff Davis, and implored that his fellow-captives might be treated with the usual humanity of prisoners of war. The rebel chieftain received him with his characteristic icy politeness, but was utterly unrelenting.

On Sunday, the 1st of September, Colonel De Villiers returned to prison, his parole having expired and Jeff Davis refusing to extend it. The Colonel was unusually reticent during the day. In the evening, with great nonchalance, as if on his accustomed round of medical duties, he walked out of prison, out of Richmond, and was no longer a prisoner.

Captain Hurd had now resolved, at whatever risk, to attempt his escape. At night he whispered his intention to Lieutenant Raynor. After anxious deliberation the plan which they settled upon was to adopt the disguise of surgeons, and in the dusk of the evening to pass the guard. They were all to meet at a designated corner, which could be seen from the prison windows, and then trust to circumstances. Lieutenant Murphy also joined them. Fortunately Captain Hurd had a red flannel shirt, from which they cut their rosettes which they were to pin upon the breast of their coats. The few who were informed of their plan earnestly endeavored to dissuade them, saying that it was a fool-hardy undertaking, and that they would be brought back and placed in irons. Colonel Raynor was to go first, between five and six o'clock in the evening. The other two were to follow at eight. Anxiety of mind de-

PASSING THE GUARD.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

prived the Colonel of all appetite for dinner. He dressed himself as well as possible for nights of exposure in the swamps, and at the appointed hour, with throbbing heart, but with calm exterior, walked up to the guard, who sat on a tobacco box at the door with his bayoneted gun extended across it. With marvelous coolness the feigned surgeon raised the gun. The guard looked at the rosette, nodded, and the prisoner passed out. One can hardly read the account without holding his breath. Who can imagine the emotions which must have agitated the principal actor in this scene, and his friends who were looking on?

The guard turned his eye toward the escaping captive, as though a momentary suspicion had been aroused. One of his friends called out, "Doctor, don't forget those pills; I must take some to-night!" "All right!" said the Colonel, "I'll get them!" Another guard was to be passed, who merely glanced at the rosette, and the Colonel continued his walk. He was now free. But he was surrounded by perils most imminent, and weary leagues were to be traversed, and days and nights of hunger, cold, and exposure were to be endured before he could reach the lines of the Union army. He had gone but a few steps when he met one of the officers of the prison-guard. With an erect head, and looking him steadfastly in the face, the Colonel passed.

The rebel officer, probably merely recognizing a familiar face, nodded. The salutation was returned, and the Colonel walked slowly on. A few steps further he encountered the "penny post-man," whom he had often conversed with in the prison. The man looked inquiringly into his face, stopped, turned round, gazed upon him in evident surprise, but gave no alarm. With affected carelessness the Colonel sauntered along through the streets, when suddenly he felt a hand grasp his shoulder, and heard the hard breathing in his ear as of one who had been in hot pursuit. His heart sank within him, and his knees trembled so that he could scarcely stand. Turning around he beheld a Confederate officer, who, seizing his arm, gave him a punch in the side, exclaiming:

"I say, Cap'n, ain't—(hic)—ain't this bully news?"

It was manifest that the fellow was drunk, and that there was nothing to fear. But the shock was so great that for the moment the Colonel was almost unmanned, and he reeled from weakness as much as did the rebel from his cups. The jolly bacchanal, without noticing the surprise of his companion, continued:

"Lee's got Rose—Rosen—Rosencrans, and all his army, an—an—and (hic) next week we'll get McClellan too."

"Is this true?" inquired the Colonel.

"Jis as true as gospel, Cap'n. I say," he continued, "where do you belong, Cap'n?"

"To the Thirty-third Virginia," was the reply. Colonel Raynor had learned that that regiment had arrived the day before.

"Pshaw!" exclaimed the drunken man, "why I'm a Thirty—Thirty-thirder myself! What's your company?"

Here was a contretemps. But the Colonel's ready wit came to his rescue.

"I have just arrived," he said, "and have not yet reported to Colonel Cummings, and do not know what company I shall be assigned to."

"Well, Cap'n, I'm leftenant of Company C. Let's go in here and take a drink."

At the door of the saloon the Colonel slipped away. With many sagacious precautions to avoid exciting suspicion, he succeeded in purchasing a compass to guide their path through the woods, a map of Virginia, a lot of matches, and a bed-cord. He then returned to the vicinity of the prison, where he fortunately met Dr. Le Boutillier, of the Second Minnesota, who passed in and out upon his parole. By him he sent word to his friends Hurd and Murphy of his success, and that he would meet them at their appointed rendezvous.

Let us now return into the prison. Hurd and Murphy stood at the window watching the movements of their companion, as he went out, with such intensity of anxiety that they could almost feel the fevered pulsations of their hearts. Two long hours of terrible suspense passed away. The question, almost more fearful than that of life or death, for it was freedom or the dungeon, was soon to be decided. While absorbed in these reflections two rebel officers were admitted, who had some trouble to persuade the guard to pass them out.

Colonel Neff, with sympathetic sorrow, came to the young adventurers and said, "Your chance is gone. You must give it up." "Perhaps not," Captain Hurd replied, his cheek blanched with emotion but not with fear; "however it is too late to falter; I will make the trial." The gallant Colonel Corcoran came to them and said: "Be careful, and may success attend you!" Colonel Sprague also addressed them in words of cheer, saying, "Were I a young man I would go with you. Be vigilant, and may you get safely through! and then let the people know the truth about us."

The two young men, with their surgeon's badges, then walked carelessly toward the door, chatting with those around them. The whole programme had been carefully arranged. "Come, Doctor," exclaimed Lieutenant Murphy, in a voice loud enough to arrest the attention of the guard, "it is time for us to go!" "Yes, I will be with you in a moment," was the reply. At the same time Colonel Corcoran, Sprague, and others gathered around requesting the pretended doctors to purchase some tobacco for them. Arrangements had also been made for some of their comrades to answer to their names at roll-call for several days, till many miles should be placed between the fugitives and their prison. The guard was thoroughly deceived. They passed out without opposition. The last words they heard from their dismal prison as they entered the streets

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was the kindly voice of Colonel Sprague calling out to them, "Doctor, don't forget to bring me that tobacco. I need it very much!"

Colonel Raynor was anxiously watching in the street. He saw in the dusk two figures come out of the prison, whom he at once recognized as his looked-for comrades. He followed them a few moments unobserved, and then stepping up, tapped each on the shoulder. A shudder of alarm shook their frames as they apprehended that it was the hand of an arresting officer. The peril was yet too imminent to allow of any hearty rejoicing. Still, as they pressed along the crowded streets they assumed the swaggering air of Southerners, talking loudly and laughing. Emerging from the city they struck a broad road running to the northeast, and after walking about two miles encountered a toll-gate guarded by a squad of soldiers. The night was dark, with drizzling rain. Fortunately they were not observed, though some dogs took the alarm, and commenced furiously barking.

They threw themselves flat upon the ground as they saw the door of the toll-house open and soldiers come out. Creeping back several hundred yards through a ditch they concealed themselves near a breastwork, where they heard several shots. Remaining perfectly still for a couple of hours, they, by a circuitous route, passed around the gate, struck the pike a mile beyond, and traveled rapidly all night. They often heard wagons approaching. These they eluded by leaving the road and hiding in the bushes or behind the fences until the market-carts, on the way to the city, had passed. Several times they were very near being discovered by the dogs which invariably accompanied these carts. At about four o'clock in the morning they passed a small hamlet, where the dogs raised an outcry sufficient to awake every sleeper within a mile. Hurrying through along the main road they soon found it bearing so far east that they entered a sort of wood-path which led north. The roar of a passing railroad train informed them that the railroad was close by them on the left. The dawn of morning was now beginning to appear. They entered the woods, and creeping under some thick, wet bushes, thoroughly exhausted and soaked, they fell soundly asleep.

Soon after sunrise of Friday, September 6, they were all suddenly and simultaneously aroused by the crack of a whip at their ears, which sounded like the report of a pistol. Greatly alarmed they looked up and beheld a teamster passing so near that he could have touched them with his whip. In the darkness they had lain down just on the edge of a road leading through the forest. But the teamster did not chance to turn his eyes toward the thicket, and they escaped unseen. But it was necessary immediately to change their position. After a brief consultation they cautiously took up their line of march in true military order.

Colonel Raynor led the advance, with the ordnance stores, consisting of a compass, a map, and a box of matches. Lieutenant Murphy followed with the commissariat of two sandwiches. Colonel Hurd brought up the rear in charge of the engineering department, with the supplies of a jack-knife and a bed-cord. As Colonel Hurd was familiar with all the wild and perilous adventures of frontier life, and was

THE LINE OF MARCH.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

a man of indomitable energy and bravery, it would have seemed natural that he, with his engineering tools, should have led the march. But being not quite so quick of hearing as Colonel Raynor, it was deemed best that he should compose the rear-guard. Colonel Murphy had been city-bred, and thus not being familiar with woodcraft, manifestly the judicious post for him to occupy was the centre.

The plan of their perilous campaign was as follows: They were to travel as rapidly as possible through the night, hide in some thicket by day, never moving forward by daylight unless under cover of some dense forest, or through some of the spacious corn-fields, which afforded excellent shelter; they were never to enter a house, or to allow a single human being to see them if they could avoid it. They had resolved, though unarmed, to fight against any odds, and to sell their lives as dearly as possible rather than to be recaptured.

With stiffened limbs and wet clothes our adventurers were cautiously moving to find some safer place of concealment for the day, when they were startled by the report of a gun very near, and a man was seen approaching directly toward them. With throbbing hearts they concealed themselves as best they could. The man stooped, picked up the squirrel which he had shot, calmly reloaded his gun, and gazing into the tree-tops for game, passed slowly along and soon disappeared in the forest, each shot indicating his greater distance. Thus this danger was escaped.

The woods were so dense that they deemed it as prudent to travel as to attempt to lie quiet. They therefore, though keeping a very close watch, pressed on by the compass in a northeasterly direction, designing to strike the Potomac somewhere in Westmoreland County, near Tappahannock Town. They soon came upon a clearing, and, as they skirted it with extreme caution, a pack of hounds set up their dreaded clamor. "I do verily believe," writes Colonel Raynor, "that every house we passed in this portion of Virginia supported from five to twenty dogs each; and invariably the whole canine family proclaimed our proximity from throats which never tired."

About 4 o'clock P.M. they came to the end of the woods which they had been so rapidly traversing. Colonel Hurd climbed a tall tree on a reconnoitring tour. He reported an open, scattered country spreading out before them. In the distance he saw an irregular belt of timber which his experience in such matters assured him indicated a water-course. As it was imprudent to attempt to pass over this open country by daylight they retired into the woods and waited for the night. Dividing one of their sandwiches into three parts, they took a mouthful each. This was their first meal since leaving the prison. In the early evening twilight, as concealed in a thicket they were waiting for the darkness, two negroes, with a dog, passed very near them. The dog came snuffing and growling toward them, when one of the darkeys said, "'Possum dar!" "No," the other replied, "Hector neber growl dat way at 'possum. Suffin else dar!" They both stopped. Our party remained as immovable as if they were dead. The natural timidity of the slaves prevented them from exploring the thicket. The dog growled, but seemed indisposed to attack them, though both of the negroes clapped their hands and tried to urge him on, saying, "Seek him, Hector; seek him, boy!" The dog merely growled the louder, but made no nearer approach. The two darkeys and the dog soon passed along.

About ten o'clock, all traveling having apparently ceased, the night being very dark with only an occasional star visible, they again entered the road. Just before midnight they came to the Chickahominy, which they crossed by a mill-dam, over which there was but a shallow depth of water. The road crossed by a ford a little distance below. Regaining the highway they pressed on for a few miles until they saw several lights twinkling at a little distance before them. It was probably an encampment of soldiers. They immediately turned into the woods, assailed by the yelping of the omnipresent dog. Giving the lights a wide berth, they found themselves in a field of potatoes, both sweet and common. Starving as they were they eagerly filled their stomachs and their pockets with the raw potatoes, which they found not unpalatable. Upon leaving this field they entered one of corn, and they added a few ears to their commissariat stores.

Guided by their compass, and availing themselves of roads only when they led in a right direction, they at length found themselves bewildered amidst the paths of a large plantation. The blowing of the horns to awaken the negro to his daily toil warned them that it was near daylight, and that they were in no little danger of being encountered by some gang marching to their work. Being quite exhausted, and finding two logs near together, they all three laid down between them, and slept soundly until the morning of Saturday the 7th. When they woke the sound of voices and axes all around satisfied them that their position was not a safe one. They therefore retraced their steps that they might get around the plantation, and make their way through a dense forest which seemed to skirt it on the left. In doing this they had to pass near the gate of the plantation. Here they encountered a large troop of negroes walking along the road. They, however, succeeded in concealing themselves until the slaves had gone by.

A few moments after they heard a noise behind them as they were moving through the woods, near and parallel to the road. Looking around they saw a negro, who had lagged behind the others, hurrying down to overtake his companions. Each one instinctively sprang behind a tree, and this peril was escaped. Cautiously threading the densest part of the woods

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"'POSSUM DAR!"

they got beyond the limits of the plantation and ascended a high hill. From this eminence they could see that the country toward the north was quite open; and just west of them, at a distance of not more than two miles, there was a large village. A train of cars was entering the village, which was probably Hanover Court House. Toward the east the forest still extended. Keeping carefully within its shelter they resumed their march, descending the hill. They soon entered upon low bottom-land, wet and muddy, and then encountered a swollen creek. In endeavoring to cross upon a log Colonel Raynor fell in.

Colonel Hurd's impetuous nature could not brook a moment's delay. Inured to hardship he seemed insensible to fatigue. His companions noticed that the strongest motive which seemed to impel him onward was the fear that his regiment, in which he was then a Captain, might get into a fight before he reached it. Murphy, not accustomed to such privations and toils, was now suffering very severely. His feet were swollen, his strength exhausted, and it was with great pain and difficulty that he could limp along. Colonel Hurd was just as fresh as at the outset, and Colonel Raynor's vigorous frame bore up wonderfully. The solace with which Colonel Hurd, as he tramped along, endeavored to cheer his companions was not very satisfactory.

"Oh, this is nothing!" he exclaimed; "this is nothing! Wait till you have lived on mule's meat twenty-seven days among the Rocky Mountains, with the snow four feet deep, and then you may have reason to complain."

Toiling on they reached the limits of the forest, and crossing a fine gravel pike leading to the northwest, they passed through a cornfield, whose tall and waving stalks completely sheltered them, and entered another belt of timber and found themselves upon the banks of a large, rapid, unbridged river, swollen by the recent rains. It was the Pamunky. There was no boat to be found; but there were half-floating logs scattered here and there along the bank. Colonel Raynor cut the bed-cord into convenient lengths and waded into the water, while his comrades brought him logs, which he tied together and made a small raft. The air swarmed with mosquitoes, huge black tormentors, who instantly settled, with their poisonous sting, upon any exposed portion of the body. Colonel Raynor was terribly bitten. The in-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google flammation was so immediate and severe from the deep puncture of their bills that his comrades declared that they could not have recognized him.

As soon as their small raft was constructed they placed their clothes upon it. Colonel Hurd tied one end of the cord around his body and took the lead swimming. The other two swam, pushing behind. Colonel Raynor wrapped his watch, map, compass, and matches in a handkerchief and bound them upon the top of his head, not caring to trust treasure so precious to a frail raft. The mosquitoes followed them unrelentingly in clouds. Safely they effected the passage of the swift, turbid stream and found a fringe of timber on the northern bank. Breaking up their raft, and carefully preserving the pieces of cord, they followed along the edge of the stream until they entered an extended forest, where, in a very secluded ravine, they ventured to kindle a small fire and roast twelve small potatoes, about the size of walnuts, and two ears of corn.

They had traveled all day foodless. Another dark night was at hand, through whose gloomy hours they must grope along as rapidly as possible. Colonel Murphy's exhausted condition seemed to demand a little rest. But no reply could be made to Hurd's renewed asseveration, "This is nothing to living on mule's meat twenty days among the Rocky Mountains, with the snow four feet deep. Besides," he added, "I would rather lose my right arm than have my company get into a fight before I get back to them."

Again these indomitable men, with strength almost miraculously preserved, took up their line of march. It was important to get through the forest and to strike some road before dark, as it was impossible to make much headway through the woods in the night. Following a small stream, which ran through a deep ravine, about an hour before sunset they came in sight of the open country. Just then they heard, very near them, a shot, followed by the barking of a dog. Colonel Raynor exclaims, with good reason, "I have hated dogs ever since this trip." They were very apprehensive that the sagacious animal would detect them. As the hunter was on the same side of the ravine with them they hastily recrossed, and had just concealed themselves in a thicket, when two other shots showed that the hunter had crossed also and was approaching them. As they thought it almost certain that the dog would discover them they decided, after a hurried consultation, to capture the hunter, take his arms, gag and tie him fast, and then, as soon as dark, to leave the neighborhood as rapidly as possible. Colonel Raynor, who was a very powerful man, was to strangle the dog. Fortunately for all the young man turned his steps away from them, and they saw him retire to a house not far distant.

Our adventurers remained in their retreat until ten o'clock at night when they visited a barn, hoping to obtain something to eat. Here, to their great joy, they found a lot of unthreshed wheat, and they filled their pockets with the ears. It was very dark, and as they were groping about Raynor felt some animal rubbing its nose against his leg. It was a large

CROSSING THE PAMUNKY.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

dog. But the brute manifested no hostility. Hurd proposed that they should kill and eat it, saying that it must be as good as "mule's meat." But Murphy, as he champed a mouthful of wheat, suggested that they had better wait until they had been "in the Rocky Mountains twenty-seven days, with the snow four feet deep."

The dog accompanied them to the confines of the plantation and then quietly returned to his home. It was now Saturday night the 7th. Moving as rapidly as their exhausted limbs would allow along the road, a little after midnight they sat down for a moment's rest by the roadside. Their exhaustion was such that they almost instantly fell asleep. They were aroused by a wagon rattling furiously by, which impelled them again to take to their feet, as it was necessary that they should find some place of concealment before the light of day should be around them. As they toiled along, Raynor in advance, Hurd in the rear, the indomitable frontiersman cheered his exhausted comrade, who composed the centre of their line of march, with sundry pleasantries, interlarded with allusions to "mule's meat," "Rocky Mountains," "twenty-seven days," and "four feet of snow."

Dawn was now approaching. They took shelter in some thick woods, and after sleeping soundly a couple of hours, were awakened by the bright Sabbath sun shining in their faces. They picked the kernels of wheat out of the ears, with which their pockets were stuffed, and made a frugal breakfast. Under cover of the forest they pressed along until they reached its limits, when they saw before them a small orchard. Half-famished as they were the desire to get some fruit was so strong that, notwithstanding the risk of discovery, they entered it. The few small sour apples which they found were so refreshing that Mr. Murphy's spirits were revived; and Colonel Hurd, for the whole forenoon, made no allusions to the "Rocky Mountains."

As they left the orchard they beheld an open, thickly-settled country before them. There was, however, a dense forest in view which promised ample shelter. But it could only be reached by crossing an open field, with a large house on each side, and many people moving around. Much valuable time would be lost by remaining where they were until night. To attempt to cross the field in open day exposed them to inevitable observation and probably to recapture. After a very careful reconnoissance they observed a small depression through the field, along which a man might possibly creep without being seen from the houses, though one half of his body would be exposed should he stand erect. Colonel Hurd's desire to join his company "before they had a fight" overcame Colonel Murphy's exhaustion and Colonel Raynor's sound judgment, and, throwing themselves flat upon their faces, they wormed their way through the field and gained safely the friendly shelter of the woods.

Finding a corn-field they plucked some ears, and, retiring to a wild ravine, they built a fire and prepared themselves a very savory repast of roasted corn. In traversing a swamp soon after they found their dessert prepared for them in the shape of about half a pint of whortleberries. The spacious corn-fields, with their thick, tall spires afforded them far better protection even than the densest forest. As they were threading one of these fields a party of negroes passed very near them.

Emerging from the corn-field they struck a shallow stream, which was sunk deep beneath its banks. They waded down the pebbly bed of the stream until they reached the banks of a large river, the Mattapony. Following the forest-fringed banks of this stream for a mile they watched their chance, and, crossing by a bridge, plunged into a low, marshy piece of timber. The utmost circumspection was needed, for many parties were seen on the road moving to and fro. Here they found mosquitoes in myriads, and the torment which the venomous insects created was almost insupportable. It was now about four o'clock in the afternoon of the Sabbath. Notwithstanding the sufferings they endured from their swarming foes, who bit through their clothes, they did not dare to leave the place of their concealment until dark, for white men and negroes were constantly passing.

Night came, not merely dark, but black. With the utmost difficulty could they grope along the road. They met a man. It was too dark to see him. His footsteps and the rustle of his garments alone rendered his presence palpable. Indeed the man ran plump against Colonel Hurd, who, as we have said, brought up the rear. There was nothing to excite suspicion, and the probable rebel and the patriot each passed on his way.

About midnight it grew a little lighter, and they reached one of those groups of houses which in the South are called villages. They were not a little perplexed to know where they were. Seeing a notice tacked upon a door they carefully tore it off, retreated into the woods, and lighted a piece of candle which Colonel Murphy carried through the whole trip. It proved to be a notice that the estate of General Garnett, who was killed at Rich Mountain, was to be sold. It convinced them that they were at Bowling Green, in Caroline County. They then examined their map, and laid their course to strike the Potomac at its nearest point. Rapidly they pressed along the road until about 3 o'clock in the morning, when they again struck into the woods, and finding a good place for concealment all lay down and went to sleep. But scarcely had they closed their eyes ere they were aroused by the clatter of several horsemen passing at full trot on the road near by, not improbably rebel scouts in pursuit of the fugitives. Indeed the Richmond papers had announced that such vigorous measures had been put in operation for the capture

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A MUTUAL SCARE.

of the fugitives, Colonels Hurd, Murphy, and Raynor, that it was scarcely within the limits of possibility that they could escape.

Removing deeper into the woods they slept soundly for a few hours in sweet oblivion of pursuers and of throbbing feet. Their sufferings from sore feet were more terrible than can be described or imagined. The two months in prison had rendered their feet very tender. Being half of the time wet and in constant use they were blistered and raw. Colonel Murphy's feet were in a dreadful condition, and Colonel Raynor's nearly as bad. Colonel Hurd seemed to possess marvelous endurance.

When they awoke the next morning, Monday, September 9, a dense fog had settled down over the whole country. Colonel Raynor led, compass in hand, the others following close behind. Entering a corn-field they filled their pockets, and passed a gang of negroes but a few yards from them, though the fog was so thick that they could not be seen. Protected by this friendly veil they fearlessly entered the road, relying upon their ears to give warning of the approach of danger. They walked barefooted and made no noise. Several streams they crossed on bridges. Though they could hear the cackling of chickens and the voices of people, indicating dwellings all around them, they were effectually shielded from observation. Having walked thus about twelve miles on the open road, about noon the fog began to lift and again they took to the woods. They lay down and slept under a clump of bushes during the afternoon. About sunset they were roused from their sleep by a negro boy who passed close by them calling for the cows.

As soon as the young moon had gone down they resumed the road, and about an hour before midnight reached a small village. At the outskirts there was a guide-board at the junction of two roads. Hurd and Murphy raised Raynor on their shoulders, who pulled off the board, and they then went into a thicket where they could safely strike a light to read the direction. It was with great difficulty that they could ignite the matches, which the fog had damped. After a dozen unsuccessful efforts, just as a match gave out its brilliant flash, illumining every object near, they saw a man standing within three feet of them. It was probably a slave skulking about. The match instantly went out. But the terrified slave was heard rushing through the bushes, leaping the fences, and flying in the utmost dismay, as if he had seen an apparition of fiends and they were pursuing him.

A glance at the guide-board told them that it was twenty miles to Tappahannock, and twenty-two to Bowling Green. Having their posi-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tion thus accurately defined, cheered by hope, and refreshed by the nap which they had enjoyed in the afternoon, they pushed rapidly on over the road, though to two of them every step was torture. Just before light they came to a large plantation where the people were up. This compelled them again to plunge into the woods, where, after the toilsome travel of the night, hungry, thirsty, torn, and foot-sore, they hid under some bushes for rest.

After a few hours of sleep they awoke. It was Tuesday, the 10th. A careful reconnoissance showed them that they were in a small grove of about three acres, surrounded by the most highly cultivated and densely populated country they had yet seen. It was manifest that they could not safely leave their covert until night. Rest and sleep they greatly needed. But the sleep which with drooping eyelids they strove to gain was driven from them by their intense thirst. In half delirious dreams they saw fountains of fresh water and tables groaning with delicious food.

There were so many people moving about that they did not venture to leave their hiding-place until about nine o'clock, when the moon went down and most of the people were in their beds. They then cautiously started out. They were all barefoot. The bottom of each foot was raw flesh, an entire sore from heel to toe. They had previously cut holes in their boots wherever they pinched. This had let in sand and water and mud, and their feet were in a state which can not be described. And yet in this condition they were traveling in their zigzag course, through swamps and forests in the gloom of night, often without food and without water, an average of forty miles every twenty-four hours. We have read of suffering, of endurance, of heroism, elsewhere. But greater than this, exhibited by these heroic patriots, escaping from the fiendish spirit of treason and rebellion, we know not where to find.

"Our thirst," Colonel Raynor writes, "overpowered the pain in our feet, and good time was made. We traveled several miles before any water was found; and that was nothing but a 'hog-wallow,' yet it tasted sweet." Soon after they came upon a cool running stream. "Ah," exclaims Colonel Raynor, "how few truly know what real hunger or thirst is! Yet we were less than thirty-six hours without water."

About one o'clock in the morning of Wednesday the 11th, they caught sight of the Rappahannock. The agitating question of how they were to cross the river, which was here a mile wide, banished fatigue. The wind was blowing so freshly that they could not cross upon a frail raft; and they were too much exhausted to attempt to construct one. They, however, pressed on, and soon came in sight of a straggling village of six or eight houses on the banks. They crept noiselessly through the silent street to the water's edge, and there, to their inexpressible joy, they found a skiff with paddles drawn up upon the beach out of reach of the tide. Their united strength was just sufficient to shove it into the water. Not a moment was lost in embarking, and they soon reached the opposite shore. They then set it adrift that it might not reveal the line of their escape. Our adventurers desire here to present their thanks to the owner of the skiff for its use, and their hope that in good time he gained possession of it again. Colonel Murphy had accidentally, in the excitement of pushing off the boat, left his shoes upon the opposite bank. Raynor and Hurd had fortunately kept theirs with them.

The gloom of night still enveloped them, and the wind was high. They found an old shed into which they entered, and thus protected from the wind they struck a light and examined their map. They judged that ten miles, in a direct line, would take them through Westmoreland County to the Potomac. This cheering prospect nerved them with new energies. They soon found a good road running east. But it was of hard, rough clay, which tore Murphy's lacerated feet terribly. Still he hobbled on, though unable at times to repress his groans. Colonel Hurd seemed to have nerves of steel, and was ever urging haste. Colonel Raynor was so weary that he could scarcely lift one foot in advance of the other, and found himself falling asleep as he toiled on with strength every hour growing weaker. Still they did not rest until daylight, when they left the road and sought concealment in a small piece of woods. After a short nap in a thicket, impatience to reach the Potomac, now so near, again roused them. Just as they were about to start a negro thrust his face into the thicket close to them and commenced calling for his cows. It seemed as though he must have seen them, though he said nothing but went on his way shouting "Sukee, Sukee!" at the top of his voice.

They immediately struck out, by the compass, northeast through the woods. It was the morning of Thursday the 12th. The brushwood and thorns lacerated Murphy's bare and gory feet terribly. Some of the vines must have poisoned them, for they were fearfully inflamed and swollen. Every few moments he would fall from exhaustion and pain. Still he hobbled along, his faithful companions refusing to abandon him. Soon they came upon one of those immense swamps with which Eastern Virginia abounds. It extended in all directions as far as the eye could reach. Here was indeed a dilemma. None of them could endure the thought of the dreary miles they must travel in the endeavor to pass around the vast morass. Should they plunge into it, there was great danger that in their extreme exhaustion they all might perish in its miry bottom. After anxious deliberation the proposition of Colonel Hurd was adopted that they should attempt to force their way through. As there were many encampments of Confederate soldiers in the vicinity the attempt to go around would expose them to almost inevitable capture. In response to the proposition Raynor said, "Well,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google go ahead and we will follow." Hurd started, and the first step plunged him in mud and water up to his waist. The swamp was about three quarters of a mile broad, partially covered with a rank growth of reeds and water-lilies without trees or brush. Sometimes they would be not more than knee-deep in the slimy ooze. The next step would plunge them to the arm-pits, and then they would encounter a pool of the green, stagnant, stenchful slough, through which they half waded, half swam.

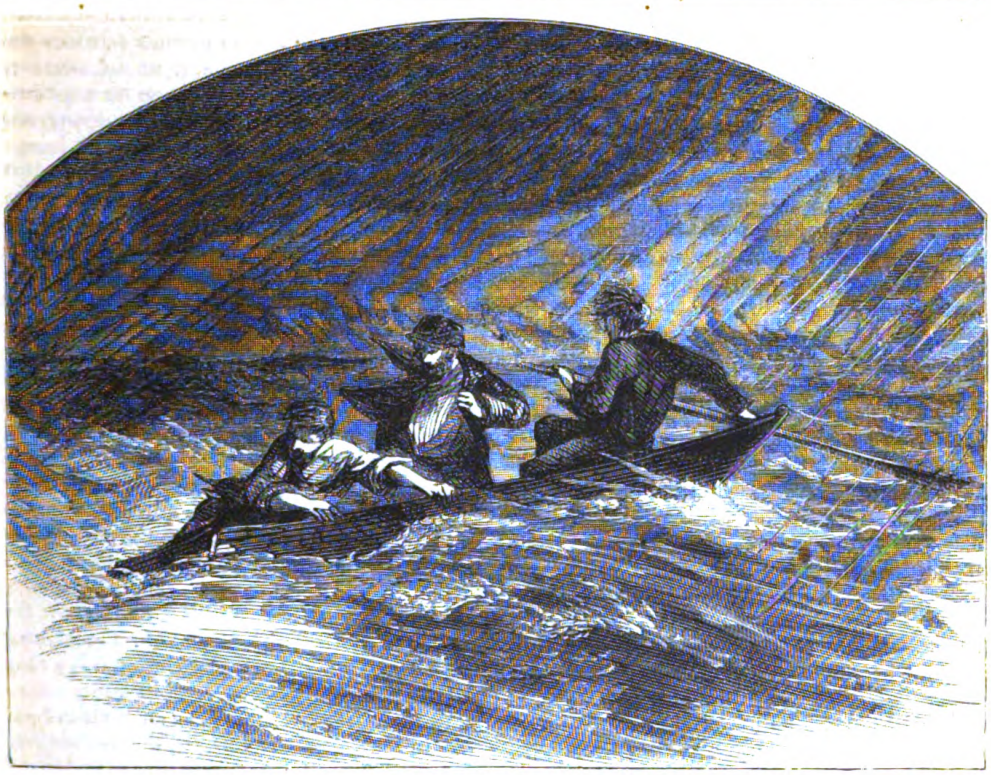
In an hour they reached the dry land on the other side, and ascending a slight eminence sat down to rest. For the first time a cloud of despondency seemed to be gathering even upon Colonel Hurd's brow. Despairingly they gazed for a moment into each other's faces, and not a word was uttered. But suddenly Hurd jumped up, exclaiming: "Why, boys, I have lived twenty-seven days in the Rocky Mountains on mule's meat, with the snow four feet deep, and this is nothing to that!"

This started them all again. They passed a deserted garden, where they found a few green tomatoes and a ripe cucumber. "I can testify," one of their number writes, "that a ripe cucumber raw does not taste good even to a hungry man." Ascending the brow of a hill they saw the broad, silvery waters of the Potomac in the distance, with the blue line of the Maryland shore barely discernible beyond. Few can imagine the emotions which this sight enkindled in the bosoms of these weary wanderers. More than one silent prayer of gratitude ascended to that Providence which had protected them thus far. Tears of joy dimmed the eyes of these men whom no woes could compel to weep. They now entered a corn-field, and with decided relish ate of the green ears.

As they drew near the river they came upon a group of negroes near an old house all fallen to decay, leaving but the chimney standing. There was a marble slab near bearing this inscription: "On this spot was born George Washington, February 22, 1732." "We could not," writes Colonel Raynor, "repress a feeling of indignation that so sacred a spot should be surrounded by traitors." They came upon the negroes so suddenly that there was no chance for a retreat. So making a virtue of necessity they walked boldly forward, and told the negroes very truly that they had been lost in the woods for many days and were almost starved. The kind-hearted slaves gave them the remainder of their breakfast, which consisted of a small lump of corn-bread and about two ounces of fat. They said, apologizing for the small quantity, "Massa don't gib much now, and we eats all." In reply to the inquiry for a boat to cross over into Maryland they replied, "Massa Wilson has a boat 'bout tree miles up de creek, but dar is not anuder boat fit to cross the 'Tomac in de neighborhood."

Just then a white man, probably their overseer, rode up and gazed in apparent astonishment upon the fugitives in their ragged and forlorn condition. They represented to him that they had been lost in the woods, and that they wished to get over the river to recruit soldiers. He scrutinized them quite suspiciously, and said, "Mr. Wilson has a boat, and it is the only one this side of Mathias Point; but I don't think he will let you take it," with especial emphasis on the "you." He then rode on. As they approached the creek, which was here quite wide, and about a mile from its entrance into the river, they saw a negro coming across in a canoe or "dug-out." Hiding in the corn, they waited until he tied the boat and threw the paddle in the grass upon the bank. As soon as he was out of sight they took the boat and commenced paddling down the creek. It blew almost a gale, the hollowed log was but about twelve feet long, and when all three were in the gunwale was not more than an inch above the water. It was evidently impossible to cross the storm-swept Potomac in so frail a bark. Near the mouth of the creek they saw a negro fishing in a little larger boat, but one in which no sane man would think of encountering the heavy seas then running in the river, which was here over six miles wide.



They compelled the negro to exchange boats with them. He remonstrated piteously, saying, "Massa will kill me when I get home for doing it." Colonel Hurd replied, "But I shall kill you here, and now, if you do not do it." The poor slave yielded, but said, "You'll neber get over in dis storm, Massa, neber, neber!"

They paid the negro three dollars in Confederate money, as boot, in the compulsory exchange. The skiff had no rowlocks or tholepins, was very frail and leaked badly. Just as they were starting the negro shouted out to them, "Go starn fo'most, Massa, starn fo'most; dat's de safest way." They followed his advice. But for this sagacity of the negro the boat would inevitably have been swamped, and they all would have perished.

Raynor took a paddle and steered. Hurd stood in the centre of the boat, with his coat for a sail, while Murphy did good service in bailing out the water. Fortunately the wind was blowing directly across the river in their favor. As soon as they had left the shelter of the bank and felt the full force of the wind the waves began to pour in above the sides of the boat, and it seemed inevitable that they must be swamped. But to return to the shore was not to be thought of. There was evidently quite a commotion there. The owner of the skiff was on the bank calling upon them to return his boat, and the overseer whom they had met on horseback was eagerly watching them. The sea now ran so high that both Hurd and Murphy had to devote all their energies to bailing. When in the trough of the waves the tops of the trees on either banks could not be seen.

Their safe passage of the river under such circumstances seems almost miraculous. By

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CROSSING THE POTOMAC.

going stern foremost the bows of the boat cut the on-rushing billows, and throwing them on each side prevented their breaking into the boat. In about three hours after leaving the Virginia shore they were approaching the Maryland side at the mouth of the Wicomico Creek. There is here an extensive bar, over which the waves were dashing furiously, throwing the spray many feet into the air. It was low-water, and the spectacle of danger was terrific. But Hurd's animating voice was still heard shouting, "Keep her straight, Raynor; we are all right yet!" Just then a huge crested billow swept them far up the bar and nearly filled the boat. They leaped out, dragged the boat over the bar, and found themselves safe in comparatively still water. Soon they reached a fishing sloop within the creek, Captain Faunce, of Washington City. Being satisfied that the vessel could not be there unless its owner were loyal, they went fearlessly on board, told their story, and were received with great hospitality. The kind-hearted fishermen served up for their hungry guests a luxurious repast of fish and oysters, and gave them beds to sleep on. Tears filled the eyes of the good old Captain when he looked at Murphy's feet; and he would not allow his guests to leave the boat until the next morning, though Colonel Hurd was anxious to land and walk through Maryland to Washington, declaring that he was "not tired."

The next morning, Friday, the 13th, they took leave of their kind host, and set out in their skiff to skirt the Maryland shore until they should meet some one of the blockading squadron which would convey them to Washington. Captain Faunce advised them not to trust any of the inhabitants along the coast, as they were rank rebels, until reaching Lower Cedar Point, where there lived a Mr. Burroughs, who was a true Union man, and who would give them all the assistance in his power. For some time they endeavored to make their way along the shore by paddling their skiff. But an angry sea and an adverse wind ere long compelled them to abandon their boat and take to the bank. Their progress was slow, for Murphy's feet were in a horrible condition. They were so swollen and discolored that they bore a great resemblance to two huge boiled puddings, stained and discolored where the fruit had broken through. By adopting the expedient of letting down his pants over his feet and tying them beneath, holding the waistbands by the hips on each side, his feet were in a measure protected from the oyster-shells and gravel with which the banks of the Potomac were covered. There were times when he was semi-delirious with anguish. Still he pressed on.

They met some young men, to whom they represented that they were Confederate soldiers who had been lost in the woods, and who were trying to escape into Virginia. The young Marylanders told them to make their way up to Watson's, at the mouth of Pope's Creek, and he would run them over, as that was his business. But they advised them to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

keep clear of Burroughs's, at Lower Cedar Point, as he was "a d—d Union hound," and "we are going to burn him out one of these nights." One of these young men accompanied them some distance, and aided them to cross a large creek, by which they saved several miles of travel. About noon, being completely used up, they went to a farm-house, and passing themselves off as Confederate soldiers received a good dinner. The benevolent old man, rebel sympathizer as he was, was so moved by their pitiable condition that he took a horse out of the plow, harnessed him to an old wagon, and sent them, with his boy for a driver, several miles to Mr. Burroughs's house. There they were kindly received, though Mr. Burroughs was evidently alarmed in view of the vengeance he might bring down upon himself for showing any sympathy with Union soldiers. About four miles above they could see a revenue cutter—the Howell Cobb—anchored opposite Pope's Creek. Watson's residence could also be seen on the shore. Colonel Hurd was impatient to reach the cutter. There was safety, rest, and the means of rejoining his company before they had a fight. Colonel Raynor was also very anxious to get on board the vessel, for they were still in the midst of rebels, who might at any moment seize them. Colonel Murphy, notwithstanding his awful sufferings, was determined not to break company with his companions.

They started, walking on the beach. But their progress was very slow and painful in the extreme. The oyster-shells and gravel hurt Colonel Murphy's feet so that once or twice he crawled over rough places on his hands and knees. Hurd, being much the strongest, proposed that he should hurry forward, get on board the vessel, and send a boat for his more exhausted comrades, who, in the mean time, were to hobble forward as fast as possible. Colonel Raynor generously remained behind to help his comrade, who was so fearfully crippled. The sun was but about an hour high when they set out from Mr. Burroughs's house, and the evening twilight was fading into darkness when Colonel Hurd left his companions.

It was quite dark before Hurd reached a point opposite the cutter. He hailed the boat and asked to be taken on board. The reply came back that they could not take him unless he told them who he was. He shouted out his story, pleading for himself and his comrades. It was all in vain. Colonel Hurd then asked if they would drop a line and take him on board if he would swim out to them. The cruel reply was, "If you come near the gunboat we will fire upon you." We fear that the response of Colonel Hurd was not couched in the most gentle terms.

In the mean time his comrades, toiling painfully along, after the lapse of half an hour, listened eagerly for the sound of oars coming to their relief. Disappointed, they crept slowly along, much of the time wading in the river, as the cool water was somewhat refreshing to their gory feet. Continuing on in this way, at nine o'clock at night they arrived opposite the vessel, which was anchored about a quarter of a mile out in the stream.

They could not imagine what had become of Hurd. It was evident that something had befallen him, for they knew that he was incapable of deserting them. They hallooed several times, but no responsive voice came back through the silence and darkness of the night. They hailed the revenue cutter, over which the Stars and Stripes were floating in the moonlight, but no answer was vouchsafed them. Soon they heard the grating of the chains as the anchor was uplifted, and saw the unfurling of the sails. They clapped their hands in excess of joy, believing that the cutter was coming to their rescue, and that in a few moments they would find themselves safe under the protection of that flag for which they had suffered so much.

What was their astonishment to behold the vessel, as her canvas filled with the evening breeze, sailing away up the stream! They gazed upon the receding boat in mute amazement and despair. "What can it mean? Is this all a dream?" they asked themselves over and over again. As they sat there in the gloom of night, and enveloped in the still deeper gloom of their own disappointment, they heard voices up the river, and walking a little distance they found some negroes engaged in night-fishing. To the question if they had seen a strange white man about during the evening one of the negroes replied:

"A white man came here, hail de ship, tell dem he a Cap'n, want to git aboard; jis den some of Massa Watson's men run down de bank to cotch him; but he drop his shoes an' run away from dem. I hear dem say up to de house dey no cotch him."

They further said that Massa Watson was going to run some goods over into Virginia as soon as the moon went down, and that the starting-place was from a marsh two miles below, where two large batteaux were hid. Raynor and Murphy, after anxious deliberation, determined to go back to Burroughs's house, thinking that Hurd would naturally strike for that as a place of safety. The negroes guided them to a dust-road, which they would find easier to their feet than the oyster-shell beach. Uncomplainingly these men of iron nerve and energy trudged alohg, when soon four large dogs rushed out upon them. A negro came running out from the house, and calling off the dogs, inquired, "Who is ye?" They replied, "We are anxious to get over into Virginia." "Well," said he, "if you will hurry along you can overtake Massa Watson, who, with a lot of men, will run some boats over as soon as the moon goes down. Come along," he continued, "and I go wid you." "No, no," Raynor replied. "You stay here and keep the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google dogs back, and we'll hurry on and overtake them."

The negro returned to the house, and they hid in a thicket until half an hour after the moon went down, when, concluding that "Massa Watson" was on his way across the river, they resumed their painful tramp, and reached Burroughs's about three o'clock in the morning. Mr. Burroughs (may God bless him!) rose from his sleep, took them in, gave them refreshments and a good bed. Weariness and exhaustion overcame the sense of pain, and they slept soundly. When they awoke in the morning the first object that met their eyes was the Howell Cobb, anchored in the stream opposite the house. A boat coming ashore, Colonels Raynor and Murphy were taken on board.

Captain Franks, in command, listened attentively to their story, and told them that he had heard their hail the night before, but believing it to be a decoy to get his men ashore, and knowing the neighborhood to be a dangerous one, he had weighed anchor and stood away. He did all he could to make amends for the misunderstanding, and treated them with the greatest humanity. Mrs. Frank wept at the sight of the inflamed, swollen, bleeding feet, and tenderly bathed them with her own sisterly hand. After partaking of a hasty breakfast Colonel Raynor was permitted, at his own earnest solicitation, to take a boat's crew and go ashore to hunt up their lost comrade. There were but six seamen on board the cutter, and Raynor was allowed to take two. As they were getting the boat ready a man was seen coming rapidly down the beach. It was Colonel Hurd. A boat was sent for him, and he was soon on board the cutter. They were now all safe. Their wonderful escape was accomplished—an escape, when viewed in all its aspects of sagacity, of endurance, of heroism, of unselfishness, can find but few parallels in the history of man.

Colonel Hurd confirmed the narrative of the negro. While hailing the vessel the night before, and shouting out his story, he was heard by Watson's men. They sprang down the bank to catch him, intending, doubtless, to carry him across the river in their boats and deliver him to the rebel authorities. As they rushed upon him, calling upon him to surrender, he dropped his shoes, darted between them, and in the darkness gained the woods, where he hid behind a log and slept till morning. He then worked his way back to Mr. Burroughs's, and was happily united with his companions beneath the folds of our national banner.

A steamer coming up the river, they were transferred to her. Opposite Acquia Creek the gun-boat Yankee, the flag-ship of the blockading fleet, under Commodore Craven, was at anchor. Commodore Craven and his officers, after carefully questioning the adventurers, received them with the utmost kindness. Hurd and Raynor were provided with socks for their feet, but none could be found large enough to cover the bloated mass into which Murphy's feet were swollen. The Commodore gave them a letter to Captain Dahlgren, Commandant of the Navy-yard at Washington, and sent his swiftest tug, the Resolute, to convey them to the city. Just at sundown on Saturday evening, September the 14th, the steamer reached Washington. As they stepped on shore Colonel Hurd turned to his companions and said, very impressively:

"Boys, I have lived twenty-seven days in the Rocky Mountains on mule's meat, with the snow four feet deep. But that was nothing to this!"

This frank admission, though coming so late, was gratefully appreciated by his comrades. Before the close of another week Murphy and Raynor were at their homes, and Colonel Hurd was with his company, ready for a fight.

Space will not allow us to trace out the subsequent career of these heroic men. Sublimer deeds of daring were never performed than by Colonel Hurd, at Chickamauga, and Colonel Raynor, on the Red River. At Harrison's Landing Colonel Murphy, with his accustomed energy and tact, rendered services which won the love of thousands ready to perish.

DIFFERENT POINTS OF VIEW.

Saith the white owl to the martin folk,
In the belfry tower so grim and gray:
"Why do they deafen us with these bells?
Is any one dead or born to-day?"

A martin peeped over the rim of its nest,
And answered, crossly: "Why, ain't you heard
That an heir is come to the great estate?"—
"I 'aven't," the owl said, "'pon my word."

Saith the snail so snug in his dappled shell,
Slowly stretching one cautious horn,
As the beetle was hurrying by so brisk,
Much to his Snailship's inward scorn:

"Why does that creature ride by so fast?
Has a fire broke out, to the east or west?"—
"Your Grace, he rides to the wedding-feast."—
"Let the madman go. What I want's rest."

The swallows around the woodman skimmed,
Poising and turning on flashing wing;
One said: "How liveth this lump of earth?
In the air, he can neither soar nor spring?

"Over the meadows we sweep and dart,
Down with the flowers, or up in the skies;
While these poor lumberers toil and slave,
Half-starved, for how can they catch their flies?"

Quoth the dry-rot worm to his artisans
In the carpenter's shop, as they bored away:
"Hark to the sound of the saw and file!
What are these creatures at work at—say?"

From his covered passage a worm looked out,
And eyed the beings so busy o'erhead:
"I scarcely know, my Lord; but I think They're making a box to bury their dead!"

Says a butterfly with his wings of blue
All in a flutter of careless joy,
As he talks to a dragon-fly over a flower:
"Ours is a life, Sir, with no alloy.

"What are those black things, row and row, Winding along by the new-mown hay?"
"That is a funeral," says the fly:
"The carpenter buries his son to-day."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR.

BY A VIRGINIAN.

[Fifth Paper.]

THE VALLEY OF THE SHENANDOAH.

February 22, 1861.—The prospect of immediate activity seems to have inspired every one. General Williams's brigade turned out in honor of the day, one rifle regiment, three of infantry, and two companies of cavalry, all in their gala attire and marching to spirited music, with a bright sky and genial atmosphere, combined to raise our spirits to the highest point of hopefulness.

As Colonel Donnelly sends an ambulance to Hagerstown to-morrow, I concluded to lie by for a day longer and accept the seat so politely offered.

In the afternoon refugees from Morgan brought reports that Jackson was again approaching by the Winchester road with eighteen thousand men. As the room next to that which I occupied had been perforated by a rebel shell during the former bombardment I took the precaution to put my baggage in order for a move; at the same time feeling convinced that the alarm was occasioned by the presence of a squad of horse-thieves in the vicinity of Berkeley, usually led by some of the States-Rights heroes furnished by Morgan to the Confederacy. At brigade head-quarters I found the same opinion prevailing, and also that a competent force had been sent to ambuscade these fellows in the mountains. I offered my services to lead any detachment that might be sent over to support the "liers in wait" in case of necessity, and was promised an opportunity should any occasion arise for such a movement. After which I went to bed and slept soundly until morning.

February 23.—Fair and mild. Yesterday's news turned out as expected—"ex nihilo nihil fit." Taking leave of my family and friends, I started for Hagerstown in Colonel Donnelly's ambulance. Two of my traveling companions were worthy farmers from the neighborhood of Niagara Falls, who had come on to visit their sons, soldiers in the Grand Army. At the Fairview House I found a party of Virginia loyalists, refugees from Berkeley County, endeavoring to soothe the sorrows of their exile by "seven up" and whisky, of which it seems "Old Virginia never tires." They stopped their game for a moment to reproach us of the military service for our inaction, and wanted to know "why the devil we did not advance and drive the rebels away from their homes?" which were in tantalizing sight from their present lodge. We arrived at Hagerstown about dark.

A BUSHWHACKER.

February 24.—This morning took the coach for Frederick, and by the way encountered a furious storm, which blew down trees and telegraph-poles and threatened to overturn our coach. On arriving at Frederick, about mid-day, I called at the head-quarters of General Banks to pay my respects. The General informed me that a movement on Winchester was in progress, and insisted that I should accompany his division. I told him of my engagements with General Birney; but as I felt myself more competent for usefulness in the Valley, I was willing to remain with him if General Birney could be satisfied. A direct order from the Commander-in-Chief of the army settled the question definitely, and I immediately set about equipping myself for the campaign. A visit to a Jew's slop-shop, and another to the Division Quarter-master, sufficed to put me in marching order.

February 25.—Clear and cold. Alexander Diffey arrived from Baltimore last night, with a pontoon train and eighty

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

cars for the transportation of troops to Harper's Ferry. Sedgwick moves from Poolsville, via Adamstown, with two brigades. Lander, from the vicinity of Cumberland, with twelve thousand men, moves eastward through Blooming Gap. Williams, with his brigade and other forces, concentrate at Martinsburg and march southward by the Valley turnpike; Banks, with the main body, moves southward via Harper's Ferry and Charlestown. This will concentrate twenty-seven thousand men and seventy-five guns in front of Winchester. At the same time the Grand Army in front of Washington will move decisively upon Manassas. This will bring matters to a speedy conclusion in Virginia; while the occupation of Nashville, and the reactionary movements reported in Tennessee, promise a speedy collapse of the rebellion in the West.

February 27.—Clear and cold. This morning I met General Banks on the street, and was informed that M'Clellan was at Harper's Ferry, and desired to see me immediately. Within fifteen minutes I was mounted and on the road. Passing through Jefferson, Petersville, and Knoxville, I arrived at Sandy Hook about midday; and there giving my horse in charge of a negro of General Banks's household, I sought the general head-quarters, in a large green passenger-car which stood upon the sideling. On entering I saw my friend, Captain B——, closely engaged in conversation with an officer whom I did not recognize. The stranger looked up, and immediately addressed me by name. "Ah, Mr. ——, I was this moment speaking of you, and wishing to see you." As he spoke I remarked the three stars glittering on his shoulder. So thin and pallid had his late attack of typhoid fever left him that I found difficulty in recognizing the person of the Commander-in-Chief as the same I had seen so fresh, florid, and vigorous on the Potomac Bluffs at Edward's Ferry.

The maps which he and Captain B—— had been examining were again spread, and I was invited to join the council. They had been discussing the question of the most available routes by which Lander and Williams might reach the main thoroughfare leading up the Valley. My local knowledge readily supplied the necessary information. The prompt, clear, and soldierly manner in which M'Clellan discussed the subject in hand showed that the fever had in no wise attainted the vigor of his mind. This examination concluded, I was presented to the officers of the general staff, a dozen or more of whom were present in the car. Among these were the French Princes De Joinville and his nephews Louis Philippe and Robert. The elder Prince De Joinville was a tall, slender person, stoop-shouldered, rather ungainly in his movements, and wearing a huge, ugly cap, which gave to him an air any thing but "distinguished." I should have taken him for a cattle-dealer, waiting an opportunity to have a talk with the commissary. The young men, who wore the shoulder-knots of captains, were slender, light-haired, frank-mannered, unassuming youths, in no way differing, either in appearance or manner, from our young Americans of the educated classes. Although but little influenced by names and titles, I could not suppress a feeling of admiring and sympathetic interest for these young men, Princes but in name. They were also the victims of a political revolution—exiles from home and country, scions of a brave race, who had volunteered to strike a blow for the cause of humanity and civilization, prompted, no doubt, by that manly and generous instinct that loves war and the companionship of great deeds; and doubtless, too, by some shrewd political foresight from beneath that great, ugly cap, which recognizes in the present movement the cause of the nineteenth century, and with a view to future possibilities perceives the utility of having made a mark on the right side. Decidedly the handsomest and most distinguished-looking officer present was a young Prussian, Baron Radovitz.

After accepting the hospitality of the car, agreeably dispensed by Colonel Astor of New York, I started out to look after my horse, and presently met with Colonel Clarke, of Banks's staff, and accompanied him across the pontoon bridge to the town of Harper's Ferry. Here was a vast heap of charred and crumbling ruin. The fine national arsenals, work-shops, railway-bridges, store-houses, hotels, and private dwellings all mingled in a common destruction. Winding up the hill we took possession of a deserted stable for our horses, and then found entertainment for ourselves in the house of a widow woman near by.

February 28.—Clear and cool. On rising this morning I walked over to Sandy Hook and reported to General M'Clellan, who requested me to meet him in half an hour at General Sedgwick's quarters in Harper's Ferry. Returning, I saddled my steed and repaired to the rendezvous, where I found the staff and escort in the saddle awaiting the advent of the Generals, who were at the moment within doors engaged in consultation. In half an hour we were in motion. The air was deliciously bracing, and the brilliant trappings of our cavalcade showed superbly in the clear sunlight. On reaching the summit of the Bolivar Heights, the view of the magnificent Valley elicited a general murmur of astonishment and admiration. This was the Valley of which I had so often boasted among my friends and comrades as the fairest land under the cope of heaven—the home and play-ground of my childhood, and endeared to me by many ties in later life; and it was with a glow of heart-felt satisfaction that I heard the full justification of my partiality from the lips of these distinguished strangers. I had been seven months in exile, and after the momentary burst of pleasure called forth by the view my mind was filled with varied and contending emotions.

I had my full share of Virginianism, and had

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

garnered up a store of pride respecting this beautiful region, whose attractions I always considered were a part of my birth-right. I admired the inhabitants with their genial hospitality and cultivated simplicity of character and manner. I was attached to the old customs that lingered pleasantly among the refinements of modern progress, indicating a retrospective dignity, like those antiquated and moss-covered mansions that we sometimes see, still standing amidst the crude splendor of our fresh-built cities. And while my judgment might acquiesce in the unanswerable logic of Northern humanitarians and political economists, in regard to the "peculiar institution," it was not from this favored region that either would have chosen to draw illustrations wherewith to enforce their appeals or point their arguments. I had lived my life in its midst, and knew that, like all other phases of human society, it had its lights as well as shadows. Every hill and dale, every house with its barns and cabins. The faces of the negroes as they came out to stare at our sweeping cavalcade. The soft, broad accent of the voices we heard by the way-side, were all so touchingly familiar, and carried me back so far among the good old peaceful times that I would momentarily forget my surroundings. Then the clash of our swinging sabres or the gleam of a marching column of bayonets would rend this haze of softening thought, like sharp lightning through a gilded cloud—with a flash of fierce and bitter realization now it was war—cruel and wasting war, destructive of property and life. Well, time and industry will soon restore the former, and we must all die sooner or later, but what time will restore the scattered household gods, the riven bonds of society, the blighted honor, violated oaths, the overthrown respect for all sacred things, human and divine?—when will the fires of fraternal hate be quenched, and the darker malignity of party-spirit, that seeks a vengeance deeper than death? And with this contrasting of the past and present comes the hot tide of indignation against those unscrupulous and besotted demagogues who had most wickedly and stupidly brought all these woes upon this once innocent and happy region. But the soul that is armed in a great cause must be proof against all weaknesses, whether of sentiment or passion. Let us look to the work in hand.

As we rode through Charlestown I met and exchanged congratulations with several friends whose loyalty had been hardy enough to survive the seven months' darkness. The main street was lined with the National infantry, who, with bands playing and colors flying, saluted the commander as we passed. It was a glorious hour for me, and for some others who had looked for the coming with an abiding faith. There were many also—anxious waiters on the tide of circumstance—who met us with smiling faces and a ready welcome, as our coming afforded relief from the ever-impending terror of conscription, of forced loans of money and material, and a currency, to say the least, very suspicious. Yet in the general condition of the popular mind I was grievously disappointed. The seven months of undisputed rebel sway had done its work with astonishing completeness. The first-born of every family was in the ranks of the rebellion. The pockets of every sharp attorney and local official and general speculator were filled with rebel scrip, gorgeous with showy vignettes and high figures. Every anxious and plodding farmer had his greasy wallet swelled with vouchers signed by officers of the C. S. A., for horses, cattle, and grain, furnished voluntarily, under pain of death or confiscation. With a devilish skill the Richmond conspirators had sounded and turned all the sentiments, passions, and interests that govern mankind to their service. Where lures, tricks, and falsehoods failed to accomplish the purpose, violence and terror succeeded. But willing or unwilling, entrapped or seized, dupes or victims, all were now marked alike with the fatal brand—C. S.

What first struck me was the seedy and old-fashioned appearance of the people. The dial-hand of fashion had not stood still with them, but had gone back, by the enforced resumption of the wardrobes of former years cast off and packed away. Next was the expression of their countenances, where the free, frank, and kindly air, warm with jovial good-living and insouciance, was succeeded by the haggard impress of terror, anxiety, and suspicion. This struck me most painfully in my intercourse with old personal friends, who had remained firm and unchanged in their loyalty. My vehement and unreserved expression of our common wishes and opinions seemed to fill them with alarm. When they ventured to speak, in an undertone, there was an anxious scanning of windows and doors, a nervous whispering and taking you aside, when none were present. Yet these were the truest and the boldest, who had never bent the knee to Baal—and this while the Union armies thronged the roads and occupied all the surroundings. I had seen this same thing in Naples during the reign of the Bourbons, and in Venetia during the darkest days of Austrian domination; but to find it here, among my own once independent and free-spoken people, shocked me inexpressibly, and revealed more clearly than all else I had seen and heard how remorseless and arrogant had been the despotism which, in so brief a period, had left such impress upon the souls of brave and free citizens.

As I conversed more generally with acquaintances I was equally amazed to hear the monstrous stories of all sorts that had obtained credence. The prosperity of the North had already withered, the voices of its factories were hushed, commerce lay rotting at the wharves—the silence of the once busy streets broken only by howling mobs demanding bread. Then, in regard to the conduct and character of the National troops, there was nothing too absurd or impossible to find easy belief. But of all subjects on which the passionate credulity of the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google people had been exercised the story of their victories was the favorite. Common-sense and possibilities were not allowed to enter into the composition of their beliefs in the smallest degree. It robbed the choicest dishes of all flavor. The affair at Ball's Bluff, as I had foreseen, had made the most decided and mischievous impression. The exaggerations were ludicrous in the extreme. Some believed that the navigation of the Potomac had been impeded by the thousands of dead Yankees that choked its current; and others piously hoped that, with the opening of the warm weather, the stench of this mass of bodies would breed a pestilence in Washington and clean out the Yankee Government. With all this nonsense one is continually exercised between pity and laughter. Graver thoughts were suggested when, coming in contact with more methodical minds, I perceived how rapidly we had been drifting in opposite directions, and how wide the gulf of opinion had become.

On the glady levels that characterize the dividing ridge of the Alleghany Mountains are many swamps and ponds which are the sources of numerous rivulets that meander aimlessly through these pleasant highlands, as they glide along, turned hither and thither by a breath of air, a hillock of grass, a fallen tree, or some like trifling accident, their gentle currents flowing eastward or westward as this seeming chance may determine. Their volume swells as they progress; their current becomes more rapid, their course more decided, their soft, tinkling voices changed to a hoarse and clamorous roar. No weak impediment turns them now, but, sweeping earth and trees with their force, they cut themselves eternal channels through the solid rock. Still onward, gathering tributary power, they presently become great rivers, modeling the topography of continents, bearing the wealth of nations. And so we may curiously conceive that of a drop of water splitting upon a blade of grass, part may in time find its way through the deep mountain channels of the Monongahela, between the fair and fertile bluffs of the Ohio, the dark swamps and cane-brakes of the Mississippi, to mingle with the salt waters of the Mexican Gulf, and play its part amidst tropical hurricanes. The other globule, divided from its brother by that small incident, through the picturesque vales of the Susquehanna or Potomac, finds its way to the Atlantic Ocean, and thence, by winds and currents, to the fog-banks and icebergs of Newfoundland. Thus it is with the course of opinion. We are nurtured at the same breast; we drink from the same cup, and read in the same book; we discuss the signification of a word, and argue about the color of a hair. We divide on a blade of grass; we drift apart; each thinks the other deviating, perverse, absurd. Then comes the sweep and power of passion, and in the end we are as far apart as the frigid and the torrid zones. Thus I find it with some fair-reasoning minds, which in the muddle of opinion a year ago mixed cordially with mine, scarce divided by the breadth of a hair. There is an awful gulf between us now, and it needs be that we have both drifted and will continue to drift. Montesquieu takes the more hopeful and kindlier view when he says: "Men are never so absurd or so wicked as they think each other—they simply misunderstand each other."

A pleasant incident, in verification of this, occurred to-day. Seeing a clergyman of my acquaintance on the street, apparently in great haste, I hailed him and asked what was the matter. He had scarcely breath to answer and invoke my assistance. The soldiers were occupying his church, and he was filled with apprehensions of spoliation and desecration. On entering the church we found it occupied by Colonel Ruger's Minnesota regiment. Some of the men, under the direction of the officers, were taking up the carpets—for what purpose the good man did not know. I commended him to the officer, and he begged that he might be permitted to remove the Bible, lamps, and other pulpit furniture, to a place of safety. The request was courteously granted; when a new horror burst upon the alarmed pastor. A crowd of rude bearded and belted fellows had got into the gallery, and were engaged in opening the organ and fumbling among the books of sacred music. With an agonized look the clergyman exclaimed to the commander: "I hope, Sir, you will not permit them to destroy it!" The officer smiled, and quietly replied: "They will not injure it, Sir." A moment of silence was followed by a voluntary prelude, played with admirable taste and skill; then a hundred rich and manly voices took up a strain of sacred music, so grand and solemn that we involuntarily took off our hats. It was curious to see the pastor's face as his look of anxiety changed to one of astonishment, and then settled into a smile of devotional calmness. When the hymn was finished he turned to the officer, and said: "I perceive it will not be necessary to move the furniture, Sir;" and so left the church in peace. It is to be regretted, however, that in many other instances a closer acquaintance did not tend to remove existing prejudices, but rather to aggravate them.

While the commanders rode forward to view the roads and positions in front of the village I dropped back to enjoy an hour's intercourse with my friends who for the last year had been confined in this political bedlam. Here I was beset from all quarters with applications for protection of property, restoration of seized horses, and release of prisoners. Believing it better for the cause and the service that all unnecessary and unauthorized oppression should be avoided, I readily undertook these cases. The Generals, meanwhile, satisfied with their reconnoissance, rode back to Harper's Ferry, whither I followed them later in the afternoon. I here reported to General Banks the result of my observations, and the information I had obtained at Charlestown. I was confirmed in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

surmises respecting the moral and military weakness of the Confederacy, and had information, which I conceived positive, that Winchester would be abandoned on the approach of our troops without a fight. In short, that there was not in the Valley any adequate force to dispute our advance. This information was considered so important that General Banks proposed that I should deliver it in person to M'Clellan.

We accordingly rode over the river by the pontoon bridge, and spent an hour painfully threading the mazes of railway and forage trains which crowded the Maryland shore, searching in vain for the green car. We were at length informed that the Commander-in-Chief had left for Washington. I was greatly disappointed, for I deemed the information both important and reliable. We turned our horses' heads for the Ferry, and, in spite of the bitter and blasting wind that cut our faces and dimmed our eyes, I could not but look with interest on the scenes through which we rode. The whole level bench between the mountain and canal, extending from Weverton to the Ferry bridge, was one mass of railway trains, engines, forage wagons, and mules—the animals and machines vying with each other in their horrible yelling and braying. Mountains of forage and commissary stores lay piled beside the trains; while groups of teamsters, negroes, quarter-masters' clerks, and train guards, cooking, sleeping, or dancing, huddled around the numerous fires that lighted this chaotic picture. Below, the river flashed and roared in unison with the noisy and restless world; above, rose the impending cliffs of naked rock, so high they seemed to touch the frosty stars, looking cold, silent, and fixed as destiny.

March 1.—I rose this morning before the sun, and to escape the frosty air entered the room where my hostess was preparing breakfast. There, the better to warm my hands, I laid my new gloves upon the table. At the moment some soldiers of a Rhode Island battery entered ostensibly for the purpose of getting a drink of water. I turned to call the woman to serve them, and when I came again the visitors were gone and my gloves had disappeared with them. On repairing to head-quarters I found the information of the previous evening under discussion. From the experiences of Patterson's campaign it was apprehended that the reverse game might be played on our column, and instead of reinforcing Manassas from Winchester, a wily enemy might evade the overwhelming power of M'Clellan, and reinforcing Winchester from Manassas, concentrate his whole force and crush us before we could be supported. My information in regard to the state of affairs at Winchester was twenty-four hours old. There might have been changes in the mean time. Could I get a trusty messenger to visit Winchester and bring us the latest tidings? I promised to do so, and immediately after breakfast rode back to Charlestown. Along the route I observed the country covered with our stragglers helping themselves. Almost every man I saw had a pig or a leg of mutton upon his bayonet, or a pair of chickens in his haversack. Besides the seizing and cooking this dainty plunder with fence rails I did not observe any ill-natured or wanton disturbance of the inhabitants or property.

Arrived in Charlestown, I cast about to secure an agent to visit Winchester on the business spoken of at head-quarters. It was useless to think of applying to any white man for such service. The few who in their hearts were faithful to the National cause lived in terror even in the midst of our armies, and being "spotted," as they significantly phrased it, could not have passed beyond our lines with safety. Those who were not with us from principle could not be relied on under any circumstances. Indeed it was impossible to find men willing to take any risks for a Government which thus far had manifested neither the power nor the disposition to protect its friends nor to punish its enemies. The negroes I knew were both faithful and willing, and, strange to say, were trusted on the other side with a persistence that amounted to fatuity. While every white man's motions and actions were watched with a most jealous scrutiny, the negroes were permitted to run hither and thither as if they had been merely domestic animals not fit to eat.

This was the Southern theory, and they acted in accordance with it throughout. Yet singularly enough the negro in his simplicity, his unlettered ignorance, his servile seclusion, seemed to have clearer and more comprehensive views of the upshot of this great question than either of the free, educated, and enlightened contestants. Blinded and inflamed by the madness of partisan politics the white man spurns away the patent facts that encumber his path and tramples common-sense under his feet, taking counsel only of his excited passions or conceited theories. The humble negro, gathering the crumbs that fall from his master's table, finds enough to satisfy him. There is scarcely an officer in our division who will acknowledge or believes that he is warring for the abolition of negro slavery. The Southern people, on the other hand, talk and act as if they had no idea that such a thing could be accomplished by any power human or divine. They are buying and selling at high prices. They don't believe the negroes will accept the boon of freedom if offered. They are actually running them off South on the approach of our armies. It reminds one of Jonah fleeing from the presence of God. The negro knows this war is for his liberation, and has implicit faith in its accomplishment.

So if I want a faithful emissary I must find a negro with sufficient arithmetic to know the difference between a hundred and a thousand, and sufficient military knowledge to avoid mistaking a forge or a caisson for a cannon. Presently I bethought me of a sharp fellow, who I knew had attempted to escape Northward a year ago, and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HOW THE IDEA GOT INTO THEIR HEADS.

had been arrested and brought back. I sent for him upon some trifling pretext, and taking him aside thus addressed him:

"F——, I know you have long had a hankering for freedom."

"That I have, master," said he, his face lighting with an eager smile.

"That which you have so long wished for you can earn in two days if you have the nerve to follow my orders."

"What are they to be, master?" replied F——, in a dubious tone.

"I wish you to go to Winchester to-night, and with your own eyes and your own ears find out how many men are there; how many cannon, how they are posted; what they think of us, and what they intend to do when we advance. Ascertain all this, and return here with the information as soon as possible."

My man's countenance fell as terror superseded hope. "It is more than my life is worth to do that. They would hang me certain."

"Then you are not the man I took you for. You have not the pluck to grasp the fortune that is offered to you, and are not worth the trouble the white folks are taking on your account."

The fellow had spirit enough to feel this reproach. "But what good," said he, "will my freedom do me if I am caught and hung?"

"Well, it is even better to die like a man than live like a dog." Saying this, I turned away as if to give up the negotiation.

"Master," exclaimed F——, with a struggling voice, "if I go, how about my wife and children?"

"They shall be free."

"And if I come back safe with the news?"

"They shall be free, and you shall have a sum of money to take them away and establish them where you please."

"I'll go, Sir! I'll go!"

I impressed more particularly upon him the points I wished him to observe, and with a pass to carry him through the National picket lines he started on his adventurous journey.

Although up to this date the Government of the United States had disavowed all intention of interfering directly with the institution of slavery, and had even removed officers from high command whose impatient zeal had ventured boldly to attack the system, yet it was evident to me that the current of opinion was setting so strongly in that direction that the Government would presently be forced to acquiesce in its overthrow, if not openly to provide measures for its accomplishment. In many conversations which I had had with General Banks on this subject I deprecated any direct interference with the subject, as tending only to aggravate the difficulties in which the sections, and especially the Border States, were involved.

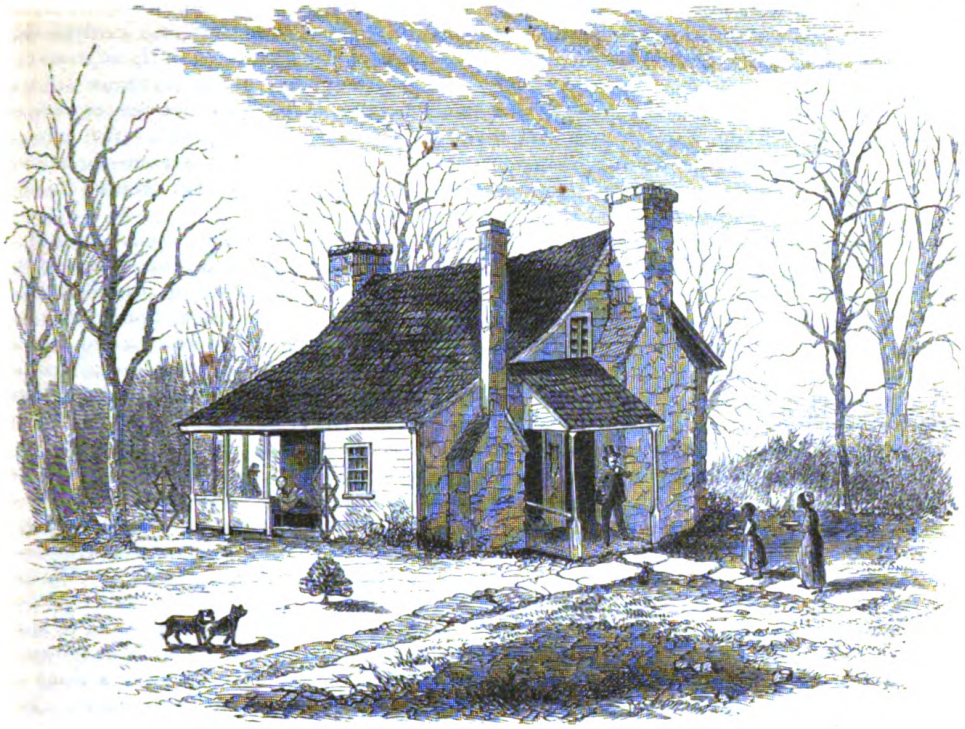
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

In its determination to sustain the national unity the Government would be supported by the people of the Northern and Middle States en masse, by a large fighting majority in most of the Border States, and by a large and influential, though apparently inert, party in the heart of the Confederacy itself. An open declaration of war against slavery at this time would at once destroy the unanimity of the North, both in political and military circles; would revolutionize loyal opinion in the Border States; and entirely crush that latent conservatism in the South, upon which all hopes of future peace and unity were founded.

Yet I had made up my mind long ago that the annihilation of slavery was to be the inevitable event of the war. And if in former times I had warmly defended it against the injudicious attacks of fanatical ideologists and ignorant intermeddlers, it was because it was recognized and maintained by the Government of the country, and it was evident that any unauthorized disturbance of so great an interest must bring on civil war with enormous evils in its train. Although educated in abhorrence of that school of politics which made slavery and the South its corner-stone, I was willing to acquiesce in evils and abuses as they existed rather than rush upon those we knew not of. But when that wretched party, drunk with passion and besotted with presumption, undertook to destroy our common Government and forced this bloody and disastrous civil war upon the nation, I considered the dreadful price already paid, and determined, as far as my action and influence would go, to exact the full consideration. Public and private interest alike demanded the extinction of slavery. Without any proclamations or general orders on the subject, it is quite well understood at head-quarters that behind the Army of the Shenandoah slavery is practically wiped out. To-day general head-quarters are established in Charlestown. It is pleasant enough to meet old friends; but I do not like this delay. We should have been in Winchester to-day instead of in Charlestown.

March 2.—I am beset to-day, as usual, with petitions for protection, passes, and prisoners. Too many people are permitted to run through the lines on various pretexts. To-day all passes are refused. The General has just received information that Lander's column is about to engage the enemy at Mill Spring Gap, in Berkeley County. A forward movement on our part is imminent to support Lander or create a diversion. None was ordered, however, and at night I again reported at head-quarters. General Banks seemed anxious and perplexed at having no recent tidings from Winchester. I had no later news, but reiterated my belief that no addition had been made to the forces there, and no resistance was practicable at that point to the force we had to carry against it. The facility with which the army in the Valley could be reinforced from Manassas seemed always the disturbing idea that weighed upon the General's mind. I started to walk down street again. The General, still restless, proposed to walk with me.

As we descended from the porch we met two soldiers with fixed bayonets bringing in a prisoner. The man called my name. It was my messenger returned from Winchester. We immediately retired with him to a private room. The report was eminently satisfactory. He informed us that all the stores and heavy guns had already been removed to Strasburg; that the fortifications were dismantled, the principal citizens flying Southward with their families and movable property; and, in short, every indication of an intention to abandon Winchester on our advance. The number of troops under Jackson's command he estimated at seven or eight thousand of all arms, with thirty pieces of light artillery. These guns were placed in battery commanding the different roads entering Winchester from Berryville, Martinsburg, Pughtown, and Romney; but the great excitement and movement of troops, he said, was on the Pughtown road. This we knew was caused by Lander's erratic movement. My man had walked to Winchester, twenty-two miles, made all these intelligent observations, procured a pass from Jackson's Provost-Marshal to carry some clothes to his young master in the rebel cavalry, on observation at Berryville, twelve miles distant; delivered the aforesaid clothes; told a variety of monstrous stories about the Yankee armies, suitable to the occasion; and then returned to Charlestown, twelve miles further—all in little more than twenty-four hours. In home phraseology, "This was pretty well for a nigger." The promised reward was made good to the letter by the order of the commanding General.



March 3.—Raining. A marauding scoundrel of a cavalryman stole my India-rubber over-coat. May it prove a "shirt of Nessus" to him!

I made a diagram of Winchester and surroundings, with the troops and guns posted according to my messenger's report last night. I showed it to Generals Banks and Hamilton, and hope an immediate advance will be ordered. We have news that Lander's movement is stopped, and the General himself quite sick.

March 4.—On reporting at head-quarters this morning I was introduced to the Council of War. Generals Sedgwick, Hamilton, Burns, and Gorman, Colonel Tompkins, Major Perkins, and Captain Best were present. Maps, topographical plans, and latest information were discussed, but nothing definite resolved upon. They seemed to be waiting to hear from M'Clellan.

March 5.—Lander is dead. There seemed to have been a continual misunderstanding between him and M'Clellan, and, considering the character and positions of the two men, it could scarcely have been otherwise. In the present plan of movement Lander had been ordered to Martinsburg by the nearest route, and instead of obeying, he moved directly for Winchester

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LOCUST GROVE.

by way of Mill Spring Gap, and sent us word he expected a battle there. M'Clellan meanwhile sent a hasty and positive order to stop him. It reached him in time to prevent the expected fight. Next day he fell sick and the day following he died. The doctors differed as to the immediate cause of his death. One said it was from the wound received at Edward's Ferry; another supposed it was from exhaustion, the consequence of over-excitement and exertion; a third intimated it was from an overdose of morphine, taken accidentally. I am sorry for my part that he did not get a clip at Jackson. I think he would have given him an infernal thrashing. I met General Shields on his way to take command of Lander's Division. Shields looks older than when I last saw him, but is full of fire still. They fear at Washington that Winchester may be reinforced from Manassas via Snicker's or Berry's Ferry. I gave Shields a sketch of the roads leading to Winchester. A courier brings news of the occupation of Bunker's Hill by General Williams after a skirmish, in which he captured half a dozen prisoners.

March 6.—Variable. Troops are still moving forward. The New York Ninth passed through Charlestown in columns of companies, making a fine appearance. As the roads were opened by the advance of our lines I rode out to see some of my friends in the country. At Locust Grove I met a welcome as manly and cordial as if the eight months of bitter, civil war had never been. Here were the old barn, the white-washed cottage dwelling, and the negro cabins all unchanged as I had seen them in the happiest days of my boyhood. The negroes and negrolings of the present generation looked in all respects the same as those I had seen there thirty years ago. And the master, a worthy representative of the most large-hearted, true, and generous race I have ever known. The neighborhood had not escaped annoyance from the soldiers; but with characteristic carelessness of his own losses and troubles, my friend's whole care seemed to be for his neighbors. The Widow ——, whose corn was seized, and poor old Mr. ——, whose horses were pressed, and worthy Mrs. ——, whose son was a prisoner.

The gravity of his surroundings had by no means quenched his perception of the humorous, as the following anecdote may attest. A picket of Van Allen's cavalry had quartered near his house. One day a mounted vidette came riding in with staring eyes, and reported that he had been fired on from the house of one Wright, near which he was stationed; the ball whistled near his head, and he saw the bushwhacker afterward creeping through the thicket with gun in hand endeavoring to get another shot at him. The house was of course condemned to be burned; but before the order was executed inquiry developed the following facts: An infantry soldier of one of the Massachusetts regiments was prowling about seeking what he might devour. He presently drew a bead on a sheep, missed it, and narrowly grazed the trooper's head. Perceiving the proximity of a mounted picket, he endeavored to sneak away unseen, and hence the alarm.

Before returning to town I rode over the country paying several visits, and conversing

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437 freely with the inhabitants. The people and the army do not understand each other, and hence most of our difficulties. The inhabitants have been led to believe that the army was a horde of Cossacks and Vandals, whose mission was to plunder, destroy, murder, and lord it over the land without mercy or remorse. Hence they are received with distrust and terror, and their slightest disorders magnified into monstrous and menacing crimes. The soldiers, on the other hand, thought they were entering a country where every house was a trap and every thicket a masked battery. In every man they saw a concealed enemy, a spy, or assassin; and in every woman a furious spitfire and perhaps a poisoner. Mutual acquaintance and an interchange of courtesies will soothe and do much toward obliterating these prejudices, the result of reckless political partisan teachings. There is no foundation for this war among the people—neither in their interests nor their feelings.
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

March 7.—There was a terrible stampede last night on our left near Kabletown. A squadron of the First Michigan Cavalry was sent out to relieve the infantry picket belonging to Colonel Maulsby's Maryland regiment. As the cavalry approached they were fired into by the guard, killing one man and three horses. The fire was hastily returned, and both parties took to their heels, creating an alarm equal to that which brought on the famous "Battle of the Kegs." Fugitives from the Maryland regiment reported they had been attacked and their pickets driven in by a large force of cavalry. The troopers came in at full speed, saying that large bodies of infantry were moving on our position, and had already destroyed or captured the Maryland regiment. The combined report in the morning was, that a regiment of infantry and a squadron of cavalry had been surprised and cut to pieces during the night. This choice morceau was greedily swallowed and keenly relished by the secession element until the return of the Second Massachusetts, which had been sent to the scene of trouble, dissipated the illusion.

The Dutch caterer for the staff mess went to the country on a foraging expedition, and having found some fowls to his mind, offered the proprietor a United States Treasury note in payment. The rebellious citizen refused the proffered money with great contempt, saying, as he thrust it back:

"No, I don't want your damned Yankee trash."

"Vel," replied the cool campaigner, "I do vant, very much, dese secesh chickens—zo I dakes 'em;" and repocketing the despised currency he lifted the fowls and departed.

As a general thing, however, and in spite of the unavoidable irregularities attending the movements of armies, there seems already to be a notable improvement in the tone of feeling between the soldiers and citizens, and the friendliness is increasing from day to day. If the military question were satisfactorily disposed of there would presently be a sweeping reaction in favor of the Government; for notwithstanding the astonishing reticence of those most deeply implicated in the revolution, there are many unmistakable indications that the experiences of the first year of King Jeff's reign have not been of a character fully to sustain the enthusiastic hopes and promises that cheered its opening scenes.

March 8.—Fair and mild. Society was thrown into a ferment to-day by the advent of a wagon-load of negroes, composed of several families, with their household goods and plunder en route for a free country. They were halted for half an hour before the Provost-Marshal's office, and then passed on to Harper's Ferry. Since our occupation of the country negro men have never ceased to flock into our lines, and, as a matter of military police, were arrested and confined in the county jail, which was used as a guard-house. They were here held and maintained to prevent the nuisance of so many unrecognized loafers in our camps. Without any authority or wish to return them to their owners, the General was embarrassed to know how to dispose of them. The Quarter-master at Harper's Ferry had demanded a detail of men to load and unload army stores. This seemed to afford a solution of the difficulty. The blacks were marched in squads to Harper's Ferry, and set to work, earning their bread and beans in Uncle Sam's service. This looked ominous; but as these refugees were only males, it was thought probable they would presently become disgusted with the work and rations at Harper's Ferry, and return voluntarily to their homes and families. These calculations were founded on knowledge; for the idea of freedom from work predominates in the negro's brain at this time. But the sight of this family of emigrants, with its household goods and gods, passing northward unchecked, could not be misunderstood. Hitherto the negroes who had gone went light-handed and as fugitives; now the exodus has commenced in open day, laden with the spoils of the Egyptians. The sensation created is profound. The land utters a smothered groan and curses deep, which would be louder but for the presence of military power. Even the professed Union people meet us now with clouded faces, and the growing friendliness of the inhabitants has received a chilling check.

There is a good deal of murmuring among our own men and officers. They say they did not leave their homes to fight for the liberation of the negroes. The Government had professed that it had no intention of meddling with that subject. Their cause was "National Unity," and that alone. They did not wish to see it complicated with indifferent or mischievous questions.

This incident reveals the real subject of difficulty between the sections. The sentiment of Christendom demands Abolition. That party at the North which tolerated and protected Slavery heretofore is becoming more and more fee-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ble. On the other hand, Southern sentiment has become gangrenous on the subject. They submit to all other losses with exemplary patience. The death of their brethren and children on the battle-field is regarded as a dispensation of Providence, and borne with Christian resignation. They will even discuss their favorite doctrine of State Sovereignty with moderation and liberality. They do not assert it so arrogantly as they did a year ago. But the slightest rub upon this black tumor drives them frantic. They seem at once to lose all traces of common-sense, decency, and discretion. It is both painful and humiliating to listen to the atrocious nonsense that is put forth on this subject. After having convinced himself and every one around him that the advent of the Yankee army brings robbery, rape, and murder in its train, at the first intimation of an advance our estimable citizen, etc., abandons his terror-stricken family, his houses and lands, his cattle and crops, and endeavors to escape to some place of safety with half a dozen miserable niggers, sources of continual anxiety, expense, and irritation. Casting every other interest to the winds, disregarding every natural tie, he seems content if he can manage to hide his smutty idols for a few weeks or a few months longer from the Yankee invaders, whose sole business in making war on the South is to steal away this valuable property. Nothing but long-continued indulgence in partisan malignity could have brought a once fair-minded and enlightened people to such a point of mental degradation.

I have been continually hoping against conviction that by some turn of affairs there might be a speedy termination of this ruinous and unnecessary war. I now perceive how futile have been these hopes. I know that this war can not end except by the abolition of Slavery. It is equally evident the South will not surrender it while there is a drop of blood in her veins. "Ephraim is joined to his idols, let him alone."

March 9.—Yesterday it was proposed to make a reconnoissance to Berryville, and I had expected to accompany it. To-day I hear that two brigades of infantry and a regiment of cavalry have gone forward. I am annoyed at not having been informed of it in time. We received news from Old Point of the sinking of the United States frigates Congress and Cumberland by the rebel iron-clad steamer Merrimac. The Secessionists are chuckling as if the United States Navy was destroyed.

March 10.—Our reconnoitring force have occupied Berryville, and advanced thence toward Winchester as far as the Opequan, without finding any other enemy than a few cavalry pickets. Our army trains and reserve batteries are in motion toward Berryville, but there are as yet no moving orders for the staff. Our secession friends have news of a great fight raging somewhere. They go out to hear the cannon, and meet together in little knots, discussing flank movements, grand strategy, and falling back on somewhere, with a rebel victory and a slaughter of Yankees to complete the feast.

March 11.—Made my preparations for a move, and reported at head-quarters. Perceiving there was no movement there, I asked and obtained permission to go to the front. Colonel Clarke of the staff and myself rode to Berryville together. Shortly afterward Captain Abert, with the Topographical party, came in and established himself in comfortable quarters, which, with the freedom of old companionship, I shared with him. As we were about retiring for the night a message was received from General Banks requesting us to meet him at a point indicated about midway between Charlestown and Berryville.

The Captain was too unwell to turn out; but I got ready, and, accompanied by Luce, started for the rendezvous. The moon shone bright, the air was calm and temperate, and altogether the night was impressively beautiful. The white tents of Abercrombie's brigade looked silent and dreary as a mist upon the water, and rows of half-spent fires, with an occasional twinkle of moonlight upon the bayonet of a sentinel, indicated where the troops were lying on either side of the road. We cantered gayly along the fine turnpike, until halted by the sharp challenge of a mounted sentinel. I rode forward alone and, with his cocked pistol at my breast, gave the countersign, and we were permitted to continue our gallop until we passed the five-mile post. There, in a wood, we saw a number of men and horses grouped around a fire. As we approached an officer came out and halted us. It was Captain D'Hautville, Aid to General Banks. I immediately dismounted and joined the circle of consulting officers. General Banks informed me that M'Clellan occupied Manassas, the enemy having precipitately abandoned the place on his approach. The question of our movement upon Winchester was discussed. There seemed to be no probability that we should find an enemy there; but by a rapid forced march directly from Berryville to Strasburg we might catch Jackson, or at least some of the stores he had been moving at his leisure from Winchester during the last ten days. General Banks seemed annoyed at the idea of Jackson's escaping unscathed; but the council presently broke up, as usual, without determining upon any thing. General Banks and attendants rode back to Charlestown, while we accompanied General Sedgwick to Berryville. The remainder of the night was passed in sweet and dreamless sleep.

March 12.—Fair and temperate. After an old-fashioned Topographical breakfast we had a visit from Colonel Clarke, who was in search of quarters for the Commanding General and staff. I hope this does not indicate that we are to spend any time here. About nine o'clock I called at General Sedgwick's quarters, and while there information was brought that Generals Williams and Hamilton were in Winchester. This created an excitement, and seeing

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

UNION PEOPLE.

Colonel Brodhead at the head of a squadron of cavalry, I proposed we should ride forward. He consented, and with his staff and escort we started toward Winchester. We were welcomed with many demonstrations of joy by the inhabitants along the route. There seemed to be a great deal of Union sentiment among the middle and lower classes, but no cambric handkerchiefs nor national flags were waved from the better class of mansions. On entering Winchester we found the town alive with negroes and Federal soldiers; the crowd very sparsely sprinkled with white citizens. The houses generally were sealed up, both doors and windows, yet several were decorated with the Union colors, and their open windows crowded with ladies and children waving handkerchiefs and throwing bouquets. These demonstrations delighted both officers and soldiers.

We rode directly through the town and took the street leading to the Romney road, intending to take our quarters at Senator Mason's house. On coming in sight of it we perceived the United States flag waving from the portico, and understood that we had been anticipated. Turning aside, the Colonel observed a pretty residence which seemed to be unoccupied. We dismounted, and our knock was presently answered by an old-fashioned Virginia negro servant. To my surprise the major-domo saluted me by name, and I ascertained the house belonged to some dear friends then absent on a visit to the lower part of the State. Every thing had a comfortable air, so we made ourselves at home without further ceremony. After rest and refreshment we called to see General Shields, who was already in town. We found him lying down, suffering apparently from exhaustion; but he received us cordially, and we presently got into an animated conversation. The General told us some characteristic anecdotes of Jeff Davis, whom he knows well and despises. He says the Secessionists made a fatal mistake in placing Davis at the head of their movement. He is a narrow-minded martinet in military matters, and will sacrifice the cause to his vindictive prejudices and obstinacy. He is entirely wanting in that comprehensiveness of view and personal magnanimity essential in the leader of a great revolution.

On the street I have seen a number of my old acquaintances of secession proclivities, who refugeed from the northern tier of counties at the first burst of war. They say that for the last six months life in Winchester has been insufferable, and they determined to remain within our lines at the risk of hanging, rather than follow the fortunes of the Confederacy further South, as many others have done through folly and terror. I advised these people to return to their homes, and if they had committed no especial outrages against their neighbors they would not be disturbed.

March 13. — Clouds. General Banks and staff arrived to-day and established head-quarters in town. The advance of Williams and Hamilton yesterday by the Martinsburg road was not contested except by some irregular cavalry, with whom they exchanged a few shots at long taw. Our cavalry rushed suddenly into the town, and thus captured a few stragglers — not unwilling ones perhaps; but of supplies and ordnance stores the enemy has left nothing beyond half a dozen cannon-balls and several bushels of old shoes and rags. As I was lounging down street a lady in black issued from one of the closed and contumacious houses, and in a manner betokening suppressed agitation inquired if she could by any possibility get a letter to her son in Richmond. I told her a letter might be sent by way of Fortress Monroe, and offered to forward it for her. She thanked me, and then asked some news of the war. I told her Manassas was occupied by M'Clellan, and Johnston had retired behind the Rappahannock without a fight. She asked, with sudden vivacity, "Is that true, Sir?" I replied the news was official. I thought she would have fallen on the steps as she exclaimed, with a look of agony, "Good God! then Jackson is cut off!" I thought it quite probable, and turned to leave, while my fair questioner regained the door and entered, closing it after her.

I rode alone upon the hills overlooking the town, and inspected the fortifications upon which we have speculated so much during the past winter. I was profoundly grieved and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

mortified to see what mole-hills had been imposed upon our excited imaginations for impassable mountains. On the hills were the platforms of several heavy guns, flanked and protected by detached lines of rifle-pits, which I rode over with as little difficulty as I would have found in clearing the gutters of a highway. The only thing like a regular work was a very small redoubt on the Martinsburg road, which commanded that road, but was a trifling obstruction, easily knocked to pieces by field-artillery, and very easily turned and avoided, as the country was open and practicable in every direction. Our deserter, S——, of Patterson's campaign, gave a very accurate description of this work, but the drawing made by the engineer officer after his description was more formidable than the work itself. The soldiers' burying-grounds near the deserted cantonments tell a true and painful story of disease and death during the past winter.

On returning to head-quarters I was ordered to reconnoitre the road to Berry's Ferry. Without unsaddling I started, accompanied by Lieutenant Babcock and half a dozen dragoons. We had ridden about four miles when a courier, riding at full speed, overtook us. He brought an order to return, as information had been received that Ashby's cavalry occupied the road in force near Millwood. I doubted the report about Ashby's cavalry, but was glad of an apology to escape a long and wearisome ride.

March 14.—I met an old friend this morning who described to me the arrest of Union citizens which took place on the retreat of Jackson's army. Venerable and gray-headed men, accused of no crime but that of loyalty to their country, were seized and marched like felons through the streets, tramping through mud and rain between files of soldiers, followed at a distance by their weeping families. It was the most humiliating and damning scene that had occurred since the war, and had gone far to disgust honest but misguided men with the revolution.

The General thinks of going to Washington, and says he wishes me to go to Castleman's, or Snicker's Ferry, where Captain Abert is constructing a military bridge. I asked if I might not turn aside by the way and visit Charlestown, where I hoped to meet my wife and daughter. This permission was granted, but with an appearance of reluctance, so that when I took the road to Berryville I doubted whether I should take advantage of the permission. At Berryville I found no one at the topographical head-quarters but my quondam minstrel, Adam, now acting cook. Captain A. and Luce were both at Snicker's Ferry looking after their bridge. Adam's assistant in the kitchen was a negro cook lately deserted from the enemy. He comprehends the situation, and expresses it graphically. Bob says the loss of the battle at Bull Run only served to open Uncle Sam's eyes and made him see things clear. At the same time it makes the rebels stark mad. They began to believe in their own braggadocio, and they thought the war must end presently. This made them careless, wasteful, and loose in their discipline. It has also unfitted them to meet their late reverses, which have cast a gloom over their spirits proportioned to their former elation. While waiting here for a cup of coffee Captain A. and party returned. Their observations and report are complete, and after dining we rode back to Winchester together.

I had intended that my service with General Banks should terminate with the occupation of Winchester. Meanwhile I had received a letter from General Birney saying that he still kept my place open for me, having relied on a temporary appointee to fulfill the duties of Assistant Adjutant-General until I should be enabled to join him. Considering my engagements in the Valley concluded, and eager to take part in the more interesting operations of the Grand Army, I asked permission to rejoin Birney immediately. General Banks responded by a flattering refusal, saying that he was about to move his division over the Blue Ridge by way of Snicker's Gap, to take position on the Rappahannock, from whence, doubtless, he would be called on to co-operate with the Army of the Potomac. I must accompany the division in this movement, after which I might join Birney if I desired. I am but a grain of corn cast into the mill of the gods. Let them grind: any thing but inaction.

March 15.—Raining. The General commanding started for Washington by way of the Winchester and Potomac Railroad. I had permission to accompany him as far as Charlestown, where I intended to pass a day or two with my friends. At Summit Point I saw my old and esteemed friend P—— S——, who recognized me with many demonstrations of joy. I presented him to the General as one of three in Clarke County who had had the moral courage to express his real sentiments by voting against the ordinance of secession. He was greeted by all present with the respect due to his heroism.

March 16.—Fair and cool. I had a quiet, lazy day among my friends and relatives. Since the fall of Winchester the tone of Secessionists in this region is much modified, while loyalty is becoming more confident and outspoken. The Government will have no trouble with the mass of this population. Their restoration to the world, its commerce, comforts, and conveniences, is more than their ill-temper can hold out against. Many are evidently pleased in spite of themselves.

March 17.—Cold and clearing off. I went to Harper's Ferry with some friends en route for Baltimore. General Sedgwick is now in command here. His command is leaving the Valley for service elsewhere. In the afternoon I took the train for Winchester, and found General Williams's head-quarters engaged in a punch-drinking. Every thing seemed in high feather, and Shields was concocting a plan to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

circumvent Ashby, who was hanging around and annoying our picket-lines. I stopped at the guard-house to see two prisoners of Ashby's command just brought in. They had no information of any importance. As they retired the elder said to his fellow, "Lord! what a good sleep we'll have to-night! We don't have to watch the Yankees."

I called on General Shields and heard a detail of his plan to catch Ashby. He would send Colonel Mason with a brigade by a flanking road to the left, which came into the main turnpike at Middletown. After this column had got started fairly he would move with his main force on the Strasburg turnpike and keep Ashby amused until Mason struck his rear at Middletown. Shields's force was about ten thousand infantry with thirty guns. It reminded me of a bull undertaking to catch a fox, for such a slow-moving mass to start in pursuit of a legion of light cavalry only twelve or fifteen hundred strong, operating, too, in a country open and practicable every where, and perfectly well known to them. But behind this rather shallow plan it was evident that Shields had hopes of getting a fight out of Jackson. Pleased with his enterprising and gallant spirit, I volunteered to accompany him, and my offer was accepted with thanks.

March 18.—I slept last night with Colonel Brodhead. His regiment accompanies the expedition, but as the movement is several hours behind time we need not take the road until after dinner. In due time we mounted, and, passing the slow-moving column, overtook General Shields and staff near Middletown. While we stood upon a height, locating important points in the topography of the country, Colonel Mason's adjutant rode up and reported that his force already occupied Middletown, while Ashby had taken position between them and Strasburg, behind Cedar Creek. This of course. Our plan was as feasible as that of a child who tries to catch a bird by throwing salt on his tail. As we entered Middletown a column of smoke was seen rising in the direction of Strasburg. This, we were told, was the turnpike bridge over Cedar Creek.

As our advance reached the bluffs overlooking the stream Ashby opened upon them with three guns. I accompanied Colonel Brodhead, who rode rapidly to the front to take command of his regiment. Our skirmishers lined the hither bluffs, lying in groups among the cedar thickets and alternate open ground, paying no more respect to the whizzing balls and screaming shells than if they had been missiles from potatoe guns. A battery of Parrott guns stood in position unlimbered, but maintaining the same contemptuous silence. The column of cavalry, with drawn sabres, occupied the main road, ready for a move when ordered. An officer rode back for General Shields, who was near the rear of the column. Meanwhile the enemy, on the opposite side, kept bumming away with his three guns, supported by a dropping fire of musketry, to neither of which did any one deign to make the slightest response, until a company of sharp-shooters, with rifles carrying four-ounce balls, came up, and, by way of experiment, sent a few of their patent missiles over the stream. When General Shields arrived on the ground the sun was just setting, and the enemy's cannon were withdrawn. By the light of the burning bridge it was seen that a mill-race and dam interrupted the crossing, and no one was found who knew the ford. Volunteers were called for to find the crossing, but so little spirit was shown that it was pitch dark before the volunteers were ready. The firing from the other side had ceased, and our men bivouacked on the ground they occupied. Brodhead and myself rode back to Middletown, where we found food and lodging for ourselves and horses.

March 19.—During the night the Colonel had a violent chill, and before daylight started back to Winchester, accompanied by his adjutant. When I arose the Colonel's orderly, Michael (a bloody Irishman), reported to me, informing me that his commander had left himself with two men and the light carriage under my orders. He also intimated that, as I was poorly mounted on a quarter-master's hack, he should like to have permission to "stale me a horse" that would become me better. I thoughtlessly acquiesced and went to breakfast.

Before I had finished my meal Michael entered with a beaming countenance, and in a stage whisper informed me that he had stolen me an illigant horse from a "domd secesher." On going to the door I found the animal in hand, but was met at the same time by an application for his restoration. His owner, a poor man with innumerable children depending on him for support, with no other means of subsistence but this horse, all loyal citizens who loved the United States government and was always opposed to secession—all this backed by at least twelve respectable and loyal fellow-citizens, who with hats in hand responded at every pause as regularly as they do in church—"We beseech thee to hear us," etc., etc. I told the fellow to get home with his spavined tackey, and mounting my own raw-boned stumbler, hurried to the front, followed by Michael, rather disgusted with the results of his zealous service.

I joined General Shields just as he was about moving forward. Between Cedar Creek and Strasburg we found the smoking embers of the enemy's bivouac, with some remains of a hasty breakfast. There was nothing very tempting even to a campaigner's appetite. From the heights near Strasburg we could see Ashby on Fisher's Hill, about two miles distant, figuring on the inevitable white horse. He tried his guns, but the missiles fell about midway in the intervening meadow—so distant that we could scarcely hear the explosion of the shells.

Lieutenant-Colonel Daum, Chief of Artille-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

REBEL TROOPERS AT BREAKFAST.

ry, undertook another flank movement, for the purpose of getting his batteries within effective range of his light-footed antagonist. So he went creeping around the hills with his guns, like a boy trying to get a shot at a robin. After two hours' manœuvring he got twenty or thirty guns in position, and all the infantry massed to support him in due form. Meanwhile Ashby cleared out, and the Michigan cavalry followed across the meadows and up Fisher's Hill by the winding road, all visible from our position behind Strasburg, but concealed from the artillerists. As the head of this cavalry column appeared on the summit of Fisher's Hill Daum opened upon it with a startling roar. The Michiganders retired precipitately, or they would have been destroyed before the mistake could have been communicated to the zealous artillerists. As it was, they lost four horses killed, and one or two men bruised, but not seriously. Ashby, meanwhile, had set fire to several more bridges and railway trestles, and by the time we again got in motion was quietly in position at Tom's Brook, waiting for us.

As our advance showed itself he opened again while we were at least two miles and a half distant. It was now about noon, and the futility both of flank movements and direct pursuit being satisfactorily demonstrated, a halt was ordered. The command had started with but three days' rations. Half the time was consumed, and it was determined to return. The troops seemed much dissatisfied at the retrograde, and the plucky commander equally disgusted at not having found a fight. He damned the rebels roundly. He had hoped, as they had disgraced themselves by their political follies, they would at least redeem their honor by making a manly fight. Thus far they had done nothing but retreat and burn bridges.

At Strasburg the command halted for the night, the General concluding that he would bring up supplies from Winchester, and remain here until further orders. Although there was no especial military capacity displayed in this movement, I was nevertheless pleased with Shields's spirit and enterprise, as I believed at this time we had only to advance boldly to conclude the war.

March 20.—A northeast storm with chilling rain. Arose with an atrabilious headache, and started for Winchester with my two orderlies. On the way passed several regiments of Shields's division en route for the same place. Middletown was a scene of general lamentation, chiefly on account of bee-hives plundered by the Yankee bears. At Newtown an old man rushed out, and, seizing my bridle, asked me to dismount and come into the house. I felt so weary that I yielded easily to his importunity. I found a cozy interior and a motherly dame arranging the table. My venerable host informed me that he was a Union man and stone-deaf. He wanted to hear news of the battle, and feared to question me in the street lest the neighbors should overhear and bring him to grief in case our army retreated. I gave him to understand there had been no battle, and only one or two men hurt. He was astonished, and said his neighbors had told him that a whole train of wagons loaded with Federal dead had passed through town last night. While I partook of a lunch my entertainer told dreadful stories of the abuses put upon them by the rebel troops. They had been robbed of horses, wagons, grain, and cattle without measure or remuneration. Their sons and negroes were conscripted and carried off with-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SERFDOM.

out remorse. Every man that dared open his mouth to remonstrate against these outrages was called a d—d abolitionist, and menaced with death and confiscation. While the tenor of these complaints was an infallible test of the citizens' political opinions, all joined in doing injustice to the poor soldier. The noble profession of arms, in whatever cause exercised, soon elevates a man above the baser influences of partisan politics. According to my observation it was very seldom that the soldiers of either army condescended to discuss the political bias of a horse, a sheep, a bee-hive, or a fodder-stack. They stole with admirable impartiality.

Arrived in Winchester, I reported at head-quarters, and found General Banks returned. He informed us that there was a tremendous excitement in political and military circles at Washington. It was stated that the supposed formidable rebel works at Centreville and Manassas were a sham, mounted with Quaker guns, and occupied for some time past by not more than ten or fifteen thousand men. Certain political leaders were bent on breaking down M'Clellan, and Congressional resolutions to that end were in preparation. While there may be good grounds for the national mortification and disgust at these developments, it will be most unfortunate if their resentment shall be permitted to embarrass the operations of the Commander-in-Chief, now that he has taken the field. With a rapid and resolute concentration of all our forces upon Richmond I have no doubt it would be abandoned without a serious struggle. Drive the Confederacy out of Virginia, and it will perish of its own meanness in six months. Nothing but the pride and power of this misguided old State has given the least prestige or semblance of respectability to the accursed movement.

The bridge over the Shenandoah at Snicker's Ferry is completed, and the division will begin its march eastward to-morrow morning. Shields's division will be left for the protection of the Valley, with head-quarters at Winchester. This all seems satisfactory enough, but I do not like the idea of our standing on the defensive any where. According to my theory every thing should move and attack unceasingly, until all armed opposition to the Government is crushed, and the Southern people liberated from their oppressors.

March 21.—Clouds. Hearing that my wife and daughter had reached Charlestown, I wished to see them before starting on a distant campaign. The General accorded the permission with his usual complaisance, and yet I thought I detected some reluctance in his manner. As I could think of no reason why I should forego my visit, I determined to use the privilege without inquiring further. The General himself leaves to-day for Washington, and from there will join his command on the Rappahannock. M'Clellan has fallen back from Manassas, and is transporting the army by water to Fortress Monroe. He will move on Richmond by way of Yorktown and Williamsburg. This is the plan upon which every thing has been waiting. I must confess I do not see its advantages. We can not beat the rebellion by strategy or manœuvring. We must beat it by main force.

In due time I reached Charlestown, and spent a happy evening with my family. We celebrated the twelfth anniversary of my daughter's birth, and the feast was cheered with the tidings of Burnside's victory at Newbern, in North Carolina.

March 23.—Clouds. Returning from an afternoon walk I met an acquaintance, who, with some trepidation of manner, informed me that there was a rumor of an engagement near Winchester; that Shields was wounded, and the battle still raging. As my informant was a loyalist I was somewhat disturbed by the news, but thought it exaggerated perhaps. These tidings, although vague, served to ruffle the serenity of the evening. After I had gone to bed I was aroused by a knock at my chamber door. My brother-in-law had called to inform me that there certainly had been a battle near Winchester, and the National troops had suffered great loss. This was conclusive as far as it went, but it did not prevent my sleeping soundly.

March 24.—I called on Colonel Maulsby, who commanded the post, and asked for news of the fight yesterday. He could give me no satisfaction as to its character or results, but said his regiment had marching orders. This looked serious; so, taking leave of my family and friends, I started for Winchester by the Berryville turnpike. As I rode out of town I met a friend, who earnestly endeavored to dissuade me from riding alone. He said the country was full of rebel cavalry, who would make an especial mark of me. I felt the full force of his friendly remonstrance, knowing that he was in the confidence of the enemy. But for that reason I was the less disposed to acknowledge any timidity. I thanked him for his friendly warning, touched my pistol, and rode on my way.

As I passed Clifton I saw five mounted men in gray approaching. I handled my revolver and stood on my guard, determined not to surrender on any terms. To my relief, they turn-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ed out to be a party of fugitive servants. Three of them were mulatto boys from Winchester, who had taken service with some of our officers. The sound of the guns had so alarmed them that they started forthwith for a free State. I advised them to keep directly on to Harper's Ferry, deliver up their horses, and report to the commandant there. A little further on I saw at some distance ahead a group of saddled horses standing by the road-side. They resembled the horses of the local rebel cavalry. I hesitated a moment, but at length determined to push through. As I passed I perceived that several of the horses wore side-saddles, indicating rebels, but not dangerous ones. On nearing Berryville it was with unfeigned pleasure that I returned the salute of a Federal sentinel, and presently thereafter met an acquaintance of the Topographical party. He informed me that Mr. Luce had gone out the day before with Henshaw, the teamster, to survey the road toward Milnwood, and that both had been captured — wagon, horses, instruments, and all. Poor Luce! This is a fate we have often half jocosely prophesied would befall him. I inquired the news from Winchester, but my friend had heard nothing of a battle there.

In this uncertainty I entered Berryville. Here I found Colonel Gordon, of the Second Massachusetts, with his regiment, on the march for Winchester. There had been a severe battle, and all Banks's troops were recalled and moving thitherward. The enemy had been worsted, and was retreating toward Strasburg. I suggested to Gordon, who was in command of a brigade, that Banks's troops, now on the Berryville and Snicker's Gap road, should march directly toward Strasburg, and thus cut off the enemy's retreat or take him in flank. The Colonel's orders were peremptory, and he could not assume so much responsibility. We rode to Winchester together, and there had the first satisfactory news. Jackson had been severely beaten, and was in full retreat, ours pursuing.

Without dismounting I rode out to look at the field of battle, which was about three and a half miles distant, on the ridges west of Kernstown. Broken fences and fields deeply rutted by the wheels of the artillery first indicated that I had arrived upon the ground. Presently I saw the dead body of an artilleryman, with the top of his head blown off. The body had been inclosed in a pen of rails to prevent its disturbance by hogs. Passing through a wood I perceived further traces of the fight in the splintered forest trees. I at length reached the ground where our line of battle stood, and there saw some of our soldiers engaged in collecting and guarding the slain. Some thirty or forty bodies were stretched side by side on a rude grille made of fence rails; others were lying as they fell in the edge of the wood. The soldiers directed me to a thicket and stone-fence, where the rebel line had been formed. On approaching this thicket I observed what appeared to be a white border about three feet broad, which belted the wood with great regularity, its lower edge some four feet from the ground. This was where the fire of the National troops had splintered the trees and reaped the undergrowth. The regularity of this terrible work was astonishing, and bore witness to the skill of our Western riflemen. Within and behind this thicket, and along the stone-fence as far as I could see, the dead of the enemy lay thickly strewed, from their dirty gray and butternut jeans clothing often difficult to distinguish from the gray limestone rocks, decayed logs, and withered leaves, among which they were lying. Of forty or fifty bodies which I took the trouble to examine every one had a bullet through the head. Upon reflection I conclude that this is owing to the fact that they fought under cover, generally with only their heads exposed, and, further, that a shot in the head kills stone-dead; and such only were left on the ground where they fell. From wounds elsewhere, however mortal, the man does not die immediately, and is usually carried off.

Riding about half a mile to the rear of this line I found in a stack-yard several other dead bodies of men and several horses, two of which had been completely disemboweled by a shell. Behind this position, in a lofty wood, lay another line of rebel dead, with several horses. Among them lay the body of a large white horse, which no force nor persuasion could induce my animal to approach. It is a noticeable fact that, while he stepped among the human corpses with perfect composure, the sight of one of his own kind stretched in its gore filled him with the wildest terror. And indeed it was a cruel scene for man or beast to look upon. There was even a fascination in its very ghastliness, which presently drew me back to the bloody thicket, where the dead lay in greatest numbers. Dismounting here I tied my horse to a branch, that I might stroll about at will and glut my fancy on this feast of horrors. I was alone, no living thing within sight or hearing except my horse. The sun had set, but a dusky red twilight still glimmered upon the discolored and distorted faces of the dead, and occasionally lit up with a startling gleam their stony, staring eyes.

It must be that the strong fascination which constrains us, as it were, to dwell on scenes of death and agony, apparently so revolting to our nature, has a deeper motive than the mere gratification of a morbid curiosity. In thus communing with the dying and dead, do we not instinctively seek to catch a glimpse of the world of spirits through the gate by which a soul is passing, or from the cold and cast-off garment of humanity to snatch some clew to the awful mysteries of life and death?

Darkness came on apace as I continued to wander among the rocks and bushes, thinking that perchance I might see some face that I could recognize, stumbling now and then over a hummock of gory rags, scarcely recognizable

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

KERNSTOWN.

as the withered remains of what was but yesterday a fellow-man, perhaps a personal friend. Anon I heard a trampling in the leaves as of some one approaching. It was a gaunt sow, followed by her filthy family, who went nosing among the bodies, tearing open the bloody haversacks, and greedily devouring the dead men's rations of corn-bread and crackers. I drove the ghoul-like beasts away, and sat down at the foot of a tree to resume my meditations.

To me this day had appeared as an epitome of human life. The sun had risen upon me surrounded with friends—the faithful, the loving, and the beautiful. The meridian passed in hopeful, anxious, and changeful activity. The evening finds me weary and dreaming amidst silence, shadows, and death. I was glad when the notes of a distant bugle released me from the nightmare that seemed to bind me to this dreary spot. Though faint and far away, it stirred my blood like strong wine. There had been a battle, and the banners of my country waved in victory—

"Good Lord in heaven, it was a joy
The dead men could not kill."

I hastily mounted and rode out into the open ground, where I met Colonel Gordon and two officers of his staff who had also come out to view the field.

We returned to Winchester together, and there repaired the fatigues of the day by a hearty supper. After this refreshment I went out to visit the hospitals. The court-house and several other buildings were filled to their capacity with the wounded of both parties. The men lay upon the floor and benches with no other bedding than their blankets and knapsacks. There were wounds of all grades and characters. Some whose upturned eyes and stertorous breathing showed them in the agonies of death. Others lay stark and quiet, their faces covered with a hat or blanket placed by a friendly hand. These had died after being brought in. A Confederate captain—Glancy Jones was the name, I think—lay among the wounded, having both eyes and the bridge of his nose plowed out by a musket-ball. He was delirious at intervals, and raved about forming his company and charging. Another Confederate, delirious from a bullet wound in the head, tore off his bandages, and starting up from his place would pitch himself about the room so violently that he had to be carried into the dead-room to prevent his injuring the other wounded. He lay here exhausted and curiously picking the bloody lint from his wound and rolling it into little balls. He died before I left the room. An Ohio volunteer lay upon his back with the brains oozing from a shot-hole in his head, uttering with every breath a sharp, monotonous cry like the creaking of a wheel. The surgeon told me he had been in this condition for thirty-six hours without apparent change. The large majority of the cases lay quiet, and apparently without much suffering. Many were complaining of want of something to eat. A stout, fine-looking Federalist, supposing I was a surgeon, called my attention to his shattered thigh, observing in a cool, manly tone that he could wait if there were more pressing cases that required my attention; but he did not wish to lose his leg if it could be prevented.

The history of the battle of Kernstown, as I understood it, is this: The Richmond authorities, perceiving that the National troops were leaving the Valley to reinforce M'Clellan, ordered Jackson to make a demonstration which would detain them. When already in motion to accomplish this object he received information from a lady of Winchester that all the Yankee troops had left the place except two or three regiments which remained to guard the military dépôts, which were filled with supplies. Acting upon this information, and eager to secure the much-needed stores, the rebel commander, with more haste than discretion, made a rapid dash upon the place with his whole force, consisting of seven or eight thousand men with twenty-five or thirty guns. On the afternoon of Saturday, the 22d, his advanced cavalry under Ashby attacked and drove in the Federal

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TURNER ASHBY.

pickets, and, finding no force to oppose them, actually dashed into the southern suburb of the town. Shields, with premeditated subtlety, had, on retiring from Strasburg, marched all his troops through Winchester and located them on the northern side, leaving in the town only enough for provost guard and picket duty.

This disposition deceived the fair zealot of the secret service who sent Jackson the information. The feebleness of the opposition to Ashby's dash served to confirm this impression. Shields, surprised by the suddenness and audacity of the attack, hastily collected a few men nearest at hand, and with a battery went out to drive Ashby off; while engaged in locating the guns a shell from one of the enemy's guns struck an artillery horse in the head, and exploding at the same time killed the rider and inflicted a wound on General Shields, not dangerous, but severe enough to disable him completely for the time. Ashby was driven back, and the picket line re-established, when night put an end to the encounter.

On the following morning (Shields being confined to his bed) Colonel Kimball took command by right of seniority, and marched out with about eight thousand men of Shields, and Broadhead's Cavalry of Banks's Division, tak-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ing position near Kernstown, and engaging the enemy with artillery at long shot. This game was continued during the morning without any decisive results or developments. As the day advanced the enemy's fire increased, and his lines began to press us, the infantry showing themselves in force behind some thickets and a stone-wall which served as a breast-work.

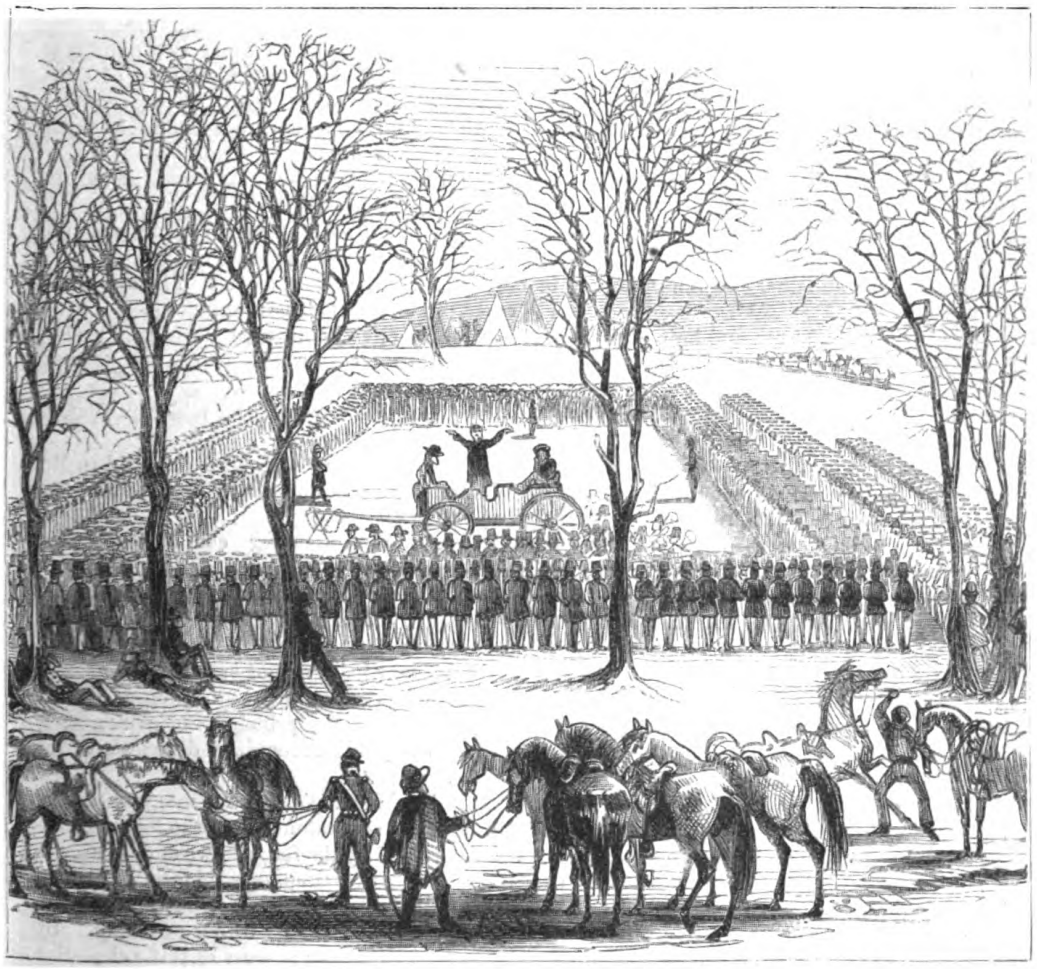
There was for a time some light skirmishing and manœuvring between the Federal right and the enemy's left to secure a flanking position. About four o'clock in the afternoon, it appearing that the enemy's artillery was predominating, the National infantry were ordered to attack. The Eighty-fourth and One Hundred and Tenth Pennsylvania, the Eighth and Fourth Ohio Regiments, executed this order with great spirit. The enemy, with the advantages of his covered position, resisted with obstinacy, and for half an hour the roll of musketry was incessant and deadly. Finally, a regiment (I think Colonel Thoburn's First Loyal Virginians) turned the rebel left, and thus, ousted from their stone-wall defenses, they were presently driven from the field with great slaughter and the loss of several guns.

Our troops followed their success zealously, and in a wood about half a mile to the rear encountered another body of the enemy, who attempted to check their advance. The resistance was spirited but unavailing, and the field was speedily cleared. Our troops, notwithstanding the rough work they had performed, were eager to follow the affair to a crushing conclusion; but the sun had already set, and they were drawn off. The senior officer on the field, probably not feeling himself sufficiently in command to insure the necessary unity of action, did not care to assume the responsibility of a further pursuit. For, as I understand, General Shields, from his bed in Winchester, still continued to receive reports and issue orders.

The débris of the enemy's force fell back upon some fresh reserves that were moving up the Valley turnpike to their support. As night had closed the action the enemy bivouacked behind Kernstown, making a great show with his fires to deter the Federals from another attack, which was much apprehended. Next morning, March 24, Jackson was in full retreat up the Valley. General Banks got information of the battle at Harper's Ferry, where he was en route for Washington. He returned in all haste, took command, and now led the pursuit.

The National loss at Kernstown was eighty-four killed and four hundred and twenty wounded, making a total of five hundred and four. The report of wounded was needlessly swelled by an honorable emulation among the regiments to show the longest list of casualties. Many of those reported were so slightly hurt that they did not leave their ranks. The enemy's loss in killed, wounded, and missing exceeded a thousand, of whom it was estimated that six hundred were hors du combat from death and wounds, three hundred and thirty prisoners unwounded, and the unestimated residue scattered to the mountains. The dead and nearly two hundred wounded fell into our hands, with two guns and three caissons of the artillery.

The conduct and results of this action were highly creditable to the troops engaged. They had met equal numbers of the enemy on a fair field, and under a favorite leader, had driven them from strong positions, captured guns, and utterly routed them. In rebel accounts of the action it is stated, apologetically, that they commenced the fight with a single battery, supported by a handful of men; that their troops, marching rapidly up the Valley turnpike, reached the field by detachments; and that, at the conclusion of the fight, not more than twenty-five hundred, or three thousand, or four thousand had been engaged. [I have heard these diverse estimates given at different



AFTER THE BATTLE.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

times by rebel officers who were present, and spoke with equal positiveness as to numbers.] Without pretending to decide upon the numerical accuracy of these statements I have no doubt their onslaught was made in the manner described, and that they fought with spirit, although very rashly and unskillfully managed. I am also informed by the United States officers on the field that our battle was fought entirely by the infantry of our right wing, consisting of half a dozen regiments named, and numbering in the aggregate about twenty-six hundred men. Our left and centre were not engaged at all. It thus appears that the fight at Kernstown was not a general battle, but only a partial engagement of the opposing forces. That there was not much generalship displayed on either side, and that, considered as a test of the pluck and efficiency of the rank and file, the palm belongs most indisputably to the National infantry. Our officers all say it was the Soldier's Battle.

Before dismissing the subject I must be allowed to anticipate, that the ensemble of the narrative may be complete. Although Jackson had been deceived, defeated, his army nearly ruined and fugitive, the essential point of his campaign was gained. General Banks's force was detained in the Valley, and most important movements from the Rappahannock did not take place. Whether these fatal results were due to Jackson's strategy or Washington tactics I am not informed.

March 25.—This morning I started for the front, diverging from the direct road, to look again at the battle-field. I saw several parties of citizens, male and female, looking among the bodies for their relatives and acquaintances. Those recognized were covered with a sheet and carried away. Beyond the field I found the Mayor of Winchester with a party engaged in collecting and burying the unclaimed dead in a trench. There were several young women here searching for their friends as the corpses were carted in. Traveling from hence across the fields I struck the Valley turnpike at Newtown, and rode from there directly on to Strasburg, where I found General Banks's head-quarters. The pursuit had added a few prisoners to our count, but otherwise was futile, and had been abandoned.

THANKSGIVING FOR THE VICTORY.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A LONDON POLICE COURT.

THE POLICE MAGISTRATE.

WHAT a record of folly, of guilt, of squalid want, improvidence, and vice—of fashionable dissipation and vulgar crime—is that curious document of many-handed signatures and fabulous nomenclature called the "Charge Sheet," which is placed before the magistracy every morning, and faithfully reports the misdoings of the district—or rather, such of them as are "found out"—during the preceding night! You might almost fancy, on glancing at the names of the offenders, that the criminality of London is about equally divided among the Smiths, the Joneses, and the Johnsons of the town.

Here is the hopeful son and heir of my Lord Screwby taking his turn in the dock with "Opera Jack," "Seven Dial Sam," and "Bedfordbury Bill," just out on ticket-of-leave. And the women, too! The bearded stranger from a foreign land, who has just stepped in to get a taste of London life "under lock-and-key," may well look startled to see the proportion which the fair and tender sex maintains in that sad collection of "night-charges;" for it is a fact that nearly two-thirds of the daily complaints for rioting and drunkenness are preferred against women.

But the sanguine believer in the popular notion that there is a law for the rich and none for the poor, must wait till the night-charges are disposed of, and the "summons-business" begins, if he would learn how the said "poor" would be likely to improve their shining hours if greater facilities were afforded them for taking "legal proceedings" against one another.

To-day there are sixteen summonses on the list, having relation to sixteen assaults, committed by sixteen people (nearly all women) against sixteen other people—each of the complainants and defendants being armed with at least half a dozen witnesses, ready to swear point-blank against each other: and oh, gentle reader, if you would see the oath-swearing system in all its fullness of perfection, take thyself unto Bow Street or Worship Street some thirsty July afternoon, and behold a well-educated gentleman sitting in open court, and receiving £1200 a year, chiefly for adjusting the squabbles arising daily among the female denizens of his district, who have parted with their only shawls or shoes to obtain the price of the summons—a charge of two shillings, imposed by the Legislature in the vain hope of checking frivolous complaints.

It is worthy of note that the magistrates, having their peculiarities also, adopt altogether different methods of dealing with this class of business.

His Worship, Mr. A., being a stickler for legal precision in regard to the rules of evidence, stops the witness every two minutes to remind her of the "inadmissibility of statements irrelevant to the case, or having reference to alleged misdemeanors not embraced in the terms of the summons." Thus:

"Please yer Worship, this female at the bar, if she can call herself sich—"

"Now, my good woman, no reflections upon the defendant, if you please."

"Well, Sir, ever since last Tuesday-week, come next Christmas twelvemonth—"

"Never mind about next Christmas twelvemonth. Be good enough to confine yourself to what occurred last week."

"Please yer Worship, she told Mr. Waters, her landlord—"

"Don't bother us with what she said to Mr. Waters, the landlord, but tell us what she said to you" (getting angry).

"Well, Sir" (getting confused), "Mrs. Finch told me—"

"Never mind what Mrs. Finch told you" (enraged); "it isn't evidence, and it can't be taken down."

In this way half an hour or more is consumed in the useless effort to get an ignorant woman to conform with the principles of evidence, as laid down by the recognized decisions of the courts.

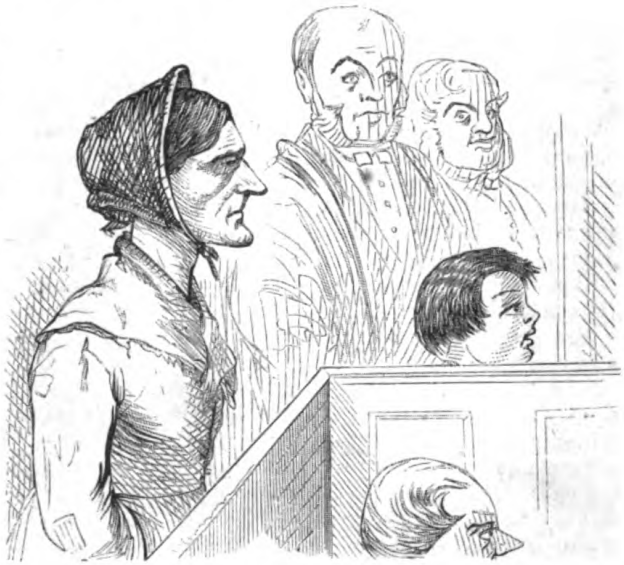
But his Worship's brother-magistrate, Mr. B., is not so scrupulous about the legal restrictions imposed by the forensic wisdom of ages in the way of giving common evidence. His theory, in dealing with a woman especially, is to let her have her own say in her own way. By suffering this simple process of self-exhaustion to go on it is surprising how soon the real facts

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of the case, and, better still, the real motives of the proceedings, are ascertained. Thus:

"Please yer Worship, I'm a lone, 'lorn widow, without a husband to protect my character, and I lives by working hard at the tub for the support of nine children, four living and five dead, please yer Honor; and ever since that female at the bar come to live in our yard—which it was last Christmas twelvemonth—there's never been no peace whatsumever; for she is that scandalous that no one wouldn't condescend to have nothin' to say to her; which she owes her landlord nine weeks' rent, and is known to be no better than she should be, please yer Worship! not that I wishes to have any thing to say to her, nor any sich, if she'll have the goodness not to millest me, after strikin' my daughter with a flat iron, and raisin' a bump on her head as big as a coker-nut, which her back-comb was driv' right into; and all because the pump at the top of the yard, as is common to all alike, and mostly to them as pays their way—which the poor child happened to splash her ladyship by accident, as I have nine witnesses to prove upon their Bible-oaths; and the nasty, millishious wretch threw a whole bucketful over the poor girl, as is just left the hospital with a fit of rhoomatics in her head; and I, bein' the only mother of the child, couldn't stand by and see it done, and no sooner was the word said than she struck me here, yer Worship, and kicked me here, and scratched me here, and bit a piece out of my gown, which the flesh is gone, as I've brought to show the court; and she tore my new bonnet, as cost six and sixpence last Tuesday week, into shreds and patches (crying), which if she'll pay the money, yer Worship (softening), I've no desire to punish the woman, for the sake of her poor children; although she has been six times to this court for assaults and battery, which is a place as I never set eyes on afore this day—my character being well known in the neighborhood as a hard-working, industrious woman (sobbing bitterly), which the police can prove."

When a woman of this sort comes to tears there is hope of speedy relief for the court, while the magistrate, by simply listening to the illegal narrative, is enabled to grasp the entire "merits" of the case, pro and con. He sees that the only object of the complainant is to recover the price of her bonnet; and as the defendant has no objection to pay the money, now that she has "had her spite out," the quarrel is adjusted to the satisfaction of all parties, without examining any of the sixteen witnesses in attendance, all of whom, fraternizing with complainant and defendant, repair to the nearest tavern to "finish up the afternoon."



Then there are the cases of "distress." Real, helpless poverty hides its rags, and shudders at the bare thought of publicity; but your idle, ne'er-do-well goes straight to the magistrate without a blush; and the benevolent "A. B. C.'s" and "X. Y. Z.'s" who contribute so liberally to the poor-boxes of the London police courts, and "respectfully request acknowledgments in the Times," little imagine to what extent they are responsible for the affliction daily befalling their fellow-creatures.

Here is a forlorn-looking Irishman, accompanied by his wife and two children, found begging within the very precincts of the court; and the woman (usually the "spokesman") tells a doleful story about their having scraped their earnings together to join a wealthy brother at the diggings, and being robbed of every farthing in a lodging-house near the docks the night before the vessel started, necessitating their return, penniless and barefooted, to Cork. The woman is affected to invisible tears; the man wipes his unmoistened eye, and the well-drilled children—boy and girl—roar a chorus of assent. There is a benevolently-disposed, bald-headed old gentlemen in the body of the court, who thinks it perfectly monstrous that the magistrate can listen so dispassionately to such a tale of woe, or hesitate for a moment to empty the contents of the imaginary poor-box into the unhappy woman's lap. His indignation is increased when he hears the man and his wretched offspring ordered "out of court," in order that they may be examined separately as to the details of their calamity.

"Now, my good woman, that's your husband, is it?"

"Yes, plaise your Honor, and a honest, hard-working—"

"Never mind that. When were you married to him?"

THE OLD THIEF CONVICTED BY THE YOUNG WITNESS.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE GENTLEMAN WHO TELLS THE MAGISTRATE HE DINED AT GREENWICH YESTERDAY.

"When, yer Honor? Well, about twelve years ago; and I—"

"Where did the marriage take place?"

"Did yer say where, Sir? Yes, Sir, I think it was in Tipperary, yer Honor; and hard work it was to get the money for the diggings—"

"What is your husband's name?"

"His name, yer Honor? Macarthy, yer Honor."

"What was your name before you were married to him?"

"Cromartie, yer Honor."

"Are these your only children in twelve years?"

"Well, yer Honor, they're the only darlings left to us by the marcy of Providence; or there would have been five, but for the three that was taken from us with the typhus; and a trouble it was to us till we rais'd the money for the diggings—"

"Call in the man."

He is placed by the jailer at the opposite end of the dock.

"What's your name, my man?"

"Kelly, yer Honor."

"Oh, indeed! I thought it was Macarthy."

"So it is, yer Honor; Kelly Macarthy. I didn't know it was me other name ye were axing fir."

"And so this woman is your wife, is she?"

"Yes, yer Honor; and a hard-working, industrious—"

"Wait a bit. What was her name before you were married?"

"Well, yer Honor, I hardly remimber, for it was a long time ago—"

"A long time ago!"

"Not exactly that; I meant about seven years ago; and it's a long time to remember a name that yer've no further use for—"

"Oh! you've been married seven years, then?"

"About that, your Honor—to the best of my recollection; bit if you ax me wife, she'll tell yer right, yer Honor."

"Where were you married?"

"I'm not sure, yer Honor, for I've a bad memory; but if you ax me wife—"

"Surely you remember where you were married?"

"Well, then, I think it was Dublin, to the best of my belafe—"

"Then, if your wife said Cork—"

"Oh, certainly; Cork it was, yer Honor."

"It so happens, then, that she did not say Cork. Come, Sir, how many children have you? Perhaps you can remember that?"

"There's the two darlings in court here to-day, yer Honor."

"Oh, but haven't you lost some children?"

The woman holds up three fingers, and makes a secret sign across the dock.

"Plaise, yer Honor, I didn't think of the three that died with the measles—"

"But how many have you had?"

The man looks dismayed, and the woman holds up five fingers. The man mistakes her meaning.

"Well, I never thought to mention the five we have in service, for they're no sort of trouble to us, and earning the honest penny for themselves; and if ever we get to the diggings—"

ACQUITTED. SENT FOR TRIAL.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE FREQUENT VISITOR.

"Never mind the diggings. How many children do you make of it altogether?"

"Plaise, yer Honor, I'm no hand at calculation—I'm no scholar; but if you'll ax—"

"I think I can help you, Sir. Two here to-day, three dead, and five in service—that makes ten. Ten children in seven years. Can you explain that, my man?"

"Well, yer Honor, I'm no scholar; but if you'll ax my wife—"

"Stand down, Sir. Call in the two children. Put the boy in the box (a dirty little urchin of about eight). Now, boy, look at me. Where's your father and mother? Don't look at these people; I know you don't belong to them. Come, tell the truth." Boy (crying)—

"Please, Sir, my father he was transported for life for picking up a handkercher in the Dials; and mother she sells oranges in the street."

Here the jailer observes:

"I know these children, your Worship. They belong to Muddy Moll, as she is called. She hails mostly about the dark-arches, in the 'Delphi, and gets her living by letting these children out at sixpence a day to the beggars of London."

"No, please, Sir, 'taint no such thing. Me and my sister Kate, we gets a honest, respectable living, we do, by running after 'busses, and turning topsy-turvy for the 'musement of the gents outside, we do."

By this time the magistrate comprehends the whole case. He commits the man and woman to three months, as rogues and vagabonds, and hands over the boy and girl to the tender mercies of the master of the work-house. Even the sympathetic stranger in court yields to the conviction that the magistrate was right, and he has already abandoned his intention to write to the Times about "man's inhumanity to man."

But the magistrates, being mortal, have their little prejudices and weaknesses too, and it is curious to note how these are consulted by the shrewder attorneys, police, prosecutors, and witnesses who habitually come before them. I remember a knowing officer of the Mendicity Society, who called regularly at the police court every morning at ten to ascertain which of the magistrates was sitting—whether it was Mr. A., who never spared a beggar, or Mr. B., who never committed one—a contingency which settled the nature and extent of his operations for the day. Ay, and you may have seen some of the more cunning of the professional beggars themselves, who have enjoyed perfect immunity on Mr. B.'s days, paying an early visit to the court, and regulating their operations too, quitting the district altogether on Mr. A.'s days for a moral certainty.

Then the inspector of the Z division, who has long since discovered Mr. B.'s antipathy to publicans, and Mr. A.'s invariable leniency toward the same class, will be sure to select the former to investigate his charge against the landlord of the "Magpie and Stump" for having sold Mary Watkins a "leetle drop" of gin during the prohibited hours of Sunday, although she was not a bona fide traveler, and had no excuse to offer except that she was "seized with the pinches in the left side," and had prevailed on

FRIENDS AND RELATIVES OF THE PRISONERS.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the humanity of the defendant to make her a present of the gin, which the barmaid and potman swore was a free gift, but which the sergeant and the inspector declared they saw her pay for.

In the same way the cabman, having faith in the proverbial tendency of Mr. A. to crush the persecuted and immaculate fraternity to which he belongs, takes good care not to apply to him for a summons against the gent as only give sixpence for being druv two mile and a quarter on a wet night, but waits patiently for Mr. B.'s day of sitting; while, on the other hand, individuals who step forward "on public grounds" to expose the extortionate demands and insolent demeanor of No. 104,632, will be careful to select Mr. A.'s day, in order that no mercy may be shown toward the ruthless offender.

Then Mr. A.'s notorious and extremely crotchety veneration for Acts of Parliament makes him the terror of every man who simply requires the magisterial signature to a formal affidavit; while Mr. B.'s utter contempt for Acts of Parliament in general makes him the special favorite of all prosecutors who are perfectly satisfied of the enormous delinquency of their servants, but who happen to have no legal evidence against them. On no account can you prevail on Mr. A. to "stretch the law," even where culpability is morally certain; while the precept of Mr. B. is, "I am guided by the rules of common-sense. If my decision fits the Act, so much the better; if not, the Act is defective, and ought to be amended."

Thus, as we have already shown, Mr. B. acquires a reputation for getting through a vast amount of business in an incredibly short space of time; while Mr. A. may be often found sitting on the bench two hours after the proper hour of closing the court, poring over the Acts of Parliament which are piled about him, in order that he may be able to give a strictly legal decision, "according to the statute in that case made and provided," upon the important question which has been debated before him by a couple of attorneys (not remarkable for their civility to each other), as to whether a man who has swallowed a bad half-crown can be said to have counterfeit money "in his possession."

THE QUIET HOUR.

Oh, most I love the quiet evening hour,
When the red sunset deepens in the west,
With gold and crimson for the day's last dower,
And slowly fades upon the mountain's crest
The rosy light with which his brows were crowned,
While twilight shadows softly gather round.

Then all the air is hushed, no sound is heard
To mar the solemn stillness of the hour,
Except, perchance, the twitter of a bird
High up within her leafy shaded bower;
Or the low bell that tinkles on the ear
As homeward slow the loitering kine draw near.

How pleasant here beneath the porch to sit,
Your hand in mine, Love, gazing on the scene,
Ere yet within the evening lamps are lit;
And silently, its darkling shores between,
To mark the sinuous river, winding, flow,
A line of silver, through the vale below!

And one by one within the blue above
To watch the gleaming stars like lights appear,
And fairest of them all the Star of Love,
Bright-shining Hesperus, rising calm and clear;
While, seeming inlaid in the heavens serene,
The slender crescent of the moon is seen.

On yonder knoll how often, couched at ease,
Hid from the hot sun's summer noontide glare
Beneath the sheltering branches of the trees,
I've listened to the brook which babbles there—
Yon thread of light that down the steep slope swerves
To left and right in many-changing curves!

How black the shadow of the fisher's skiff
Upon the shining surface of the stream!
And see above, where, on the high walled cliff,
Fades out entire the last faint lingering gleam;
And cloudy shapes of vapors, thin and pale,
Rise like dim phantoms from the darkened vale!

There is a twilight of the heart that holds
All thoughts, all feelings in its gentle sway,
Like that calm evening hour that softly folds
Its shadowy arms about the dying day;
A sweet repose, a waveless lull that fills
The yearning breast, and every longing stills.

See round us, Love, how closely draws the night!
No longer in the dim porch let us sit,
While circling bats wheel by in noiseless flight,
But enter where the evening lamps are lit,
And leave the tired earth to its welcome rest—
The hour is past that you and I love best.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HOURS WITH THE DEAD.

THE time was when, even in this young and progressive land, the Church and the Grave seemed reverently secure from secular encroachment. That time has passed away. The "spirit of improvement," so called, hesitates no longer at the portal of the most sacred sanctuary whether of the living or the dead. The massive stone and ivy-covered temple where our fathers and our grandfathers worshiped, and where ourselves and our children hoped still to worship undisturbed, is, by a vote of the vestry, thrown down before our very eyes and the place thereof knows it no more. Would that the sacrilege ended here; but alas! the sacred precincts of the grave-yard are invaded, the tombs of our ancestors are despoiled, the bleached bones of our parents and relatives are recklessly huddled together in rude heaps, and trundled by strange hands over the complaining pavements to be deposited in some place without associations to us, and without a single guarantee that they shall rest even there for any definite or lengthy period. The Gothic towers and stained windows give place to some marble depository of fashionable dry goods, or to the flashy frontage of a theatre, against both of which establishments the solemn church-walls had for so long a period frowned a moral defiance. As to the grave-yard—a bowling alley may reverberate over the hollow remnant of its tombs, or dashing "turn-outs" convert into a fashionable drive the soft hillocks where slept the mortal remains of those who were most near and dear to us in their lives.

All this is very sad, but apparently we have no help for it. Like other irreparable evils in life, we must steel our hearts and numb our sensibilities and take the world as it is. There is left to us only the faint consolation of a hope that the cities and towns of our country may at last reach some defined limit in the size and population which will enable their citizens to feel at home in their houses and in their churches, and attain in some degree that feeling of reverence for the past which can alone secure permanency of family association. Then shall we build for those who are to come after us as well as for ourselves, and lay upon the self-same shrine our memories and our hopes. It is when these innovations tread, as it were, upon our own grave-clothes that our sensibilities shrink before the startling profanation. Who of us has not experienced—or if he has not, may not experience—this rude and forced re-acquaintance with those who have been laid away in the chambers of the dead? If it has not come to pass, it may yet come; for there is no grave so mute but it is liable before the wand of avarice or pride to yawn and deliver up the fleshless bones and mouldering corpses which affection, with reverential hands, once laid there in the newness of death, trusting that quietness was to be their portion until the last trump should sound.

Similar reflections must crowd the mind of all who are suddenly called out of the dazzle and bustle of everyday existence to go silently and sadly to the resting-places of their dead ones, and superintend their removal to some new and far-off sepulchre. Within my own experience, although but a lad at the time, one of these sad scenes left upon my memory an indelible impression. Perhaps it was this very season of youth which made the revelation a permanent record in my past, and tinged my thoughts with a certain sober maturity. What has the bright butterfly-period of life to do with winding-sheets and charnel-houses? Is it well that the unalloyed bliss which springs from the ignorance of darkness and death should be suddenly checked in mid-career by sights suggestive of an end which we knew not of? I was an infant when my mother died, so that I carried through life no remembrance of her beautiful face and lovely disposition, and happily, perhaps, no personal association with her death. That was the inheritance of others, and on none did the bitterness of the separation inflict more misery than on my father. Her name was seldom afterward upon his lips. It seemed a subject too sacred and too private to escape, even in words, from that inmost shrine where daily and unceasingly it seemed to be the only source of his consolation.

The family tomb where my mother's remains rested, together with those of my grandfather, grandmother, and other deceased relatives, was one of a row indicated by tablets set in the brick wall of the oldest burial-ground in the city. This sacred inclosure, where still sleep the remains of two or three generations of families, occupies the corner of a large public "common" or park, which beautifies and refreshes the heart of the city. At the period to which I am about to refer the broad "Mall" or graded walk extending around this public thoroughfare or "common" was interrupted by the burial-ground, the southern exposure of which flanked directly upon the street running parallel with it. This was of course an inconvenience to pedestrians who frequented the Mall, as it obliged them to take the street to the extent of the grave-yard limits before re-entering the promenade. For many years, however, after the construction of the beautiful public walk, this obstacle to its perfect symmetry was unheeded, simply because it was considered irreparable. The idea of sacrificing any portion of the sacred inclosure in order to administer to the mere idea of beauty or public convenience never entered into the imagination of the most idle loiterer along that charming, shady thoroughfare.

But, tempora mutantur! the idea was at last enunciated, then quietly talked about, and finally resolved upon, as a public necessity to which private interests ought to yield. The proprietors of those tombs which lay so directly in the way of the proposed extension of the Mall were applied to with the view to obtain the necessary consent to their removal. Of course it was met by an indignant refusal—a refusal so posi-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tive that for a while longer matters remained as they were. At last one of the proprietors being persuaded that the desecration would sooner or later take place in spite of every effort to avert it, procured a tomb elsewhere and had his family remains moved thither. After this the others yielded, my father among the rest, and it was decided, as an unavoidable necessity, that that quiet, reverend depository must be made vacant and the contents removed to a distant cemetery where, at least for many years to come, no similar intrusion need be apprehended. It was intimated that the proprietors of the city tombs might have all the time they required for the necessary removal, that they might have full opportunity to reconcile their feelings to the disagreeable necessity, as well as to secure and prepare elsewhere new places of depository.

This was a great relief to my father, who postponed any action in the matter until a convenient period. Selecting a dark, drizzly night, that the sad work might not attract the prying eyes of the passers-by, he communicated to myself alone his intention, asking if I would like to be present to render such slight offices as would be useful. I felt instinctively that he had not suggested this without much consideration, and that my presence would be to him a comfort on the occasion. Without a shadow of hesitation or a feeling of dread I agreed to accompany him.

It was past midnight when my father and I, hand in hand, walked silently into the burial-ground, closed the iron gate noiselessly behind us, and picked our way between the hillocks of rank grass and the dim, obtruding grave-stones to the family tomb beneath the long brick wall which divided this silent city of the dead from the living, moving, heedless city without. As we approached through the gloom we saw the two undertakers with the horse and cart, and that the door of the tomb had been opened and preparations made for our arrival. After receiving my father's instructions, uttered to them in a low whisper, two dark-lanterns were lighted, with one of which my father, accompanied by the men, descended into the vault. I was left alone outside with the other lantern, holding it low down and directing its feeble rays into the melancholy sepulchre below. Thus I could observe all that went on therein, as in silence and in sadness coffin after coffin was lifted from the piles and brought out and laid on the grass beside me. Ah, what a melancholy night's work was that for a boy of tender years to be engaged in! At times I was left utterly alone in that dim, ghastly grave-yard, standing between those dark, damp, odorous shapes of death, while far below, as in a cavern, where burned a sickly, solitary light, the shadowy forms of men were removing, without a word of utterance, the other mouldering and offensive remnants of mortality.

From a feeling which can be better understood than described, one coffin in that tomb was for a while scrupulously avoided. It was that in which lay all that remained of her who was my mother. Apart from the desire to postpone the disturbance of that sacred casket, there were appearances about it which indicated that its condition was very unsafe. I saw my father examining it with care and apprehension, and then four hands were cautiously placed at the corners, and it was lifted from its position. Suddenly the sides and top fell inward with a hollow, crushing sound, and the whole mass slid to the ground with a reverberating knell. My poor father clasped his hands in silent agony and gazed upon the contents thus awfully exposed to view. I directed the rays of my lantern from without more fixedly upon the spot, and for a moment we all looked but spoke not. Whatever there had been of form within the coffin before it was lifted had passed in a sightless breath of dust, and nothing was left of all that womanly loveliness but disjointed, scattered bones. But in their midst lay a stained white satin ribbon in the form of a bow—the ribbon with which he had gently bound the crossed wrists of those snowy hands before the coffin-lid shut her forever from his mortal gaze. Ah, how sad that little faded ribbon—how poignant the rush of memory—how horrible the circumstances under which that remembrance was awakened!

Fortunately, some such occurrence among the many mouldering coffins there deposited had been anticipated and provided for, and the vault was at last decently vacated and the iron door locked upon its more than emptiness to us. Then the loaded wagon rolled through the grassy ways between the hillocks, and with a sense of blessed relief we stepped into the carriage and followed the dreary burden through the cold, deserted streets of the city, and out with the early dawn to the verdure of the open country, and into the beautiful grove of the cemetery, and at last saw those beloved remains deposited in quietness and in safety where the hand of man will not, it is hoped, touch them again with impunity.

To those who are familiar with the various circumstances and manifestations of death the scene I have attempted to describe will be less impressive than to others. As we grow older and see friends and relatives taken from us, and follow their remains to their last resting-places (or at least to what we hope may be their last resting-places), the shroud and the coffin and the tomb become measurably stripped of the horror with which we first beheld them. There are others whose avocations in life are so inseparably connected with the dead that sensibility becomes blunted, and the association with that which is generally repulsive to most of us is freed from even an idea that is unpleasant.

The experience of medical students sufficiently attests this fact, and I have witnessed many scenes which, although to me invested with horror, presented nothing but attraction to my companion of the knife and scalpel. To

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google come upon death in any shape is bad enough, but to find one's self suddenly in a large room surrounded by the dead, when one was only looking for and expecting to meet the face of a living friend, is by no means a pleasant surprise. Such was my fortune on one occasion in Paris, when, to keep an appointment with a student of the Quartier Latin, I visited, one morning quite early, the Academy of Medicine. The hollow court-yard of that famous institution has, on one side of it, a row of doors, each opening into small surgical or dissecting rooms, appropriated to the students. The visiting-card of the occupant is generally tacked upon the door as a sign. On the morning in question I went to my friend's room (a small and horribly-smelling place, having on the walls and tables various implements of his profession), but he was not there. In fact it was too early for many to be about, and I saw no sign of vitality but the sleepy porter at the outside gate, who had admitted me as a friend of a student. A mysterious black-covered wagon stood in the court-yard, apparently newly arrived, as it was backed up to a large open door on the opposite side of the square, as if recently discharged of its load.

While waiting for my student friend to arrive I sauntered slowly across and entered this open door, and immediately found myself the only living being in a large, bare, brick-floored apartment, upon which lay extended, side by side, twenty corpses of both sexes, stark, rigid, and cold. I had no idea of retreating; on the contrary, a dreadful fascination held me spell-bound till I had gazed and become perfectly familiar with each of the shrunken, ghastly, fixed faces before me; some, open-mouthed and open-eyed; some with clenched teeth and hands; some almost featureless with the inroads of wasting disease before vitality had ceased. In a corner of this room a pile of children's corpses had been thrown promiscuously together, as being of less interest and value to those for whom these "subjects" were designed.

I had been in this strange company some minutes when footsteps approached, and a man in a blue cotton blouse came into the room. Casting an inquisitive eye at me, as if to say, "I wonder what you want at this time of day," he proceeded, with the utmost nonchalance, to go through a process which evidently was his daily occupation, and one of the perquisites of his position. Lifting up the head of a female corpse, he straightened out the long black hair and immediately severed it with scissors from the crown. This process he repeated with each. Then tying together the accumulated "glory of woman," he proceeded with pincers to extract from the stiffened jaws all the teeth of either sex which were found to be in a perfect condition! Loaded with these united spoils he vanished at one end of the building, while I, sick and faint at heart, got out of the door at which I had entered, eager for fresh air and for forgetfulness.

I had not taken many turns in the court before my student made his appearance, and in the course of another half hour most of the class had assembled, and stood about the vicinity of the chamber of horrors waiting for the "distribution." As each name was called aloud the individual alluded to proceeded to select his "subject," manipulating them in turn until he found the one whose physical condition of fat or lean presented the most suitable development of the part to be dissected. Having satisfied himself in these respects, the student would seize the body by the lower limbs, sling it over his shoulder as carelessly as if he were a butcher taking a lamb to the slaughter (and perchance the resemblance was just), and stride across the court to his surgical den, there to lock himself in with his helpless victim, to be absorbed for the rest of the day in the fascinations of physiological research. It was a curious thought, as the eye ran down that long row of dark-closed doors, that behind each, securely locked in his silent sanctum, was one in the strength and ambition of youth bending with bare arms over the rigid forms of death (which yesterday was a living patient of the hospital), and absorbed with intensity of interest in the developments of his revolting but necessary profession.

It is a mooted subject, particularly in this country, where the facilities for such investigations are extremely limited, how far this robbing the grave of "its due" is justified by the demands of science. Where, as in France, it is a fully recognized necessity, but little secrecy or evasion of the law is practiced. Here, as is well known, the student who desires matériel for the prosecution of his studies, obtains his "subjects" not infrequently by means which will not bear the revelations of the daylight. How far these practices extend nowadays I do not know, but probably they are by no means entirely out of fashion among our young friends of the scalpel.

Many are the incidents connected with this grim trade which have escaped professional secrecy. The manner in which my old friend Dr. X. (not Cross-Bones) narrowly escaped detection on one of these occasions occurs to me as an excellent illustration of the serio-comic. A woman died at the Chelsea Hospital, who, being nameless and friendless, was consigned to the adjacent Potter's Field. Out of respect to the poor creature, who had for a long time been a patient in the Doctor's ward (or perhaps from other considerations), he attended her remains to the grave, and witnessed their interment. As he stood over the sexton, busy with the duties of his sad office, the Doctor narrowly observed the measurement of the grave and the quantity of earth thrown in. That night, in darkness and in silence, he took that measurement again, and removed that earth. Carefully concealing the body in a long cloak provided for the purpose, he set it up beside him in his one-seated gig, placed a cap on its

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google head, and drove along the turnpike in the direction of his home. Without encountering any person on the road he reached the toll-gate, from whence emerged the sleepy keeper with a lantern, the rays from which he concentrated upon the conscience-stricken Doctor and his dummy companion. The disguise, however, was sufficient to prevent suspicion, but unfortunately the sudden stoppage of the gig threw the corpse forward with a jerk, and but for the presence of mind of the driver would have precipitated it, with all the horrible consequences, directly into the face of the faithful guardian of the highway. Instantly the Doctor seized it by the collar, pulled it back into its upright position, exclaiming, "Hullo, Tom, what are you about? If you are drunk, you might at least keep from falling out of the gig!" Then settling with the toll-man, and muttering something about "the folly of people drinking more than they can stand," the vehicle passed on, and the interests of science were secured.

Among the standard reminiscences with which the adventurous Doctor is wont to entertain his guests on a winter evening is the one in which he tells them, in his inimitable manner, how he and his stupid friend "Tom" passed the Chelsea toll-gate.

Another prominent member of the medical profession was at one period the lessee of the Boston Theatre. The two occupations, however, never seemed to conflict with each other. He made his professional visits by day, passed the evenings at the theatre, and, at times, half the nights in his dissecting-room. One evening, after the performances at the theatre, I accompanied him to his "den," and witnessed a most skillful dissection of the "human form divine." The contrast from the crowded, glittering, noisy play-house to the solitary, sombre, and silent chamber of death was most impressive. A single lamp, suspended from the ceiling, threw into strong relief the inanimate body extended upon the table, over which the skillful surgeon, without uttering a word, went on with his grim work from midnight until dawn.

He told me that he never had a nervous apprehension or alarm but once, and that was when his light accidentally went out, leaving him in utter darkness at the moment that he made the first incision of the knife into the body before him. No sooner was the light extinguished than he received a violent blow upon his face from the hand of the corpse! He rushed from the room in an agony of terror, fully impressed with the idea that life was not extinct, and that he had pierced the flesh of a living being. Hearing, however, no further sounds in confirmation of this horrible idea, he recovered his self-possession, relit his lamp, and proceeded to investigate matters, when it appeared that the string had given way with which he had tied the arm of the corpse in an elevated position to enable him to operate more freely upon the muscular fibres. The fall had brought the dead, cold hand in unpleasant proximity with the face of the operator. Thus was the awful phenomenon explained in the most satisfactory manner.

OUR GOLD MINE IN CONNECTICUT.

I.

BENJAMIN CHESTER, Esq., with an income of three thousand per annum, derived from well-invested funds, and myself, John Wheatleigh, with an easy post in the Treasury and fifteen hundred, were old schoolmates and fast friends. Ben's quarters were always pleasant to visit. A comforting odor of tobacco greeted the nostrils as one entered the sitting-room. Many pleasant evenings have we passed together there, each sitting on two chairs, the table between us, a bottle convenient, and tumblers handy. Neither of us thought it worth while to form decided opinions regarding political affairs, so our intercourse was never marred by any quarrel. We might have gone on in the same happy way until now had not that prime cause of disturbance in all ages—a woman—taken it into her head to bless Ben with her affections. Miss Helen Banker—an orphan, residing with her uncle—was the party who threatened for a time to part us two old chums.

The old tobacco-caddy on the mantle was displaced by Helen's photograph. Our cozy evenings with pipes and the et ceteras soon vanished. Instead of enjoying such things as he already possessed, Ben began to sigh for Miss Helen and the means upon which to marry; for though the young lady had a few hundreds per annum, their united means would not reach that minimum sum—five thousand—with which alone could happiness be had in the city. How to get these odd thousands became Ben's constant thought. Although college-bred, he had not the remotest particle of practical knowledge, and the reflection did not tend to comfort him. His manner changed for the worse. Moody and taciturn, he forgot the usual hospitalities of the place, and I had soon to help myself if I wanted any thing. At last I became tired of seeing him, and finally gave him a piece of my mind, telling him that he was a fool to pine for any woman; and that unless Miss Helen would be content to begin domestic life on the scale which he could afford she was not worth having, but was a cold and calculating woman, unfitted to be the wife of any warm-hearted man like himself.

With these words of comfort I left him, and sought the society of a clever designer of bank-note embellishments who lived in Bleecker Street. In this person's room I tried to forget all about old times, and had succeeded in drawing comfort again from a meerschaum when I received a note from Ben requesting me to call upon him.

On an evening in the spring of 1862 I found myself again entering Ben's abode. I was glad to find that the cheering influences of the past

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

still lingered on the spot. The gas was burning rather dimly as I entered; the fragrant weed was burning brightly, though, in Ben's great pipe; the bottle, a beautiful old lopsided affair, was in its place; Helen's photograph was hanging by the mirror, and the tobacco-caddy was restored to its proper position. Ben greeted me warmly, and produced the materials for a regular old-fashioned evening, while I selected two chairs as usual, sitting in one with feet up on the other.

While thus preparing for comfort, Ben rose, went to the door, and locked it. This struck me as singular, but as I was decidedly on the most comfortable side of the door, it did not matter; but when Ben came to me and placed his hand on my shoulder, and faced me, I began to feel alarmed. A little cousin of mine once drowned her kitten in the well, and went about with features expressive of a strong desire to tell all about it, yet fearing to do so. This expression, magnified to suit Ben's cast of countenance, struck me as he leaned over and said:

"Wheatleigh, can you keep a secret?"

Just then my eye rested upon a bright red spark in one corner of the room, and was soon aware that the spark was the lighted end of a cigar which was being vigorously smoked.

I must have appeared bewildered, for Ben remarked:

"Oh, never mind him; he knows all about it!"

From the corner there came a deep voice reassuringly:

"Ay, ay, go on wi' yer tawkin'; doan't ye moind me."

"Come forward, Dowling," said Ben; "let me introduce my friend Mr. Wheatleigh."

Out of the corner then came a great body with a shock head of red hair, a bull-dog face, and neck to match, and took its seat at the table.

"Mr. Dowling is a genuine Yorkshire miner," said Ben, with emphasis.

"Noa, noa—it's Cornish oi be, Muster Chester; an' oi can put a hole in wi' any man," said Dowling, looking at me defiantly. His face was covered with blue dots as if from tattooing. I found afterward that they had been caused by a blast which had gone off untimely.

Up to this moment I had said nothing; but now turned to Ben and asked what this all meant?

"Wait," said he. "Dowling, show the bag." Slowly putting his hand into his breast the miner therefrom produced a small canvas bag. From this he took a small bundle of rags, and slowly unwound them until a kernel was visible in the shape of two small pieces of grayish-white mineral. These pieces he placed upon the table, eying them as if they might possibly fly away.

"Look at this," said Ben Chester, holding up one of the pieces; "what do you call it?"

"Gold," I replied, for the yellow metal could be seen in thin filaments traversing the quartz.

The miner assented with an ejaculation complimentary to my judgment, and Ben, relieved in mind, sank into his chair. The rags were again wound about the minerals, and they were stowed away in Dowling's breast. "Oi must be goin'. Oi promised the Butty to meet him at the Miners' Arms; so good-noight, Sur. Good-noight, Muster Chester;" and bowing in a dog-like way, Dowling rose and went to the door, followed by Ben. The pair held a muttered conversation ere the miner departed.

"Now, Ben, let me know what all this means," said I, as he seated himself. "Are you about investing in Colorado gold mines?"

"That gold came from a region much nearer home," he replied. "It came from—from—" he hesitated.

"From where?" I demanded.

"From Connecticut."

II.

I smoked in silence for some seconds. An old saying of a friend—Professor in a college—was, that all the minerals and metals known to man could be found in Connecticut in just sufficient quantity not to pay the cost of getting them. I disliked to dispel Ben's golden dreams, but could not resist the temptation to repeat the Professor's remark.

"Pshaw!" he said, "these college men know no more of mines and minerals than Dowling knows of the Differential Calculus. There is gold enough at the Joyce Hill Mine, which is now my property, to make us worth millions." So he was really in for it. I hoped not deeply, for Ben without his coupons would find the world very hard.

"Now, Wheatleigh," he continued, "I wish you to venture an equal amount with me in this affair. I have paid Joyce, the owner of the mine, two thousand dollars for the full mining right; he paying Dowling two hundred for the discovery of the mine's value."

"Remarkably cheap for a mine worth millions," I remarked.

"Joyce is unable to work it, and is better off with the money than with an unproductive mine on his hands. Now I propose that you come in with me on the 'ground-floor,' as they say in the street."—Ben had evidently been employing his time to advantage in the study of Wall Street idioms. "Here is a calculation," producing a paper covered with figures; and, in fact, the whole scheme. The heading, in great letters, read:

"THE JOYCE HILL GOLD MINING COMPANY.—Capital, $200,000, in 2000 shares of $100 each."

"You see," he continued, "that I am moderate in my estimate of the value of the mine. I propose that we sell a thousand shares at fifty per cent. on the par value for working capital; this will give us fifty thousand to work the mine. The other hundred thousand I propose that we divide equally."

Fifty thousand dollars' profit on an investment of one thousand, which was all that I had

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google in the savings' bank. Glorious! I became deeply interested as Chester went on:

"Here is an estimate of the profits of working the Company's mines for one year."—Here Ben's voice became quite grand and opulent.—"Here is an estimate of the daily expense and daily income, and then multiply by the working days for the yearly totals." And he read as follows:

"ESTIMATE OF THE PROFITS OF THE JOYCE HILL GOLD MINING COMPANY FOR ONE YEAR.

J. H. G. M. Co.	Dr.
To 10 miners, @ $2 per day	$20 00
1 mining captain	5 00
Drills, tools, charcoal for forge	5 27
Powder and fuse	8 34
Stamping quartz—20 tons, @ $8	160 00
Amalgamating and reducing to bricks	39 40
Wear and tear	17 50
Total daily Expenses	$255 51
	Cr.
By 20 tons quartz (estimated to yield $800 per ton), to be safe, say $550 per ton	$11,000 00
Daily net Profit	$10,744 49

"This daily profit multiplied by 300, the number of working-days in the year, gives a total of three millions, two hundred and twenty-three thousand, three hundred and forty-seven dollars, say ... $3,223,347 or a sum equal to a yearly dividend of sixteen hundred per cent. on the capital stock at par value.

"Even supposing," continued Chester, "that half of the estimated profits are not realized, we would still earn a dividend of eight hundred per cent., which ought to satisfy any reasonable person."

Now it is morally certain that, had Mr. Benjamin Chester called upon me to assist in getting up this splendid array of figures, I should have hesitated before embarking in the business; but as I was at no more trouble in the matter than merely to glance at the totals, they at once carried conviction to my mind that here, indeed, was a chance to make a fortune. I accepted Ben's proposition, and by the time we separated for the night was quite ready to fight any one who would be so rash as to dispute his calculations.

In the morning I really did experience some uneasiness at the thought that my poor thousand dollars were at the mercy of those evil influences which destroy small capital outside the savings' bank. While Ben was engaged in arranging various preliminaries I spent much time in the society of Dowling and the "Butty," which appellation I found was used by miners to designate a helper, a sort of second-mate to the other. The Butty—whose real name I never knew, as he never gave it, but even on the books was so entered—was very like Dowling in form and features; but instead of red hair he had black, and was a sort of Dowling dyed brown. He limped slightly from a "bit of rock" falling on him down a deep shaft.

By the help of sundry glasses of ale and "arf and arf" at the Miners' Arms I became quite familiar with these two persons, and taking advantage of moments when the Butty was in a pacific mood and Dowling quieted with beer, managed to pick up much information regarding mines. In fact, Dowling remarked: "One ud a thowt as Muster Wheatleigh had been a minin' all his loife." The Butty assenting with: "Poonch my 'ead, but he do larn oncommon lively!"

Dowling's account of the discovery of gold at Joyce's Hill was: that he was crossing the country from Waterbury to Danbury, looking for a job, when he was attracted by the appearance of some small seams of quartz showing in the gneiss by the road-side. He traced the quartz to a small hill on the farm of Mr. Joyce, and at the top thereof found the specimen which he had exhibited. He bargained with Joyce and came to the city, where he met Mr. Chester at the office of a friend in Pine Street, and with the result before the reader.

I quieted all questioning on the part of my mind as to how on earth so valuable a mine could be sold so cheaply, and as to why Dowling had not filled his pockets with the metal instead of taking two small pieces of quartz only, by reflecting that both these things had made matters more favorable for myself and Chester, as no excitement had arisen to prevent our securing the auriferous deposit.

Our Prospectus, arranged by Ben and myself, appeared in a few days after our agreement. This document embodied the financial statement already given; and besides, after dealing with the history of gold from earliest ages, and comparing the yield of various mines, gave the proposed stockholders some idea of mining practically. This last detail was gotten up by myself, and I made free use of all the mining terms which I had learned from Dowling and the Butty. I have reason to believe that when I stated that "an open stope crossing the adit level at an angle of forty-five degrees" was the most feasible way of getting at the "champion vein" I was in error. And also when I stated that the "mundic" was rich in gold. Also when I said "the sinking of a trial shaft on the lode would occupy but a few days." Gneiss, twin-brother of Granite, thy tough texture was then unknown to me!

Our Prospectus contained no report from any geologist or professional man. Ben suggested that we should pay one ten dollars to go and take a look at the place; but I objected on the score of economy, and in truth did not wish to look our gift-horse in the mouth too closely, now that our money was at stake.

For some days after the issuing of the Prospectus we had no result, but by degrees people began to visit our office—a desk in a friendly lawyer's office in Pine Street—and in a short time we had disposed of $20,000 of stock at fifty per cent, which gave us $10,000 for the treasury, and enabled Ben to inform Dowling and the Butty, who had in the mean time been sitting on the stairs smoking clay-pipes day after day, that they must hold themselves in readiness for opening the Joyce Hill Gold Mine.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Regard for the privacy of retired wealth prevents my naming the President and Directors of the Company. They were men of good standing and capital, which last they risked not in the Joyce Hill Gold Mining Company. Their stock was "free" in consideration of their names. Ben was General Manager, and I was to help him if necessary.

Our expedition to the mine moved, viâ the New York and New Haven and the Housatonic Railroads, on an afternoon in June. Dowling, the Butty, five miners, Ben, and myself, with our mining implements, powder, and fuse, were dropped toward evening at a station consisting of one store and dwelling combined, a freight-house, a wood-shed, and a pump. Joyce's Hill was distant five miles by turnpike. The station was the nearest store-keeping place to the mine except a village called Hake's Corners, which was three miles from it in another direction. We demanded supper, but the store-keeper, Canfield by name, told us that he had nothing but molasses and hard bread. We asked for eggs. The hens all laid their eggs so far under the barn that none were to be had until in good time they came forth as chickens. We asked for milk. The cow had died in an attempt to digest half a barrel of cold boiled potatoes. We inquired whether we could be taken to the mine that evening. The horses were both lame in the off fore-foot from losing their shoes the day before. Could we have beds? No; a party of delegates to a religious convention a mile down the road had taken them all. Evidently Canfield was not inclined to be hospitable. He put up his shutters almost before we had finished the hard bread and molasses, and said that he was going down the road to the convention; but I suspect that the sight of the many black bottles which, with Dowling's approval, were circulating among the men, had much to do with his early-closing movement.

Before he was fairly off the Butty offered to "poonch his 'ead," and afterward made the same proposal to all in turn. It was with much trouble that Ben and myself managed to get our men abed on the platform of the freight-house. They were very noisy and tipsy. They sang songs, Dowling acting as leader, and awoke the echoes with strange howls. With Ben I went to the wood-shed, and selecting the softest pile of chips, and spreading our coats and rugs, for the night was chilly, we prepared to rough it for the time. We had hardly lain down before a pale-faced little woman came from the house, and offered us a shake-down by the fire in the kitchen, but we thanked her, and preferred to remain where we were. By degrees our men howled themselves hoarse, and dropped off to sleep; and at last the silence which at night is in the country so profound weighed upon us in deep slumber.

III.

Early next morning we were astir; Ben quite stiff from his hard bed, and myself in rather a poor condition. Five miles of road were to be traversed, so our sleepy followers were aroused, and in a short time we were in motion. The morning air, laden with the perfume of the early flowers of summer, was refreshing, as we marched along past farm-house and barn, brook and pond. In an hour we arrived at the Joyce homestead—a very fair sample of a New England farm-house. It was to the left as we went to Hake's Corners, and stood back from the road about two rods, with a veranda on three sides. It had two dormer-windows in front, and tall chimneys at the ends. Joyce's Hill, a huge boulder of gneiss, fringed at the base with shrubbery, rose out of the meadow land in front; and a path from the garden gate led across the road, through another gate, and thence across the meadow to a small bridge, with single plank and hand-rail, over Goose Creek, a tributary of the Housatonic. The distance from the farm-house to the hill was not more than a quarter of a mile.

We were welcomed by Mr. and Mrs. Joyce, who had been expecting us, and were soon seated at the table, where a breakfast, good of its kind, awaited us. Thirteen different kinds of "preserves," saleratus biscuit, and salt ham, were the principal articles of food, together with coffee very strong and very bad. There were no children about the house, and I could not help pitying the farmer because there were none.

We visited the mine after breakfast, and something like disappointment was felt by me in not finding gold in plenty at the spot. Dowling pointed out two seams of quartz, each about an inch in thickness, in the gneiss. These seams crossed the hill from east to west, and were soon lost in the alluvial of the meadow, the hill not being more than three hundred feet in length and one hundred in width. A place six feet long and four feet wide was marked out by Dowling; and as soon as Joyce returned from the station with our tools and powder the miners began drilling. The first charge was fired before night, and was the signal for all the inhabitants within hearing to rush to the spot where the New Yorkers were mining for gold. It was many days before continuous labor was resumed by the people about the mine, owing to their time being taken up in watching our operations. Nothing but a narrow escape of one of them from a flying bit of gneiss, after a charge had been fired, dispersed them finally.

The view from the hill was very beautiful. The country fell away and showed the valley of Goose Creek lined with sleepy-looking farm-houses, orchards, and groves of trees. Here and there, with a back-ground of low hills, could be seen white objects, with cross and vane, marking the spot where some village had taken root, and in the shape of church-steeples was throwing out branches toward heaven.

Chester and myself secured lodgings with the Joyces, Dowling and the Butty found board at the blacksmith's near by, and the men dis-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tributed themselves about the vicinity until our miners' boarding-house was ready. The Joyce farm-house was the scene of a great gathering in the evening, all the neighbors coming to see the new arrivals. We were put to much trouble to invent evasive answers to all the questions put to us. Our parentage, age, condition, etc., were all looked into. One gentleman, who had control of the morals of the place, and who certainly looked very serious, inquired whether or not we intended to erect a distillery, and was only half satisfied that such was not our object in coming to the Goose Creek district, as it seemed that the inhabitants were all very fond of whisky. Our room was lighted by one of the dormer-windows in front, and was very cheesy-smelling, owing to the adjoining garret being used as a "cheese-room." But we slept well for all that, and in the morning I returned to the city, leaving Ben to prosecute the work.

So far I have been so ungallant as to omit any particular mention of Miss Helen Banker. Ben gave me a letter for her, and, in presenting it, I had an opportunity of observing her closely for the first time. She was a good-looking girl of twenty-four, with a stylish manner, tasteful dress, and thin lips. Evidently Ben, in the matrimonial duet, would be second violin. So much determination was not in Miss Helen's face for nothing. She was very polite; and, in a sweet voice, asked me all about the Joyce Hill Gold Mining Company, and about mining in general. She asked me, also, for the address of a dealer in minerals, as she wished some specimens to compare with some others which she possessed. She inquired as to the meaning of "Bull" and "Bear," and as to stocks in general; and I left her feeling that she was a very clever woman whom I should like very much as a friend.

I found that many of the stockholders in the Joyce Hill Gold Mining Company expected me to return with enough gold to pay a handsome dividend by way of a beginning, and was obliged to satisfy them with descriptions of the quartz veins, and the prospect of finding the "champion vein" into which they no doubt led. I had brought with me some pieces of the quartz, and Stiefelbacher, a German assayer, declared that they would yield $550 to the ton.

June and July passed away, Chester coming to the city occasionally, visiting Helen, dropping in at the office, trying to sell some stock, and keeping things pretty well agoing. He had gone down four feet in six weeks. Rather slow progress, as he admitted, but Dowling was confident that the rock would become softer as we descended.

The $10,000 was gradually being absorbed by wages, tools, powder, and the necessary miners' buildings, and a pile of gneiss, hard as the nether millstone, was all that there was as yet to show for it. The vein of quartz remained the same. No gold was visible to the eye. Stiefelbacher proposed that a quartz mill be erected on Goose Creek, but as the proportion of quartz obtained was about three pounds to the ton of gneiss, the proposition was thought premature. Our stockholders by degrees became weary of climbing up stairs to our office, and altogether things began to present a blue appearance. Just at this time something occurred which threatened to wind us up completely.

A learned Professor from New Haven, not employed by us to report upon the mine or even invited to visit it, came over one day with a party of students, and in their presence, and in the presence of Dowling and the Butty and of the miners, declared that no gold ever had been, or ever would be found at the Joyce Hill Gold Mine. Ben wrote me this, and seemed in low spirits. Even the offer of the Butty to "dowse Professor in t' creek" for trying to take the bread out of honest men's mouths did not serve to comfort him. Soon after this a communication, copied from a New Haven paper, appeared, in which the promoters of our enterprise were designated as either knaves or fools, with a leaning toward the former appellation. Stiefelbacher, the assayer, became furious against the Professor; and to prove that gold had been found at the mine, brought to the office a few grains in a paper, and again offered to put up the quartz mill.

Not a soul came to the office after this unfortunate affair, and Ben was obliged to discharge all the miners except Dowling and the Butty, whom he kept on in hopes of better times. Neither our President nor Directors offered to advance one dollar toward getting down to the champion vein, and quite snubbed Ben and myself in the street.

But in the midst of this impending ruin of our hopes Helen Banker stood by us like a Trojan. She came to the office, and held audiences with Stiefelbacher about quartz, until that conceited Teuton fancied that his long hair had captivated her. She encouraged Ben to dig on, and at last invited herself to spend a few days with Mrs. Joyce, and went to the mine armed with sketch-book, and accompanied by Ben, who, like a fond though unfortunate being, hung about her always.

Some days after her arrival at the mine I visited the Goose Creek district again, and found Ben and Helen looking rather melancholy at the sight of the great heap of rock which had come out of so small a hole. Dowling and the Butty took the world easy—the Butty reclining on his back, pipe in mouth, near the windlass; and Dowling now and then going down the not very deep shaft, by means of a rude ladder, to bring up a bottle which he had concealed in some cool grot in the side of the excavation. I went to the hole and tried to think that it was worth what it had cost. I went down the ladder and examined the quartz seams, which on both sides and across the bottom of the shaft were plainly visible. Just before the work had been stopped a shot had been fired in the bottom, and it was now a mass of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google broken rock. By the time that I had finished my inspection Miss Helen and Mr. Chester had returned to the house, and Dowling, in honor of my visit, was engaged in emptying a bottle, offering me a share with encouraging words:

"Doan't ee give it up, Muster Wheatleigh. Whoy, now, we ain't made more nor a scraatch loike in t' hill yet."

And the Butty added:

"Poonch my 'ead, but oi do think as how this be just foolin' wi' the thing."

But I turned away and would listen to no comfort, convinced that the Joyce Hill Gold Mine was a very hard case.

We had a dull evening at Joyce's, the arrival of a box marked "Books" from the station being the only thing which seemed to revive Miss Helen's spirits; for even she had showed signs of the blues. Just after tea Dowling and the Butty called to say that they were going to Hake's Corners for the night, it being their custom to take possession of that town periodically. They had been occupying the boarding-house near the shaft, but as there was nothing there to steal we had no fear about leaving the mine out of doors all night.

By nine o'clock we had all retired, Ben and myself to the cheesy room, and Miss Helen to the one below it on the ground-floor next the parlor. This room was reserved for guests of high degree, and no wandering bachelor ever occupied it.

IV.

There was not much prospect of sleep for us; but by degrees I fell into a doze, and was awakened about midnight by one of the horses kicking in the barn. Finding that the moon's rays were falling on my face I went to the window to draw down the green paper shade. The view from the window was very beautiful by moonlight. The hill and the creek and the meadow were in full sight, and wonderfully calm and silent they all appeared under the soft light. As I was turning away an object moved on the path leading to the mine, and presently a tall white figure emerged from the green wood at the bottom of the hill, and advanced slowly toward the house. The figure seemed to glisten in the moonlight, and moved gracefully along.

Wondering what errand any one could have at the mine at that time of night, and not at all alarmed—for I was no believer in ghosts—I watched the figure advancing. When it came to the bridge it halted, and seemed to gaze upon the quiet scene, and I noticed that it had one hand clasped over the other as if in meditation. Presently it came on again, and I observed a dark stain down the white below the hands. It came on toward the house through the gate on the other side of the road, and then I could see that the stain was red, and that the hands were clasped as if in pain. The figure, now quite close to the house, stopped suddenly and looked up at my window. I returned its gaze, though I confess that I was beginning to feel uncomfortable, and saw a pale face, which looked up for a moment, almost shrouded in the white robe. The figure then turned away and disappeared around the corner of the house.

I listened a while, half expecting to hear some one knock; but the silence was unbroken, and I gradually fell into a sleep, which was much disturbed by visions of white figures with bloody hands.

At breakfast, at which Miss Helen did not appear owing to what Mrs. Joyce called "a dreffful headache," I told my ghost story. Mrs. Joyce—who appeared to have some superstitious feelings—to account for the cruel marks which were found upon her hands, at once concluded that the ghost of a poor girl who had been drowned in Goose Creek years before, accidentally as was supposed, had come to earth. Mr. Joyce "reckoned it was Malviny Jones agoing over to see Mrs. Thompson who was very low." Ben laughed at the whole affair, and declared that it was all a dream on my part.

Miss Banker held an audience with Ben just after breakfast, and the result of it was, that he determined to sink one thousand dollars more, if necessary, in the mine. Her pluck and determination were very creditable, but it seemed to me a perfectly hopeless case, and as we went over to the shaft I told Ben so. He said that he could not refuse her, she seemed so confident of success. Fortunately Dowling and the Butty, with another miner who had been hanging about Hake's Corners, returned as they had promised, and they were overjoyed at Ben's orders to set to work again.

The first thing done was to clear away the rubbish at the bottom of the shaft. While the men went at this work Ben and I sat upon the grass outside the heap of rock.

Suddenly there came a great shout from the mine, and out rushed Dowling with the Butty after him in tremendous excitement. Placing a bit of quartz each in our hands they rushed back again, and again returned with more of the same kind. We had struck gold at last! There it was in rounded, tear-like masses sticking out of the quartz, or in sprays and spangles thoroughly pervading it. In less than ten minutes we had taken out $200 worth when, that particular pocket being exhausted, the supply gave out. Dowling was in high glee:

"Look theer now, what did us tell thee? Professor be a danged fool, Butty!"

"Aw'd loike to poonch 'ead of him," answered that worthy.

Ben rushed off to tell Helen the news, while I walked about feeling at least six inches taller than before. The $50,000 loomed up brightly ahead. Gold had turned dull earth to heaven again.

No more work was done that day, the miners being quite too far gone with excitement and Dowling's bottle for further execution.

Ben and Miss Helen and myself went to the city next day, a much more jovial party than we had been. Our desk was covered with the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google gold, and soon the news was about that the Joyce Hill Gold Mine had proved very rich. Our old stock-holders came about us again. Our President and Directors once more patronized us. Stiefelbacher wrote an article utterly demolishing the New Haven Professor. Our stock went up in price. Within a month we had sold it all, and Benjamin Chester and self found ourselves richer by at least $35,000 each after deducting all expenses. All this time the mine lay idle, as we were too much engaged in selling the stock to attend to it; but Dowling had orders to keep watch on the shaft so that no one could carry away any of the precious metal.

I had the pleasure of assisting at Ben's wedding very soon, and saw the pair off for Philadelphia and Washington. I received a letter from Ben in a day or two, and he advised me to quietly retire from the J. H. G. M. Co., giving no reason for his advice. As I had made a snug sum by the affair I felt willing to leave well alone; and, installing our President's nephew and a son of one of our Directors as managing men, I obtained leave from the Department and embarked for Europe, determined to enjoy my good fortune. Knowing that marriage would quite extinguish Ben as an individual, I did not look forward to seeing him very often in the future.

V.

In Paris, moderately partaking of its pleasures, I gradually forgot the J. H. G. M. Co. Occasionally, after a hearty supper, I would dream that the shaft had fallen in, but daylight quite removed the impression. No danger of those cast-iron sides ever giving way.

One morning I noticed in the list of Americans arrived in Paris the names of Mr. and Mrs. Chester, New York, and forthwith betook myself to their hotel. As I have remarked, I did not expect Ben to come out very largely after his marriage, but I was not prepared for the total eclipse of his usual qualities. He seemed regularly cowed and uncomfortable. Madame, on the contrary, was all life and spirits. She looked exceedingly well in her new toilet, and was evidently enjoying herself. I tried hard to arouse in Ben some of his old cordial manner, and told him all that had occurred since he left me on his wedding trip; how Stiefelbacher had triumphed over the Professor; and how I found Dowling and the Butty sound asleep under the fence when I went to give the new men possession.

"Have you seen any late papers from home?" he inquired. I replied that I had not.

He brought me a newspaper with a paragraph marked in pencil, which was as follows:

"A Sharp Transaction.—We understand that the Joyce Hill Gold Mine, of which our readers have heard so much, and the stock of which rose so rapidly in value recently, has proved utterly valueless. The Company, after expending a large amount in mining, has abandoned the enterprise owing to the total absence of the metal. From the expeditious way in which the original promoters got rid of their stock when gold was discovered, it is suspected that they had, for reasons of their own, in mining parlance, salted the claim!"

Was it possible? I looked at Ben; evidently he had had no part in such a thing. I glanced at Mrs. Chester. She was trying to look composed; but at last there was a twitching about the lips, and presently she broke out into a burst of laughter, in which, spite of myself, I joined, followed by Ben. When we had recovered our composure Mrs. Chester quietly told me, what Ben had unaccountably neglected to do, that she herself had placed the gold quartz in the bottom of the shaft on the night previous to our finding it, having arrived in time in the package marked "Books."

"Then you were the ghost?" I asked.

"Yes; and pale enough I must have appeared to the gentleman in the window, for I cut my wrist upon the sharp rocks in getting out of the shaft, and was in a dreadful fright, and half-inclined to beckon you to assist me in stanching the wound."

"She would not have told us about it to this day," remarked Ben, "had not I questioned her very closely as to how she obtained the ugly cut. As soon as I knew the truth I wrote to you to sell out."

"You forgive me?" inquired Mrs. Chester.

"With all my heart," I answered. "You had certainly great temptation; but I wonder how our old friends at home will treat us when we return."

"You will find that they have forgotten us completely in the new excitement of oil wells."

And so it proved; for on returning not one person had a stone to cast at us, though the mine would have furnished abundance. Our President and Directors were all engaged in petroleum, and invited us to take a seventy-ninth interest in the one thousandth share in a hundred barrel well.

Mrs. Chester is a leader in her set, Ben following her discreetly. Dowling and the Butty haunted the mine long after the last blow was struck, and then went on voyages of discovery along the Housatonic. The former will probably find another gold mine as soon as he feels in want of a job, and has those two pieces of gold quartz in his pocket, for, without question, he was the original deceiver with regard to the Joyce Hill Mine.

Short, wiry grass is growing about the mouth of the old shaft, and creeping plants are spreading over the base of the mound of gneiss which, hard and unyielding, and settling down not one inch, stands as a monument to mark the site of our Gold Mine in Connecticut.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ADAM GORROW.

THE Editor laid down the manuscript with a smile. Certainly the author of "The Distinguishing Traits of a Christian Character"—a ponderous mass of foolscap, peppered with exclamation points, quotation marks, and the blackest of black italics—and of the accompanying note (on half a sheet, and innocent of postage for an "immediate reply"), which modestly suggested for the Christian Character that it "should be run through the Magazine, and afterward issued in book form," would have been simply confounded had he seen that smile.

The wind, turning a leaf, had turned blackly into sight a paragraph of the quoted italics:

"I have no proof from the Bible that all infants are to be damned; still they can be saved only by the free grace of God, reigning through the righteousness of Christ. They are originally sinners, and deserve the curse."

Therefore the Editor had arrested the manuscript on its way to the waste-basket, and laid it down with a smile. It was a singular smile. There might have been a little indignation in it but for its studied calm; there might have been much indifference in it but for its intensity; there was neither the one nor the other; there was simply the curdled bitterness of years.

"There is one thing which has more resemblance to ourselves even than our face, and that is our physiognomy; but there is yet another thing which more resembles us than this, and that is our smile," says Victor Hugo. If Déruchette smiling was simply Déruchette, Adam Gorrow's smile then was absolutely Adam Gorrow. That was as one interpreted. There was a place where it was not. Still it was not a promising smile. As he crumpled the manuscript in his hand some words ground between his teeth; they sounded like—"Cursed cant!"

His head dropped into his hands—it was a favorite position of his; and there for an hour in the gathering shadows of the little dingy office he sat and mused.

Men like Adam Gorrow take solid comfort in such hours. A thinker and a skeptic of long, slow growth—hardly a man to be "reformed," one would fancy. Out of the fallen fancies and ruined hopes of forty-eight years he had riveted systems for himself in welded links: "L'experience de beaucoup d'opinions donne à l'esprit beaucoup de flexibilité et l'affermit dans celles qu'il croit les meilleures." He thanked Joubert for that, relishing the words as only skepticism could. The quaint old legends of Eden and Ararat, the pleasant rhythm of the Prophets, the dream of Nazareth, the superstition of the Cross—he knew them through. He had trusted them, anatomatized them, recoiled from them, forgiven them. He could listen blandly, hat in hand, to the exhortations of a clergyman. He could accept a tract with graceful thanks—it was excellent to light cigars. He could stroll now and then, on comfortable Sunday mornings, into St. Somebody's to hear the music and count the audience; the sublimity of the sense of pity was really refreshing. He was a "Liberal Thinker." He was a "large-minded man." None of your Calvin and Servetus dogmas for him. He objected to brimstone. Humanity was his study, Charity his gospel.

Accordingly, he sat there that night, rolling that sentence—the picked flaw of a mosaic, the representative of an extreme, the voice of a body of Christians who (Laus Deo!) are few and faint in Zion, the offshoot of a magnificent stupidity beneath the serious notice of a child—as a sweet morsel under his tongue, clustering around it the jeers of Hobbes and Voltaire, suffering it to compress the scorn and dye the bitterness of years. Had the subject been Eels instead of Eternity, would it have affected our day's marketing?

Verily it may chance that Adam Gorrow had company in the darkening, dingy office. We have heard of one who wandereth up and down upon the earth, and goeth to and fro in it. We have heard as well of one who stood in the way before Balaam and his ass. The face was shining, but the sword was drawn.

There was a curious inlet on the harbor coast, shut in by tortuous rocks—they were jagged and black; the water seethed there, and was sucked into unseen caves and crevices with a hissing sound. One house stood apart from its neighbors, facing the sea. It was a high house, and would have had a cold look—the salt of the spray having worn its paint—but for the studied brightness of the curtains and a morning-glory on the piazza trellis. There was one window down stairs from which the shades were always drawn, the sweep and tracery of muslin faint against the glass, and a pictured back-ground shifting with stereoscopic changes. The passers had a way of crossing the street to look in at that window, especially if the night were cold.

The favorite group was one of two: a woman and a baby. The room had a pretty droop of acorns on the walls and carpet, pictures, and a Clytie; a sewing-table and an open grate; ruins of block-houses; little red shoes with tagless strings, and the toes rubbed brown, thrown under the chairs; a few flowers, and a kitten. The woman and the baby used to sit by the fire; the profile of one and the pink feet of the other held out for warming were the fine points of this picture.

This was the place where Adam Gorrow's smile was not Adam Gorrow.

He stood looking in a moment that night, either because, warm with his quick walk from the horse-cars, he was in no haste to brave the sting of the night-air, or because he liked the picture. It was probably a little of both.

Yet he stood long, and the sight was pleasant. It was always pleasant, waiting just so for him when the work of the day was over; but to-night, by reason of some chill either in the air or in himself, it seemed to deepen in a

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google glow of color and warmth. He said something half aloud as he turned the key about its being "worth while."

A door opened softly before he was fairly in the hall. His wife always came out to meet him.

"Late to-night, Adam."

"A little—yes. I will tell you about it presently. Wolcott in yet?"

"No. I don't exactly understand; he is apt to be here by this time."

"Some college spree, probably; he will come in the course of the evening. However, I wanted the boy here early, to see about the yacht and to-morrow's fishing. Rebecca, what's the matter with your eyes? Do you expect me to be brought home, like the unfortunate little boys in the tracts who fish Sundays, my body in the cold embrace of death and my soul in brimstone? Come! Dot is growing as blue as a morning-glory out here in the cold."

He drew her in by the fire, kissing her cheek and the baby's, as was his custom. She shivered a little under his touch, and made him no reply.

He took a cigar when dinner was over, drew up his study-chair by the grate, and waited for her, watching her idly through the puffs of fragrant smoke, as she tripped about the room picking up the red shoes and the block-houses, and making ready for Dot's half-hour's "toasting" before bedtime.

She was a little woman, built like a reed. To look at the suppleness of her fingers, the veins on her forehead, the childlike curve of her lips, one would have said that a breath would sway her. Watching her eyes—they were gray and steadfast—one would think of a rock in a tempest, perhaps. There were a few lines upon her forehead: she had seen storms. Her husband's face was something different in her presence always. At the turn of her head or flutter of her dress it softened and changed. Certain expressions of his she never saw.

She came and sat down by him presently, near to the fire, hushing the baby to sleep in the golden glow, hushing and talking together. She had a pleasant voice. Her husband was apt to chat at this hour whether he had any thing to say or not, for the sake of hearing it. To-night there was something to say.

"Rebecca, here's a choice morsel for you."

He tossed over to her a bit of the crumpled manuscript.

"I staid an hour in the office masticating it; the delicate, sulphury flavor is delicious."

He watched her while she read it. Something which he expected to find in her face was probably missing, for he elevated his eyebrows with the peculiar twitch of a man who turns an unexpected corner on a windy day.

"Well?"

"Well!"

She laid down the paper with an amused little smile.

"What do you want me to say about it, Adam?"

The question seemed to irritate a little.

"What do I want you to say? I don't want any thing in particular."

"Oh!"

"Except to know, as a scientific curiosity, what you think of it."

"I think it is very funny."

He twirls his mustache discontentedly.

"You certainly have a remarkable use of adjectives, Rebecca."

"I really can't think of any other, Adam."

"But you?—you delude your poor little brain into the idea that you are one of these people. Now, I really should like to know what you do with such doctrine."

She held up the fragment of paper, twisted into a paper boat for Dot, her eyes twinkling. He bit his lip.

"But think of Dot burning for ever and ever—look at her now!—looks as if she deserved it, doesn't she?"

Poor Dot, sublimely unconscious that she was made the subject of theological discussion, was concentrating her energies of soul, mind, and body at that particular moment on a spirited endeavor to get all ten of her pink toes into her mouth at once. Mrs. Gorrow broke into a merry laugh. Her husband's eyebrows arched as if he had turned a second corner. At least he had expected to shock her. He had seen her shocked once or twice thoroughly, and had never forgotten the sight. She caught Dot up in her neck for a sudden kiss, and answered him then.

"Adam, do let us talk about something sensible. I really thought you must be joking with me. I don't know a thing—now, Adam, you know I don't, and you're just trying to tease me—about 'original sin' and 'deserving the curse,' or whether Dot is 'one of the elect.' But I know that if a little staring bundle like that, that doesn't know enough not to sit down in the fire-place and build block-houses out of the coals, has done any thing under the moon that it deserves to be punished forever and forever and forever, for there would be just as many kittens and snails in hell as there were babies, and that's all I want to know about it!"

"But this sentence is a direct quotation from an Orthodox minister in good and regular standing, Rebecca. That is what they teach."

"My minister never told me any such thing," said Mrs. Gorrow, with her childlike smile. "Besides, if he had, it would have made no difference to me. The Bible doesn't say so. It says"—she hesitated.

"What?"

"You don't like to hear about the Bible sometimes, you know, Adam. I don't like to bother you. I was going to say something about the little children that He took in His arms. How I always did wish that Wolcott and Dot had been there!"

She seemed to have forgotten that she was speaking aloud, her voice growing dreamy and low.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Her husband looked at her; then turned his head abruptly away. He hesitated, perhaps, to break the sweet serenity of her face, for he did not speak at once. "That a God of love could ever have created such a world on such principles of government is a moral impossibility. Look at it — torture, horror, blood, misery, slaves, prisons, gibbets, battle-fields, sickness, agony, death."

"And sin," she said.

"One long drama of misery from cradle to coffin," he continued, without noticing the interruption, "and nine-tenths of us rewarded for it with eternal torments."

"Why, I didn't know nine-tenths of the people went to hell, Adam! Who said so?"

He did not tell her; perhaps he could not recollect at the moment.

"The sufferings of brute creatures alone," he went on in the hard, set way with which he was wont to dwell on the old arguments—"why, some of the greatest thinkers of the world have based their defense of atheism on that, Rebecca. And you—why, you can not see so much as a dray-horse beaten but it haunts you for twenty-four hours. Think of the awful story of those ages before the appearance of man; a world peopled with dumb things, drowning in deluges, crushed in earthquakes, seething in volcanic fires, preying upon each other—the rocks tell the tale—living, and agonizing, and turning to dust, for what purpose? for what end? Give me the mystery of this hideous lavishness of pain! Let your Christian preachers answer if they can."

He had forgotten that his wife was there, perhaps. He did not often seek to wreck her simple faith; neither would he destroy his baby's rattle.

She looked up; a puzzled cloud which had been in her eyes while he spoke fading as one caught her full face, by reason, it seemed, of the cut of her lips—one neutralized the other.

"Adam, I don't like to think about those horrible things. I can not answer you. You argue better than I. But some things are true, Adam, after all."

She stood up a moment looking into the fire; then kissed him once, and went up with Dot to put her to bed.

She was gone some time. He leaned back in his chair with folded arms and knotted forehead, thinking.

No, she could not argue with him—the idea of Rebecca's arguing with any body! Poor little thing! It was a pretty faith of hers; he would not disturb it again. If she lost that expression of the mouth she would lose half her beauty. Besides, it suited her—the faith.

He took a fresh cigar just then, remembering against his will how it suited her, reading over the story of their married life. It had not been an easy life for her, poor child! Little more than a girl when it began, those days up in Addison came roughly to her. A drudge of a teacher on six hundred a year can not help it if his wife does her own work all day and sits up all night with sick babies. He had not been able to help it (except, be it recorded, by taking his turn of the vigils). He had looked on, and broken his heart in looking. Then there was his trial of medicine, and chemistry, and surveying, and, he hardly liked to think what not besides, and the failures. Then that long sickness in the mountains; she never left him from beginning to end. After that the slow working into authorship and editorship, the barren uncertainty of the future, the growing, clamoring children, the pinching, the planning, the hoping, the fearing, the toiling of years.

Of late there was Wolcott. The boy had been like other college boys; no worse. But it had troubled his mother. Through the whole her face shone down on him that night as he thought it over, the same; pale, quiet, with steadfast eyes, with trustful smile. He could remember times when his manhood had broken down, when he had gone alone to groan and swear and sob, to curse the future and curse the past, and curse the fate that made him, when she had stolen in to put her arms around his neck and say, "It will all be right, Adam." Right! What had he known of right? or she? Well, what had she?

He could remember that year singled from all the years—they had loved those children. Between one spring and autumn he had stood with clenched hand three times beside a grave. It nearly killed Rebecca. He used to wake up night after night and find her in the cold on her knees. He asked her once, half savagely, what she was doing. "Bearing it," she said. If ever a fancy held reality, that was real to her. He had seen her still, white face grow rapt, her smile come like sunshine at mention of their names. She ceased after a while to go often to the spot where the poor little dust was lying; she said she thought that they came into the nursery where they used to play and heard her when she sang over her work, so she went instead and sat there. Adam Gorrow had never scoffed, he could have told you, at the "silly, pleasant notion;" he would as soon have trampled the daisies on his children's graves.

In all this time, from the hour that he had slipped her little marriage ring upon her finger, through poverty and pain, through weariness, weakness, discouragement, through days and nights in which he had come to her—and he remembered that they were not few, but many—disheartened and peevish, manlike, adding his burden to hers, through very irritation that he was powerless to relieve her of it, he had never received from her a word of petulance, an impatient look. Through it all, from first to last—on what hidden manna feeding who could tell?—she had resisted the subtle under-current of his Pantheism, keeping the simple beliefs of her childhood as purely, as unquestioningly, as she learned them at her mother's knee. On what strength stronger than his did this fragile creature lean? What love dearer than his?

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

What wisdom wiser? She! why she had never so much as turned a leaf of Paine; was dumb before the sentimentality of Rénan; had scarcely heard of Strauss, of Paulus, of Descartes, He could shatter her arguments as he would crush a child's cob-house with his heel. He was her husband. She loved him, as woman loves, implicitly. The wisdom of ancients, the romance of heroes, meant to her but Adam Gorrow. What, then, was this with which she had withstood him all these years? How dared she not believe the mathematics of his nicely-demonstrated theories?

Such questionings had thrust themselves into his honest home before; as he treated them that night, so he had treated them before.

He rose with a smile—his characteristic smile—threw the stump of his cigar into the grate, paced the room twice, took a book and began to read—upside down. By what he would have called "a chance" the leaf on which his eyes fell was bound upside down:

"I am ready to acknowledge that of the intellectual conception of God as Creator, Cause, Germinant Life, Lord of the Universe, etc., I am not prepared to assert or deny any thing—I know nothing. . . . . If I were compelled, in intellectual gladiatorship, to surrender them all I should not feel in the smallest degree dismayed. My God is not the philosopher's God."

"Hum! honest, to be sure. Robertson was a man; there was no denying that." Exactly why the book was shut with a snap Adam Gorrow would have found it difficult to explain. At least he could have had no objection to the discovery that a man was honest? A volume of Voltaire, which he had left under a pile of magazines, served as substitute, and turning the leaves hurriedly, he read:

"Nay, further, in questions of great consequence a reasonable man will think it concerns him to remark lower probabilities and presumptions than these; such as amount to no more than showing one side of a question to be as supposable and credible as the other; nay, such as but amount to much less even than this. For numberless instances might be mentioned respecting the common pursuits of life where a man would be thought, in a literal sense, distracted who would not act, and with great application too, not only upon an even chance, but upon much less, and where the probability or chance was greatly against his succeeding."

Cheated again! The "Analogy," not Voltaire; he remembered now having taken it down for reference in that critique last night. The old argument of Butler's served him food for many a witty sarcasm and bon mot. Nevertheless it haunted him uneasily, like a ghost with whom he had made an unfair bargain.

Throwing the book impatiently upon the table he knocked off another, something of Rebecca's. As he stooped to pick it up, the strong gaslight fell upon the words:

"Who art thou, O man! that repliest against God?"

He strode to the window, his reading finished for that night.

While he stood there drumming restlessly upon the sill, and looking out to the low line of surf that wavered through the blackness, a sharp ring at the door pealed through the house, and his wife came in a moment after with a letter.

"From Wolcott. If he should be sick? I'm afraid—"

She went to the light, standing with her back to her husband, reading.

"What is it?"

She made him no reply.

"What is it, Rebecca?"

She read on in silence. She read through in silence; dropped slowly into a chair. He picked up the paper from the carpet where it had fallen: he read it twice, he read it three times, gathering its meaning:

"My dear Mother,—You are expecting me home as usual to spend Sunday, and I have hardly the heart to tell you that you must expect in vain; for to-morrow, for next week, for how long, if there is any God, He only knows. When you read this I shall be on the way to California, Brazil, China—I don't know and I don't care which; somewhere out of sight and out of mind. The long and short of it is, I am expelled from college.

"I've been a wild fellow, mother, and broken your heart, and cursed myself for the drinking, and debts, and gambling, and all the rest of it. I used to be sorry for that, and hated to look at your photograph after a spree, and meant to sober down and behave myself since your last letter.

"But this thing they've kicked me out for is worse than all that—so much worse that I haven't the pluck to say it out and have it over with, and so I'm writing this nonsense like a fool, and the lines are all running crooked—something must be the matter with the lamp.

"But I suppose it's got to come.

"Twelve of us fellows—most of them wretched profligates and confirmed infidels, a few good-hearted, thoughtless chaps, who were only drunk and unwarned—went one night last week into an unfurnished room, double-locked the door, muffled the windows, and held a mock communion service.

"There! it's out now.

"Mother, upon my word I didn't know what they wanted of me. I had taken too much; when I found out what it was I hadn't the pluck to back out.

"It is only for your sake that the thought of it drives me to desperation, night after night, as I lie awake. Father won't care, of course. If he is angry at the expulsion, he can comfort himself with Emerson and the rest of those books on the lower shelf. I am so used to his way of looking at these things that it never would have seemed any thing but a rich joke to me if your face had not hung up there above all the glare and noise, like a face in a cloud, and looked—and looked—and looked.

"The thing has leaked out, nobody knows how, and I and the rest out of college with it. If I came home and saw your eyes, I believe it would drive me into insanity. I'm off, the Fates know how or where. I am going to begin some other sort of life, and live it till you have forgotten your miserable Wolcott."

"The boy is a fool, Rebecca!"

She had no answer for him.

"Rebecca!"

He turned to see what was the matter. She was sitting just as she had sunk into the low chair, her hands dropped like the hands of the dead. The attitude did not strike him as it might at another time; he began to pace the room stormily, heedless of it.

"Such a disgrace—public expulsion! I am ashamed of him! And to crown it by that silly notion of running away—I should never have expected it of a son of mine!"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Her eyes shot out a sudden light; she half rose from her chair, her hands raised as if to gesture him away.

"Disgrace, Adam! It is not that—not that! Oh, Adam, how could he?—my little boy. And he used to kneel down with me at bedtime and fold his hands, and say—"

"Why, Rebecca!" He drew her up against his arm; she was panting like a suffocated thing. "Don't, Rebecca—don't take it to heart so! He won't do it again. He shall promise you—I will make him; he shall not make his mother look like that. That was a boyish letter; he won't go to China; he will be home again before long, and it will all be right. I will make it right. Why, Rebecca, look at me!"

But she turned away from him—her husband; for the first time for twenty years she turned from him.

"Let me go!" in a singular, sharp, lonely voice. "Let me be with God; there is nobody else to whom I can go now."

She was out of his arms before he could stop her. He listened to her slow steps up the stairs, to the balusters creaking as she clung to them for support, to her chamber door closed and locked, and her footfall overhead.

Perhaps a sense of awe crept over the man against his will. What was the mystery of this Presence which had shut her in with itself? Had she help where his strong right arm had failed her? Was there love which could be comfort unto her, and his forgotten?

He listened to the last stepping of her foot by the bedside, to the silence which fell against it; then, with a singular expression about his mouth, seized his hat and strode away to the sea.

The wind was high. It was likely to be higher yet. There was a peculiar soughing heard miles away in the unbroken blackness, low, like a mutter, and distinct all the while from the steady roar and rolling in of the breeze. It threatened storm before morning, he thought, turning his face against it; at least, a heavy swell. It was singularly dark. He could scarcely see, as he forced his way to the beach against the gusts, the outlines of the rocks. The low, irregular flash of the surf made whiteness here and there. Sky and headlands melted into common gloom.

He had spent many hours there, pacing among the shadows of the cliffs—reckless hours, anxious hours, solemn hours—but never one like this. His face, could any have seen it, would have told as much. A certain surprise was in it, which to a man of Adam Gorrow's years and thinking seldom comes.

This thing had grated roughly; the disgrace of it was keen; he had been proud of the boy, as any father of his first-born. Perhaps he had looked to him to realize certain dead literary aspirations of his own—there was a little of his mother's play of fancy there to help; perhaps he had always "builded" the child's future "better than he knew," awaking now to see the structure dashed at his feet; it was sudden.

But beyond that?

He had just asked himself the question when he stopped his rapid pacing up and down the beach—it was moistening fast now with the spray of the incoming tide—to listen to the wind. It was a remarkable wind for that season of the year; the weight and whirl of it carried the tale of South Sea tornadoes. He began to think that it was time to be at home with Rebecca; she would be wondering what had become of him; but took a turn or two more upon the sand to answer the question.

"Well, beyond that?"

He might, yes, he might have recoiled a little at the deed itself; after all, he was capable of it; probably, out there face to face with the night and the sea, he did.

An honest blasphemer is an impossibility. There is that in the worst of us which shudders at it; bounds are set that we may not pass over; the sword, which flaming turns this way and that, guards a germ of reverence in hearts where there is little else to be guarded.

There were moments that night, while the hideous scene pictured and repictured itself before him upon wind and wave, in which he—even he—would have shrunk from the touch of his son's hand. It was as when

> "Some great painter dips
> His pencil in the gloom of earthquake and eclipse," recoiling, awed before his own work. Adam Gorrow knew that. It was his work, and his only. Like the voice of his son's blood crying unto him from the ground, the words echoed themselves over: "Father won't care, of course." As he had sown so had he reaped; from the wind the whirlwind. Well, why should he care?

The tide was rising fast now, and he had begun to retrace his steps. The gale pelted him with flakes of foam, and blinded him with clouds of dust; gasping, he turned for breath, and puffs of dried sea-weed, with which the air was full, choked him. It was very dark. Through mist or dust or bewilderment, he could scarcely tell which, the lights along the shore seemed blotted out. Swept along like a feather before the wind, he held out his hands groping for the way. The path led up in the shade of the cliffs; it would be somewhat sheltered there. Turning to aim for it, he came sharply upon a pile of timber, left out of the track of ordinary tides, for shipping. He was thrown against it violently, and stopped with a bruise or two on the lee-side to take breath.

At that moment he tripped upon a stone and fell. At that moment also he heard a singular sound like the pressure of a battering-ram upon the timber—a creaking, a tottering, a crash—he half struggled to his feet, but they went down, he and the mass together.

How long he had lain there he never knew;

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google hours, perhaps. He was conscious of himself at last, wedged in, crushed, helpless, shapeless; of his own blood falling drop by drop between his lips from a log that jutted over his face; of the slight tickling of rain-drops on his forehead, where his head hung free of weight, lolling like the head of a dead man; of the roar of the surf and storm, heard dimly as the surf and storm of a dream.

He struggled with a blind instinct to free his hands, to turn his face, to escape that hideous dropping of his own blood upon his tongue. He might as well have struggled in his grave.

The low, black sky across which, through half-closed eyelids, he could see the rain tossed in gusts by the wind, weighed upon him and crowded him in with the sensation of being weighed upon and crowded in by black marble. Up far through the mist a faint glow glimmered on a headland. The gurgling of the full tide was near. He listened to it, perhaps; he looked at the glow on the headland perhaps; an idea coming to him that he had looked and listened thus for centuries, and should look and listen thus for centuries more; other than that, he had no thoughts. Time was passing.

Suddenly he felt his head raised from below. It rose, it rested; it swayed in a sickening chill; something washed against his temples with a splash. It was the tide.

Adam Gorrow began to think; only his soul and God can now know what. The glow upon the headland was sharpening to his vision; he could see what it was—the light up stairs in their own room, where he had left Rebecca on her knees. He clenched his helpless hands, and his lips grew livid at the sight. A wave swept over him then and blotted it out.

It was horrible. To lie there and listen to the sly curdle of the foam creeping in among the timber; to feel the slow rise of his incapable head, the chill and swash of the water over the mangled mass of him in the gripe of the logs, the sick swaying of the board over which his arms were pinioned back; to hear his ineffectual voice dying in faint cries, thinned and scattered by the wind, mocked by the surf, swallowed by the far roar of mid-ocean; to see through all, in flashes, that steady light upon the headland—horrible! To lie through the awful hours waiting for the slow undermining of his prison, to feel the stealthy, outgoing tide sucking it and him away; to see, perhaps, as he drifted out, a woman's shadow at the windows; to toss there, a mangled thing on which her eyes should never fall, an atom at the mercy of the storm, resolving into the elements from which he came; to howl and spin in the night and horror, one with their essence forever.

Adam Gorrow was a brave man; but his face grew ghastly in that hour. And time was passing.

Words came to him as he grew weaker—a fragment:

"What manner of man is this that even the winds and the sea obey him?" What meaning could they have for him? Why should they seek him out? What message could he gather from them? "Unmeaning jingle;" it was odd that he should recall having said just that of them once to Wolcott; he was a little fellow then. How the boy looked! he had his mother's eyes. But the words came; whether in the shriek of winds, or the pounding of surf, or the sinister sucking of the tide, he could not tell; yet there they were, distinct to syllables like a voice within his ear: "Adam Gorrow, what manner of man is this that even the winds and sea obey him?" Curious!

Lights? Were those lights upon the shore—in the mist—wavering, flickering, lost, there again?

The slow ebb was sucking at the timber. The helpless head hung, staring up at the log from which the blood was dripping.

A voice? A woman's? Great God! that she should be so near—so near: "Adam Gorrow, what manner of man is this?"

A cry rang out over the sea. The mass trembled, tottered, fell. The tide swept out a little wreck of stained and floating timber. The spot where it had stood lay smooth and wet. A star-fish, freshly tossed there, curled into the sand, and a few scarlet pebbles were scattered about.

So after all there was a future and a soul. God pity him! He had been carried by whirlwinds to a point of land across which two oceans roared and clutched at each other, and tossed him back and forth as children toss a ball; to grasp at rocks that turned to slimy weeds and feel his fingers slipping down, and grasp again and feel them slipping down.

He had spent cycles in the heart of storms, blown in simoons over scorched sands of the tropics, frozen the wastes of Siberia, moaned across the solitudes of the sea, sobbed in writhing forests, wailed through the eternal silence of the poles. He had struggled years in quicksands which were always just closing above his head; had fallen for centuries into wells that had no bottom; had lain bound forever under African suns, with the pattering of unattainable water in his ears; had spent eternities half-buried in a grave over which live men were walking, every step a thunder-clap. He had gasped, famishing for the fabled food of Tantalus, had turned the wheel of Ixion, had climbed with Sisyphus the never-ending hill. He had agonized in tombs of fire, suffocated in the Styx, spun through the blackness of darkness, where Di Rimini was wailing, trod never-ending circles to a deep below the lowest deep, with Dante looking on. He had lived through, and relived, and lived again, the horrors of De Quincey's dreams; been grinned at and chattered at by his monkeys, been fixed on the summits of his pagodas, been worshiped, been sacrificed, done the deed "at which the ibis and the crocodile trembled," been buried in his stone coffins in his "eternal pyramids," with

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

mummies and sphinxes, laid "confounded with all unutterable slimy things among reeds and Nilotic mud," been chased, been dogged, been confronted, been strangled and kissed by his "damned crocodile." He had undergone over and again, and yet again, the agony of 1820, paragraph by paragraph, word for word:

"The morning was come of a mighty day—a day of crisis and of final hope for human nature, then suffering some mysterious eclipse, and laboring in some dread extremity. Somewhere—he knew not where, somehow, he knew not how, by some beings he knew not whom—a battle, a strife, an agony, was conducting....'Deeper than ever plummet sounded' he lay inactive. Then, like a chorus, the passion deepened. Some greater interest was at stake; some mightier cause than ever yet the sword had pleaded, or trumpet had proclaimed. Then came sudden alarms; hurryings to and fro; trepidations of innumerable fugitives....darkness and lights; tempest and human faces; and at last, with a sense that all was lost, female forms, and the features that were worth all the world to him, and but a moment allowed—and clasped hands, and heart-breaking partings, and then—everlasting farewells!—everlasting farewells! and again, and yet again reverberated, everlasting farewells!"

He shrieked her name out: "Rebecca, Rebecca, Rebecca!" and, turning, saw her.

Close beside him—close—the fire-light of their own room ebbing in tides of gold about her, her arms about his neck, her cheek to his. His thoughts narrowed themselves distinctly under her touch. He struggled to raise his head, his voice sounding to him like the voice of another man.

"Is there a chance?"

She kissed him twice, and drew her long hair down between him and the light; she would not let him see the wreck of him that lay there. He was answered.

He closed his eyes for a silent time, feeling her warm breathing on his cheek.

"Rebecca," then, "I want to see your face."

She waited, clinging to him.

"Your face, Rebecca, full in the light—so."

The poor, pitiful, pleading face! It looked down at him from its loose, neglected hair, curve and color gone, haggard lines about its mouth, its eyes only unchanged. He looked it over; he read it well.

"What do you do with your God now?" he asked of the pitiful face.

"I trust Him, Adam."

"Look at this thing lying here; it was your husband once. Look at it, I say! Whose work is it?"

"I trust Him, Adam."

"Where is your boy? He was your little innocent baby once, who would have gone with you into your widowed old age. Where is he? What is he? Who decreed from all eternity to make a blasphemer of your first-born son? Whose work is that?—no, you shall not turn away your face! Whose work, I say?"

Her voice quivered—yes, quivered—but her steadfast eyes were all alight.

"Adam, Adam, I trust Him!"

"Look into my eyes, Rebecca—now—do you know where I am going?"

He wrung the question out from livid lips; tore it into syllables as if an eternity hung upon it. She sat and stared at him, shivering; there was a curious, convulsive movement of her lips, like one in the last torments of the rack.

"You know where I am going. I know. He knows. He has no place in His heaven for your husband. You'll stand and sing among his fine white angels forever and forever without your husband. Whose work is that?"

Her voice broke into a thin, sharp cry:

"Adam, I can't help it—I can not help it! He's all I have. He died. He is sorry. He—"

He struggled up, drinking in her words like a famished thing, drinking in the light of her lifted eyes. Darkness swept over them then, and stillness over the words.

The darkness was shifted at last by fitful gleams of fire-light upon a wall. The stillness was broken by a baby's "coo." He lay very quietly, not caring for more than the one sight and sound for a while. It was pleasant. The rest came to him presently, as he was able. Dot in a cradle by the hearth; Rebecca busied softly about the room, with the old childlike smile; something—it was difficult to tell what—crouched in the shadow at the foot of the bed.

It was such a pretty dream! And a breath would blow away pretty dreams. It might have been minutes, or it might have been hours, before he stirred or spoke. At last, feeling a little stronger, he called her. He knew by her cry, by her eyes, that life had come. So he lay and looked at her.....

They had forgotten all else but one another perhaps. Dot had cooed herself to sleep in the cradle, and the figure in the shadow of the bed was still. It was a kneeling figure; its face was crushed down into the clothes; there were tears upon it, could any have seen them. Rebecca drew her hand from her husband's after a while, and went to it, and led it to the bed.

"It is only Wolcott, Adam. He didn't go to China. He's going to be a good boy. He is sorry."

They had left him alone, by his wish, for an hour. At the end of that time his wife stole softly in. He had been fumbling in the imperfect light with a little worn book of hers that lay upon the table. Upon certain words there was a small wet mark. He handed the book to her in his weak way, and she read:

"'Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest I will go; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God.'"

"You will tell Wolcott?"

"Yes, Adam."

"Now I think I will go to sleep. Kiss me, Rebecca."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE VIRGINIANS IN TEXAS.

CHAPTER IV.

VENABLE'S FIRST SHOT.—THE HONEY HUNT.

A WORLD of work there was to do, but for it there were plenty of willing hearts and hands. A garden to be plowed, fenced, planted, kept clean; a log-house, sixteen feet square, to be built for Hark, Rohamma, and Scip; a larger house built of cedar logs, consisting of two rooms, each twenty feet square, with a ten-foot hall between, all under one roof, with a gallery ten feet broad running along the whole length of the house on the south side. Then there were chimneys to build, stables to put up, a hundred other things to do—enough to fill, brim full, every day for years to come.

Now, the fact is, the McRobert family had not been the earliest risers in all Virginia. Far from it. The sun had shown himself high and long before either of the parents generally made their appearance, for they loved to linger long around the fireside at night, hearing music, reading, conversation, before going to bed. Venable and Will too, unless there was something like a rabbit hunt in the wind, or a sliding upon snow fallen during the night, were apt to be the last up—hardly well awake at a late breakfast. Bessie was the earliest riser of all. Up from her warm nest in the little crib by her parents' bed at early dawn she was out with the rest of the birds, singing sweeter than any of them. It was impossible to sleep soundly after she was up; so that if it had not been for her it is impossible to tell when the family would have risen.

As for the servants—catch them up long before the master and mistress? not exactly. Around their fires, talking and cooking and eating by turns—discussing all events upon their own plantation and all the plantations for ten miles around—it was far into the night before they slept. If it had not been for Watkins the overseer, not a soul would have even looked out until sun up. But there was no late rising with him—he was wide awake before three, up and out. He took their very business away from the chanticleers of the whole neighborhood. His awakening powers were not exactly like those of Bessie in the house, but far more effective. Sharp as a razor, and as cold and thin too, if Watkins ever woke late in the morning from that eventful day when, at three o'clock A.M. to a second, he first opened his eyes upon the hills of Vermont, then I am mistaken. If he slept at all, it was like a razor, blade turned down in the handle—cold, keen, even between the sheets—ready for use any instant. Mr. McRobert, his employer, did not find him too late a riser. The precise reverse.

But when the family left their old home they left something behind them besides "Old Virginia." The parents, at least, silently—without a word even to each other about it—resolved to begin a new life with a new home. And all the circumstances conspired happily to this under the new skies. In the first place, they had been so very busy all day—hard at work at a thousand things—that they were too tired to sit up late. An early supper, a little reading and conversation, family worship—and the household was sound asleep before ten. Then there was so much to do toward their new home—something left with reluctance the night before—that daybreak found all the family astir. The boys sprang from their beds first, with more eagerness than ever they did to hunt or to slide or to fish; their work now was something far more important and interesting to them. And as every member of the household had his own or her own particular world of work to do, it was the same with all.

It was as much as Mrs. McRobert could do to keep her family in clothing. Though their attire was of the strongest material many a rent made by mesquit thorns had to be mended. Unused to work, it would have gone hard with her had it not been for her increased health and strength. The children—and her husband most of all—were astonished and delighted at the new bloom in her cheeks, and the new light in her eyes, and the new elasticity of her step. And so it was with her husband. With both of them this going to a young country was like going back to their youth—to the days when they were first married; they were beginning life afresh, only a great deal wiser and happier even than before. Had they remained in Virginia after the loss of their property it would have been in a reduced, humiliated condition. Every thing they saw would have reminded them of the past. With every one they met the conversation would have unavoidably turned upon their change in life, with all its painful incidents and results. The whole thing would have weighed upon them, a heavy burden for life.

As it was, they threw the whole matter off their shoulders, almost off their very memory, left it all behind them in Virginia in coming to Texas. No scenes, no circumstances, no persons there to remind them. Every thing new, fresh, animating—appealing continually to them for ever-fresh exertion. It was indeed a kind Providence that led them from Virginia to Texas. Even if they had lost none of their property the removal would have been a wise one for the wonderful effects it wrought in them, as we shall see. As it turned out the loss was the greatest possible blessing, the lever which raised the whole family in every sense of the word, bodily, intellectually, spiritually to a higher level by far than they would otherwise have known. It was the kindness of their Father in heaven—a Father who delights to bless his children in unexpected ways, and by events and means which seem least likely of all.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

May passed in hard work—by the end of it the large garden had been fenced, planted, and gave promise of a luxuriant and abundant supply of vegetables. The negro house, too, had been all neatly finished, and the logs hauled, hewn, notched, and ready for the larger house. All looked anxiously forward to its completion. It was a good mile to Uncle Frank's; besides, they wanted to be in their own home. We see with what joy the birds build their nests; what a glad flying about, and eager twittering, and enthusiastic energy they throw into the matter from dawn till dusk. Men possess the same instinct. People who inherit fine houses, all built to their hands, have no idea what an enjoyment they miss in not having to select a site from the hands of Nature, and clear it up, and plan and build according to one's own fancy, or rather two's own fancy, for half the pleasure is in the discussion between husband and wife, the deferring to each other, and suggesting and proposing.

Since Adam and Eve left Eden hand in hand, the sweetest of all food is that which a young couple eat when they sit down for the first time at their own table in their own house, though it be of logs and the table a goods' box; and the sweetest slumber known since Adam and Eve left their couch of roses in Paradise is that which such a pair enjoy when they lie down at night for the first time under their own roof, even though the stars twinkle through it every where.

On the 26th of June the house was all finished. Early that morning the moving began. The night before Hark had unfortunately left his axe up in the cedar brake, and while all else were busy packing and starting off for the new place, as Hark could not be spared, Venable had to leave immediately after breakfast for the brake to bring in the axe.

"I do declare it's too bad," he said, as he mounted Slow. "I wouldn't have missed going with them this morning for any thing, and here I have to ride alone way up into that dreary brake. However, I'll take my rifle along; who knows but I might get a crack at a squirrel?"

Now ever since Venable obtained his rifle he had been practicing with it at a mark behind the house of evenings when matters more important had been attended to. So far he had never killed any thing, though he had wasted any quantity of bullets in trying.

"I'll tell you what we'll do, Slow, old fellow!" said he to his horse, as they entered the brake after a ride of a mile or two. "Behind that clump of bushes yonder is Plum Spring. It's early in the morning yet, who knows but I might find a turkey, or a squirrel, or something at the water? I'll tie you here any how, creep up and see. A squirrel of my own shooting to carry home for our first dinner in the new house, wouldn't it be grand!"

So saying he alighted, tied his pony to a bush, motioned Duke, who now came breathless after him from the house, to lie down by the horse, then taking his rifle he crept cautiously up toward the spring. Arrived in fifty yards of it he peeped carefully through the brush, and the rifle actually fell from his hands, while the sudden beating of his heart was really painful. No wonder. There stood a noble buck right before him, drinking! It had arrived just as he did, was drinking eagerly as if very thirsty. The wind too was from it toward Venable, so that it could not detect the boy by scent.

For nearly five minutes Venable sat looking at the buck without even a thought of his rifle. He was even shaking in every limb with the "buck ague" that old hunters so laugh at in new beginners.

Suddenly the thought flashed upon him, "Oh, if I only could kill it, wouldn't it be grand! I'd give a million of dollars—what would they say? I'll try any how, I know I'll miss; but I'll have a shot any how."

With shaking hand he picked up his rifle and ran it through a forked bush that happened there, just the thing. Then taking a long aim at the side of the buck—for it stood broadside to him—he shut his eyes and fired. The next instant he tried to jump up with a hurrah of mad excitement on his lips; but he was so weakened by the sight that he could not at first utter a syllable or stir from the spot. The instant he fired the buck had sprung straight up in the air, it seemed ten feet high to Venable, and then had fallen almost in its very tracks, shot through the heart. In a few moments the boy was standing on him weak and almost delirious with excitement and joy. He whistled to Duke, ran toward his horse, then ran back lest the deer should disappear before he could get back. Finally he untied the pony and led him snorting and shying to the spot. Then he tied him firmly to a sapling as near the buck as possible, and let him get a little accustomed to it. Then he thought about the axe, untied the pony again, galloped on him a few hundred yards to where it was left, got it, hurried back, tied Slow as before, and attempted to raise the hind legs of the buck upon the saddle so as to draw it up on the back of the horse. Hard work it was, and the perspiration streamed from every pore.

At last he succeeded: the buck was balanced in the saddle, and Venable walked beside, steadying it by the immense antlers with his left hand, while he held the reins and supported the rifle and axe upon his shoulder with the right. And thus, slowly and safely, he made his way along the road by which they had hauled rails to the new place.

It seemed as if he would never get there; but he arrived at length, and there were all the family just arrived. His heart beating fast, and a great deal prouder than Alexander the Great after a battle, he was among them before they knew he was near. You can imagine the sensation he made, the shouts of surprise, the questions! The hero sat down from sheer exhaustion, while Uncle Frank and Will took the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

buck off the pony and hung it by the hind hoofs to a limb of a tree behind the house. But his proudest moment was when Uncle Frank, after walking round and round it as it hung, looking at it with his head on one side said, as he sharpened his knife on his palm before proceeding to flay it, "Well, Ven, you'll do; I never saw a finer buck, nor made a better shot in my life."

Venable had only one request to make. "Mother," said he, "can't Rohamma cook some of it for our first dinner? My having to go for that axe was not so bad at last," he continued, to himself, as he walked into the house to wash his hands and change his bloody clothes. "Pa says things always turn out best—and I believe they do."

From that day Will, and all the rest too, looked upon Venable as being much more of a man.

"Oh! it was all accident my hitting it," he said; but he thought a good deal more of himself for it notwithstanding. Many a deer did he afterward supply their table with, but no shot so triumphant as that; it remained one of the sweetest joys of his life.

That afternoon and night Uncle Frank remained with them to help arrange matters.

"I noticed bee signs a month or two ago down the river," he said, next morning at breakfast. "The sun is just rising; we have plenty of time. Now you've got venison plenty, suppose we try for some honey too, to set up housekeeping with? Suppose I take Venable and Will with me?—we needn't be gone long."

No sooner proposed than agreed on. In a few minutes they were off, loaded down with axes and as many buckets as they could hang about their horses. Riding south down to the river, at Uncle Frank's request, they alighted near a sandy flat and tied their horses.

Their uncle then coolly took his seat on a log beside the river, crossed his legs, and fanned himself with his hat.

"But where's the honey?" said Will, looking around.

"Don't you see there?" replied his uncle, pointing to the moist sand. "There they are, sure enough."

Following the direction of their uncle's finger, the boys observed two or three bees on the sand, apparently sucking up the moisture.

"Now, boys," said Uncle Frank, suddenly mounting his horse, "you stay here with the buckets and things until I come back, or you hear me call."

He spoke with his eyes fastened on the bees, and as he spoke one of them rose from the sand, circled round and round in the air, then darted straight off into the forest, the Texan hard after it, his eyes fastened upon it and his spurs driven into his horse. In a moment he was out of sight.

"It would take sharper eyes than mine to follow a bee on horseback," said Will.

"There's no telling what one can do till they try," answered Venable, very gravely, with a thought of yesterday's shot. "I suppose," he continued, "it's easier to do it because, when the bee starts, he goes straight—makes a bee-line, they call it—for home. If he was to fly crooked nobody could follow him."

"I hope we won't have to wait long," said Will. And they did not; for in a few minutes they heard their uncle's "Hoop-pee!" sounding in the distance—a shrill cry on the upper-keys of the voice which can be heard amazingly far, owing to its sharpness—just as a pointed arrow or a conical Minié bullet flies farther than a blunt stick or a slug. In a minute the boys were on their animals, with all their things, and in a short time had reached their uncle. They found him seated on a log.

"Now, boys," he said, "take the three horses and tie them way off yonder a hundred yards. If the bees get at them we'll have more dancing in our fandango than is agreeable. Leave the things here. We've managed to kill two birds with one stone this morning," he continued, as the boys returned. "We'll attend to this one first;" and he pointed to a swarm of bees clustered in a thick knot upon a log near by. At his direction the boys rapidly collected wood for a fire, in the midst of which he flashed some powder, setting it into a blaze. Upon this they heaped leaves so as to make a dense smoke.

"But what are we going to take them home in?" asked Venable.

"Always have your saddle-blanket made into a bag," replied Uncle Frank, producing his own, and opening its mouth; "it's just as easy, and there's no telling what use you may have for it when out hunting."

So saying he picked up some long switches which he had cut, and bending each into a circle, held by its ends wrapped together, he placed them in the bag till it could stand on its mouth a round box. He then produced a bark with honey in it, and rubbed well the inside of the bag-box with the honey.

"Now, Venable," he said, "I want you to take hold of this string here at the upper end of our hive. Hold it over the swarm, and drop it, easy, down upon them. I'll guide the mouth of the bag on them myself. Don't be afraid of a sting or so."

Slowly and cautiously the thing was done, and the swarm safe inside the bag. Uncle Frank then cautiously worked the mouth of the bag together.

"But it will never do to tie up the mouth, uncle; they'll die for want of air," said Venable.

"Cut slits in the bag," said Will.

"And let the air in and them out," replied his uncle. "No, Sir, give me your hat—it's straw coarse platted—the very thing." And in a few minutes he had managed to slip the crown of the hat in, and had tied the mouth of the bag firmly around it over the hat-band.

"There's a good bag of bees for your mother, boys," said their uncle. "Tie the end-string to that swinging branch, Venable, so that

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the brim of the hat will rest on the ground. That's it. Now for the honey."

"Where on earth did you get it from?" asked Venable.

"Do you see that hole about the size of a dollar in that cotton-wood?" said their uncle, pointing to a spot on the side of a huge tree, some ten feet from the ground; "and do you see this long stick?—that's the where and the how."

"But how did you reach up there—rode up to it on horseback, of course?"

"Guessed right; and I had to ride away fast enough when I drew out the stick with the honey."

"But now for good, hard work," continued the Texan. "Off with your coat, Venable; make a big fire, Will; have plenty of leaves ready by it to make a smoke. Now for the axes—it's soft wood—hollow at that."

Soon the woods rang with the sound of the axes.

"Look out, Duke! out of the way!" cried Venable, as he dashed his axe into the side opposite his uncle. But it was a good hour's work, with many a panting, perspiring pause before the tree gave sign of falling.

"Leaves, leaves, Will!—pile on leaves!" cried his uncle, as the tree at last came down with a thundering crash. In an instant Duke and Snap both were into the boughs of the fallen tree, expecting to catch a possum at least. They acknowledged their mistake with loud yells, as they dashed out again with a swarm of exasperated bees after them which seemed to fill the whole foliage.

As to the boys, following their uncle, they fled toward the horses for dear life. It was some minutes before they ventured back, and even then they were safe only in the thickest of the smoke. Gradually their uncle managed to drag the fire till it was against the trunk of the tree near the hole. Then, mounting the trunk, he began cutting a deep, long notch at the hole and another three feet above.

Then, as Will and Venable enveloped him in smoke by fresh leaves, he managed with a few sturdy blows to split out the piece between the notches. As he did so he dropped his axe and ran, the boys after him. Venturing back after a while they saw, with eyes smarting with smoke, a sight worth seeing. The side of the hollow split off revealed in the huge trunk layer on layer of the finest honey, enough to fill barrels instead of buckets.

"Eat as much as you like, boys," said their uncle, handing each a comb as large as a dinner-plate, and taking an enormous bite out of another himself. "It's about dinner-time, and this is our only dinner. It can't hurt you."

I am afraid to say how much they did eat; but having satisfied themselves, and a little over, they proceeded to fill their buckets. As to Uncle Frank his hands were full, carrying the bag of bees.

"Oh, uncle, it's such a pity to leave so much honey!" cried Will, after they had filled all their buckets and were starting.

"It won't be lost, Will," replied his uncle. "The bees will carry it off to some other place near by, which we will hunt up some of these days. Besides, a gentleman in black will be along to-night who is desperately fond of honey. Who knows but what somebody may fix to collect him too? Never mind that now, come along!"

The boys were too tired, satiated with honey and occupied in balancing their buckets, heavy and overflowing, to ask more questions, and they were soon at home.

The honey was gladly received by Mrs. McRobert. Hark soon had a box made into which the swarm was transferred. It was the beginning of a long range of hives, the descendants of that swarm, in course of time.

"Now," said Mr. McRobert, as he glanced at the boys grimy with perspiration and smoke, and sticky from head to foot with honey, "I think the best thing you can do when you get cool is to take a good bathe in the San Hieronymo."

CHAPTER V.

THE WILD MAN OF THE WOODS.—THE STORY OF TEXAS.

"You had your adventures to-day, all of you," said Mrs. McRobert at tea that night; "yet, though I remained close at home, I'll warrant I had the strangest adventure of all."

"What was it?" was the exclamation of all.

"I was alone all the morning," said Mrs. McRobert. "You, Frank, and Venable, and Will—the very dogs with you, were out after the honey. Mr. McRobert had Hark with him out in the field, Rohamma had taken Bessie and Scip with her down to her washing on the spring. I was sitting alone in the house sewing. Seeing a shadow on the floor I looked up, and came as near fainting as I ever did in my life.

"Was it a bear, ma?" asked the excited Will.

"A gotht, wasn't it?" said Bessie.

"It was a man," said their mother, "and such a man! His face was all covered with a beard that seemed to reach to his very waist. His clothes, all tattered, hung about him in rags."

"Black—broadcloth, in fact, were they not?" asked Uncle Frank.

"Yes, and I could not help noticing it even in my fright. He held his hat in his hand, instead of having it on his head in the house, like one used to good society. In fact, by his manner and all he seemed to be a gentleman that had been lost in the mountains for weeks."

"But what did he want?" asked her husband.

"Well, although I was terribly alarmed at first—being alone, his manner reassured me. 'I beg pardon, Madam,' he said, with a bow, 'for coming so abruptly upon you. I must,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google indeed, be an alarming object, as I see by your fright. Excuse me, but could I have a drink of water?'"

"The very same!" ejaculated her brother.

"I thought it strange," continued Mrs. McRobert, "that he should come to the house for water when there was the spring outside the gate. I suppose I showed this in my face, for he immediately went on: 'The truth is, Madam, I am exceedingly hungry; I believe I am starving, even.'"

"It's the very same man I saw once," interrupted her brother. "I came upon him suddenly in the woods near this a month ago. One of my oxen had died a day before of something or other, and, if you believe me, that man had actually driven away the buzzards, had cut out some of the flesh, and was cooking it on a little fire when I came on him. The moment he heard my step, without even waiting to look around, he jumped and ran for his life. I didn't want to shoot him, you know; and before I knew what to make of it he was out of sight."

"Oh, mother," said Venable, "don't you remember Rohamma coming up so frightened from the calf-pen one night, saying she saw a man there trying to milk one of the cows into his hat?"

"Yes," replied his mother, "but I thought at the time it was only one of her fancies—she is so bitterly opposed to Texas. I told her not to say a word more about it."

"Hark was telling me of having seen such a man in the cedar-brake," said Mr. McRobert. "Now I recollect, he said he came on him early one morning fast asleep in a kind of nest he had made of cedar-bark."

"I wonder if it could have been his knife I picked up that day on the flat rock at the spring! You know how we wondered about it. Here it is," continued Venable—"such a beautiful pearl-handled knife! And here is C. R. on the silver of it. I never noticed it before."

"But you have not told us all," said his father, now deeply interested.

"There is little more to tell," replied his wife. "I supplied him amply with every thing I could lay my hands on in the safe, wrapped up in a towel. I did not know what to say. 'A thousand thanks, Madam,' he said, as he turned to go. 'If you will do me one favor more I will be under the greatest obligations; and that is, please do not mention to any one my visit.' I managed to say that was impossible; I must inform you all as soon as you returned. He hesitated a moment, with his hat in his hand, as if to say something; then thanked me again, made a bow, and was gone. It all seems like a dream to me. I was glad enough to see you return."

"Who can it be?" mused her husband. "Who can tell but he may watch to see us leave the place, and come again when you are alone?"

"I am not at all afraid of him," replied his wife. "It would be well always to leave Duke at home. We women know some things by instinct. I'm not at all afraid of him—only sorry. I'm satisfied he would not attempt to hurt me, or any one. He looks scared, like a chased rabbit. All he seems to wish is to keep out of sight. It was only for food that he came to the house."

"It can't be a Texan," said her brother, "or he could kill all he wanted to eat in the woods. But perhaps he hasn't got a gun; that's strange. Black broadcloth too. Hunters don't wear that among the chaparral. I can't make it out at all."

"A great many singular people come to Texas," said Mr. McRobert, in conclusion.

"Watkins told me one day that it was the Botany Bay of the world," said Venable. "And he said, Uncle Frank, that when the Texans took Texas from Mexico it was the grandest piece of rascality the world ever saw."

"The sharp overseer that did the swindling, wasn't it?" asked his uncle.

"Yes," replied his nephew; "but a good many people in Virginia said so. Uncle George said so the day before we left. I remember hearing Mr. Hudson say so over and over again at the court-house when he was running for Congress, just before Texas was annexed. How was it, uncle? Can't you tell us all about it? It's an hour before bedtime yet."

"Yes, Frank, we would all like to hear," said his brother, as they rose from the table and took their seats about the room. "In some way I have not read much on the subject."

"We must remember, however, that it is a Texan that is telling us," said Mrs. McRobert, with a smile, as she took up her sewing.

"Well," replied Uncle Frank, taking the big rocking-chair, "let me sit down here, for a backwoodsman has always to be moving even when he is sitting still. Get on your night-gown, Bessie, and get in my lap; I'll talk you to sleep. The battle of San Jacinto happened in this way—"

"Oh no, Frank, go back of that; begin at the beginning," said his brother.

"It won't take long to tell you all the facts, even beginning at the start," said Uncle Frank. "All Mexico and Texas was once the realm of a people about whom we know almost nothing—a civilized, prosperous people; where they came from, and where they went to, too, for that matter, nobody knows. Some year in the first quarter of the sixteenth century Cortéz conquered Mexico, and added it to the Spanish kingdom. Spain, like a fool, appointed only Spaniards governors, and all other offices too were filled only by people sent out. This enraged the native residents of mixed Spanish and Mexican blood. When Napoleon invaded Spain Mexico set up for itself, and never would go back under rule of the Mother Country, but started a sort of make-believe Republic, patterned after the United States—on paper. Now, as to Texas—"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"What does 'Texas' mean, uncle?" asked Will.

"Texas, or 'Tejas,' is Spanish for wigwams. Well," continued the Texan, "La Salle, a Frenchman, was the first European on Texas soil, landing in 1685. For many a long year after there was a continual quarrel between France and Spain for possession of the soil, with many an insurrection of the Indian inhabitants against both. For a hundred and fifty years Texas has been the scene of wars and adventures of all sorts, and for thousands of years before that, for what we know. Now for the history of our Texas. In 1821 Moses Austin, a Connecticut man, obtained from Mexico permission to colonize three hundred families in Texas. He died soon after, leaving his son, Stephen F. Austin, to carry out his plans. He did so, and Texas and Coahuila were recognized as forming one State of the United States of Mexico, under the Federal Constitution of 1824."

"What was the difference," asked his brother, "between that Constitution and the Federal Constitution of our United States?"

"Just this," replied the Texan: "the Mexican Constitution did not recognize the right of trial by jury; made Roman Catholicism the only religion of the people; made Congress, instead of the courts, the highest interpreter of the laws; permitted the President to command the armies of the Republic; and failed to define the rights of the several States of the Confederacy."

"The first settlers of the country, then, were all Roman Catholics, or became suddenly so on arriving?" asked his brother.

"Well, they all thought that no government had any right to require any such test, and therefore paid no attention to it. It was in 1827 that the Constitution of the State of Texas and Coahuila was adopted, and sworn to by the officers and people of the State. Certainly there was no robbery of Mexico by unprincipled men from the United States, so far. The colonists settled the country by the express encouragement and grants from Mexico, continued for years, and confirmed again and again by successive Administrations. One of the first things that began to alarm Mexico was the effort made by the United States to buy Texas from it. No less than three such efforts were made by the United States between 1825 and 1829. The fact is, Texas was really a part of the territory purchased by the United States from Napoleon under the general name of Louisiana, and ought never to have been given up to Spain."

"I never knew that before," said his brother.

"It's none the less true," continued the Texan.

"Once alarmed about Texas, Mexico began a long series of tyrannical acts toward it. Revolution followed revolution in Mexico until, in 1835, Santa Anna abolished the State Legislatures, overthrew the whole fabric of the Government, assumed despotic power. Talk of the thirteen colonies cutting loose from England! Texas had a hundred times greater cause for separating from Mexico! Texans would have been indeed slaves if they had done any thing less. At a Convention of the people at Washington, March 2, 1836, Texas was declared an Independent Republic. On April 21 following, the battle of San Jacinto—the Yorktown of Texas—was fought and won, and Texas was free! That's the whole story."

"Tell us, uncle, do tell us something about San Jacinto," said Venable. "You were there, you know."

"I'll make a short story of it then. You see it was on Sunday, March 6, that the Alamo was stormed and all the garrison butchered. The Mexicans under Santa Anna were sixteen to one of the Texans, and they lost in the fight three times the whole number of Texans engaged. It was the noblest fight in the world. Travis and Crocket and the rest refusing to retreat, refusing to surrender, holding out so long as a grain of powder or a bullet was left, then taking to their knives and clubbing their muskets, fighting till they were actually stifled, overwhelmed, suffocated by the Mexicans pouring in shoals over the walls upon them. Then Sunday, March 27, Fannin's command, which had surrendered under promise of quarter, were butchered in cold blood by order of Santa Anna. I knew two young fellows there, mere boys, when they were being marched out to be shot, waving their hats above their heads and dying with 'Hurrah for Texas!' on their lips; three hundred and thirty men butchered in cold blood. This was the way Santa Anna invaded Texas from the west.

"You may suppose the country was alarmed. Men, women, and children abandoned every thing and fled eastward, swarming along all the roads; crossing, one hardly knows how, the rivers—cold, hungry, ragged, worn to death with fright and fatigue. The whole country was emptying itself eastward before the Mexicans, burning up the houses and towns behind them as they left to leave as little as possible for the yellow rascals. It was a terrible time, I tell you.

"All this time the only army Texas had in the field was under Houston, and that was retreating eastward, too, to make a better stand. At last the army—seven hundred and eighty-three strong—came face to face with the Mexicans on the prairie of San Jacinto. Old Sam—Houston, I mean—commanded us, while Santa Anna was General of the Mexicans.

"There was some little skirmishing on the 20th; the morning of the 21st, however, dawned clear and bright on the two armies. About 9 o'clock, who should come along but General Cos with reinforcements for Santa Anna, making the enemy some sixteen hundred strong. It didn't make any difference; they were bound to be whipped. On account of the bloody massacres by the Mexicans there was such a feeling in our men that they were ready and eager for fight, certain to whip at that, with

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

fifty thousand men if it was necessary. I remember it all as if it were yesterday.

"There was a small mot, that is, grove of trees, between our camp and them, behind which about 2 o'clock we formed our lines. Deaf Smith had just come in after cutting down the bridge over the bayou, the only way they had to escape after the fight, as there were deep sea marshes all around them. The fact is, Santa Anna, coward and bully as he was, felt sure the victory was his—after a hearty dinner he lay down to take his siesta, as they call it. We were wide awake, I assure you. I never felt so bright and happy in my life. Our cannon, the 'twin-sisters,' began the work by being run in two hundred yards of the 'Greasers,' where it poured grape and canister thick and fast into the Mexicans.

"The first roar of the cannon was like dropping a live coal in a powder magazine. Such a shout along our lines, 'Remember the Alamo! Remember Goliad!'

"Just then the Mexicans fired into us.

"We held our fire, wrathful as we were, till in pistol-shot; then poured in a fire—every Texan aiming at his man—that swept their breast-works almost bare.

"But we did not stop to see. On we went over the breast-works, right on top. In fifteen minutes it was all over, and the Mexicans flying like sheep—the Texans after them. They didn't even have time to fire their loaded cannon.

"Before dark fell there were six hundred and thirty killed, two hundred and eight wounded, and seven hundred and thirty taken prisoners. The whole prairie was a perfect wreck—guns, camp equipages, dead and dying Mexicans—while we had only eight killed and twenty-five wounded.

"Oh, well, next morning five of us were out by dawn to see what was to be seen. After we got out from the camp, Sylvester—one of us—was about shooting a deer that he saw, when he noticed a Mexican trying to steal along. He shouted to us, and when we rode up to him he threw himself on the ground and covered himself with his blanket. He lay there like a worm at our feet. I told him to get up, but he only uncovered his face.

"I had to order him to get up I don't know how many times. When he did he came fawning toward Sylvester like a whipped dog, shook hands with him, and then kissed Syl's hand, and it was none of the cleanest either.

"We asked the poor trembling thing who he was? He was only a private soldier, he said. I had noticed some studs in his shirt-bosom too fine for any common Mexican. When I pointed to these the poor fellow actually burst out crying, the tears running down his dirty cheeks. With his dirty face and tangled hair and whiskers, and crouching, pitiful, whining way, I would just as soon have thought of killing a sick baby.

"He was too frightened to walk or even stand, so I helped him on my horse and carried him into camp. As I led him past where the Mexican prisoners were guarded they looked as if they could not believe their own eyes, and kept exclaiming, 'El Presidente!'

"Sure enough, it was Santa Anna!"

"And did they kill him and all the prisoners, uncle?" asked Will, with breathless interest.

"No, no," replied his uncle, "that's the difference between Mexicans and Texans. Every kindness was shown to them all. As to Santa Anna, it would have been a blessing to his own country especially if he had been killed in the fight."

"But why do Mexicans regard him as such a great man?" asked Mrs. McRobert.

"Only because he is the greatest man they have," replied the Texan. "A sun-perch not larger than your hand is a whale among minnows, you know."

"What sort of people are the Mexicans, uncle?" inquired Venable.

"I have lived among them a long time now," replied his uncle. "Some Mexicans were among the noblest patriots of our Revolution; yet an ignorant, lazy, treacherous, cruel, cowardly set they often are; some noble exceptions, of course. I am speaking of the lowest class of Mexicans, and I hope they really are better than I think them—an old Texan may be prejudiced. No wonder they are mongrels—a mixture of Indian, Negro, and Spanish. They are more like what I have read of the Hindoos than any thing else. Give a Mexican his blanket and his mustang, his tortillas, and a handful or two of red peppers, a fandango now and then, and a game cock, a pack of cards, and a bottle of brandy, and he wishes nothing else on earth.

"The Government—or, rather, the misgovernment—of their own country is in the hands of a few men: the mass of the people are like sheep, knowing and caring nothing whatever about any thing beyond their little daily personal wants. I said there were exceptions. I am speaking of the mass of them."

"But what makes all the difference between them and us, uncle?" said Venable.

"Oh, we are of a totally different stock and blood. Our ancestry and training has been altogether superior. Besides, their climate is a voluptuous, enervating one. They have never had motive enough to rouse them. Their Government is only a Revolution and a Tyranny alternately. They don't read or think—never expand themselves by exertion. Above all, they are cursed with a religion which would drag down any people, once fastened firmly on them—it has been their religion from the start, and it has kept them down."

"I was in Francisco's cabin one day," said Venable, "and he had stuck up some red, glaring pictures of the Virgin Mary and a little queer crucifix in one corner. As for me, I've no contempt, only pity for them."

"Yes, to have such things in their cabins, and to go to church and to confessional, and to pay their priests, is about the whole of their

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google religion. It restrains them in nothing, and it teaches them nothing. Their having that instead of no religion at all is someway a providence, however, I suppose. I'm an old Texan, however—maybe prejudiced."

"It is strange," said Mrs. McRobert, "that we send missionaries far away to the Hindoos and Chinese, and no one seems even to have thought of sending the Bible to these at our doors. You are too harsh upon them; how can they help being exactly what they are?"

"It would do no good," replied her brother. "Other people have some spirit in their religion. The Irish Catholics, for instance, they feel warmly for it, will argue and fight for it; but Mexicans are sluggish and indifferent. To do any thing with one of them is like trying to do something with a man made of straw or sand. He will nod his head and say, 'Si, si, Signor!' to every thing you say, and neither understand nor care any thing about it. There is nothing in a Mexican to get hold of—don't seem to have a bone in their body."

"But they improve as Americans mix in with them, do they not?" inquired his brother.

"About as much as fire does with water," replied the Texan. "No, they yield, give place, die off, but never rise. It's the old story of Indian and white man—the one race melts away like snow before the other. Mexico is worth annexing just in proportion as it becomes Americanized, and no faster. As if Mexico was not yielding before the superior race fast enough, it is, in addition, everlastingly at war in itself, tearing itself to pieces, bleeding itself to death, steady decrease all the time. Before long the whole country will come under the Stars and Stripes, sink under our flag of itself, without any taking on our part, in sheer self-exhaustion. And a magnificent country it is, except for its population; that's the only bad part of the country, the population. Mines of all kinds of ores in abundance, the most beautiful scenery, the most fertile soil, the most healthful and delicious climate in the world; it is beyond any State yet in the Union far. I'm glad to see Texas filling up so fast with emigration. It is like filling up a reservoir until the time comes to let it pour over Mexico. Our plan is to do nothing now, nothing wrong against Mexico; a wrong-doing always kicks back on the wrong-doer like a dirty musket—only to wait. Filibustering is the very thing we ought not to do; it only throws things back. We've only to wait—wait's the word—and Mexico is ours; all quietly, naturally, inevitably, of its own accord, as the only thing it can possibly do; ours, fairly, lawfully ours; with nobody in the world to say a word against it. But, dear me," said the Texan, rising from his rocking-chair, "how I have been talking! Where shall I lay Bessie? sound asleep an hour ago. I must be up early. I intend going over to the honey-tree to-morrow. Unless I am mistaken we'll get something besides honey out of that hollow I cut before to-morrow night."

CHAPTER VI.

A DOUBLE ADVENTURE.

BEFORE breakfast was over, Uncle Frank, who had gone home the night before, appeared at San Hieronymo—as the new place had come to be called—his rifle in his hand, his belt displaying two revolvers and a huge bowie-knife—evidently armed and equipped for fighting, if need be, as well as hunting.

"I want you to go with me this time, Morton," he said to his brother; "I'm satisfied there's something more at the bee-tree worth bringing."

But his brother resisted all his entreaties. He was not fond of hunting at any time. Besides, he wished to get thoroughly settled first in his new home, and a vast deal remained yet to be done. As to the Texan, it was impossible for him to confine himself to work; there was not excitement enough in it for him.

"I suppose, then, I must take Venable," he said. "I don't like to, however."

"I'm sorry to hear you say so, uncle," said his nephew, who had acquired a passion for hunting since his exploit with the buck, and who was always eager to go along.

"You will see," replied his uncle, "why I don't want to take you before night. However, come along—only you must mind exactly what I say."

"Oh, take me too, uncle," cried Will.

"No, Sir!" replied the Texan, in a decided tone.

It took but a few moments for Venable to get ready. In addition to his rifle, his uncle made him add a butcher-knife to his arms. The dogs were tied to prevent their following. In a short time they had ridden down the river to the edge of the forest. Instead, however, of going direct to the bee-tree, the Texan plunged into a dense bottom thicket.

"I want to go to the tree roundabout, on account of the wind," he said.

"What wind, uncle?" asked Venable; "and what are we hunting?"

"You'll find out soon enough, only watch out and do exactly as I tell you," replied his uncle.

But their road was obstructed in a way they had not thought of.

"What tracks are these?" inquired Venable, suddenly stopping and pointing to the ground. "It must be some of our pigs. I didn't know they came as far from the house as this."

"Oh, pshaw!" said his uncle, as soon as he saw the tracks; "why didn't I think of it? We must turn right back. Come quick!"

But while his uncle was speaking Venable had discovered, but a few feet before them, the animal that made the tracks. Seeing it was a wild animal, with an "Oh, uncle, look there!" Venable raised his rifle and fired.

"Oh my! what did you do that for!" exclaimed the Texan. "Drop your rifle and up into that sapling, quick! Here they are!—

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google quick! quick!" and the uncle himself sprang for the nearest tree and clambered up, his companion doing the same into another near at hand.

But he was not fast enough. Before he was half-way up he felt something hook into his shoe and pull. He held on to a limb he had seized with all his might, and the string of his shoe breaking, it was torn off as he scrambled up.

Seated at last in a fork of the tree, some eight feet from the ground, he did not know whether to be frightened or to laugh heartily. The whole ground below was swarming with scores of a small animal. It resembled a hog, especially in the tusks and head. The body, however, tapered off behind, and was singularly striped with black.

With bristles up and furious snapping of the tusks the creatures crowded around the trees in which the hunters had taken refuge, eager for battle, their little eyes sparkling with rage. But the boy could not refrain from laughing aloud when he looked up at his uncle. There he sat in the small tree into which he had scrambled, and which was bending and swaying with his weight, a look of the utmost alarm and concern upon his face. Venable had supposed that his uncle would not have taken to a tree even from a lion, and this sudden terror and his ludicrous position amused him beyond measure, though he himself took good care to hold on tight all the time.

"What are they, uncle? What are we going to do? When are they going away?" he asked, at length.

"They are peccaris—Mexican hogs; we are going to stay where we are until they leave—unless we wish to be cut to bits by their lancet tusks—and when that will be I can not say," his uncle replied, not in the best humor. "There is no use of attempting to kill them all; besides, I have only enough powder and balls for the bee-tree."

There was no help for it but patience. Once or twice Venable attempted, holding firmly with his left hand to a limb, to slash at them with his knife in his right hand, but it only made them more furious, and he began to be alarmed lest they might tear down the tree in which he was lodged. At times he could not but laugh; but after an hour spent in this way, he began to think it was not so funny as it might be after all, for the creatures showed no intention of leaving whatever.

"They certainly are the spryest things, to be hogs, that I ever saw," said the uncle, at length. "I had a tame one once, and when it was feeding I have tried a hundred times to pull it by the tail, but always, before I could get my hand on it, it had its snout there instead."

Another hour passed; and how much longer they might have had to remain it is impossible to say, had not relief suddenly come from a most unexpected quarter. All at once the creatures stopped and began to sniff—then suddenly dashed away with wild grunts, and were out of sight in a moment.

"Hush!" said the uncle, "be perfectly still; draw yourself up a little into the tree, but don't breathe hardly. Yes, I thought so—here he comes!"

As he said this an enormous black bear made his appearance from toward the river, and passed deliberately within fifty feet of them. To Venable the animal seemed among the bushes of gigantic proportions, and he trembled with excitement.

"It's not the peccaris he is after," said the Texan, sliding down his tree when the bear had got well past, and motioning to his nephew to follow him. "Just as I thought; it's the honey. He's been here last night, has been to the river to drink, and is going back. Nothing in the world a bear likes so much as honey! Now, Venable," he continued, "I think you had better go to where we have tied the horses and go back home; it's a dangerous job for a boy like you to be in, and I'm bound to fix his flint for him before I leave."

Venable by this time had regained his rifle, and long and hard did he plead: "You let me start with you, you know, uncle," he urged.

"Yes, I know, but I've thought better of it; go home, Ven—go home; some other time you shall try it with me," was his uncle's only reply.

Very discontentedly the boy went to his horse, while his uncle plunged into the forest.

Mounting, and riding slowly along the river-bank, the young Texan reached the spot from which they had trailed the bee to its hive. A sudden thought struck the boy, and he drew rein and stopped to consider.

"Uncle don't want me to go with his consent," he reasoned to himself, "for then he would blame himself if I got hurt. But suppose I go without his consent, he can't blame himself then; he can say he told me to go home. Here's the track of our horses to and from the bee-tree. I'll go a little ways, any how, and see. Besides, if I might get hurt so might he, and I ought to be near to help."

This reasoning did not satisfy his conscience at all, but the passion for hunting had seized upon him since killing the buck, and both in men and in animals there is no instinct or passion stronger, when once aroused. Many a quiet student or business-man does not dream of possessing such a dormant passion until some success in sport starts him for life with eagerness in a path never before thought of. Even fishing—in some respects the meanest, least exciting form of hunting, except when sharks or whales are the game—often becomes a mania. The exciting elements of both chance and skill unite in hunting to give zest to it; and better indulge with fishing-tackle and rifle than with lottery-tickets and cards.

In a few minutes the excited boy had hid his horse, and, rifle in hand, was cautiously approaching the bee-tree. Every few moments he would stop to listen for his uncle, and then

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google creep nearer and nearer. At last he could see the tree lying as they had felled it, although the opening was out of sight, hidden by the brush. Still he heard and saw nothing of his uncle.

"I wonder what can keep him," thought he. "I'll tell you what you had better do," he said to himself; "you just climb this cotton-wood here; you'll be safe there, and can see every thing too."

No sooner said than done. This time he carried his rifle up with him as he rapidly but silently ascended to the first fork.

He was hardly seated before he heard in the distance the crack of a rifle.

"Why, that's uncle now," he said to himself, and he began to descend. "No, I won't," he continued, resuming his seat; "it might be somebody else; any how I'll wait a while and see."

So saying, he glanced toward the opening in the bee-tree now full in view, and saw a good deal more than he had bargained for.

The stump of the tree was toward him—the top of the fallen monarch of the forest from him—the chasm in its side not more than sixty feet from where he sat. The bear was actually inside the opening. Having eaten all it could from the outside it had squeezed itself in, and, with its body half up the hollow, was greedily devouring its favorite food. Thus it was that it had not heard or smelled the approach of the boy. The delicious food and the honey daubed all over its head and nose, and the bees swarming fast and furious around, had made it oblivious in its bear's paradise to every thing else in the world.

Now Venable had seen bears in shows, but this was the first he had ever seen loose in its native forests, and the difference is very great. He was startled, but not terrified. In the first place, he was safely up a tree; in the second place, he was expecting his uncle every moment. For half an hour he sat looking on, when he again heard the sharp crack of a rifle, more distant than before. He knew it must be his uncle—it was in the direction in which he had left him—besides, there was no one else in the forest that he knew of.

For some time before this it had occurred to him that it would be a glorious thing if he could only kill the bear—ten times greater than the killing of the buck. He had dismissed the idea, however, as impossible. "My ball couldn't hurt him much through all that wool and fat," he thought; "if I only had a fair crack at his head it would be different."

But now it suddenly occurred to him—"Suppose uncle is off after other game—he may not come here at all; and when he goes home and finds I'm not there, how will he or any body know where to look? And who can tell how long that bear will stay there eating?"

This put a new face on the matter. Slowly the idea dawned on him of actually attempting to kill the animal. But it was full half an hour before he could resolve upon the step. At last he thought, "It'll do no hurt to try; any how I'm safe up here." Saying this to himself, he took aim—resting his rifle in the fork of a small branch—at the centre of the animal's back, and fired.

As the sound rang on the air the bear gave a desperate plunge backward out of the hollow of the tree; but the plunge was so violent that it was carried down along the trunk into the hollow below the cut. Venable could now see that its whole head was coated thickly with honey and wax; the wool so plastered thereby over its eyes that it was blind for the time. The slit made in the tree was narrow also; it must have been with difficulty that it had forced itself in. Now, gorged and swollen with eating, it was no easy matter to get out.

In a little while, too, the young Texan could guess, at least, that the ball had broken its back. For ten minutes it was writhing, struggling, and turning itself, a huge black mass of honey and wool, before it occurred to Venable to load again. This he did as rapidly as possible. By this time the bear had got its head and fore-shoulders out of the slit, and was trying, evidently in great pain, to get the rest of its body out. Again the crack of the rifle woke the forest echoes, but the ball struck the earth to one side.

Another convulsive struggle of the bear. Full half of its body was out, and it stopped an instant, panting, when another ball from the tree struck it on the head, and the monster lay, half in and half out of the tree, motionless.

But the young Texan had no idea of descending from his nest. "There's no telling what might happen," he said to himself. In a few minutes he heard a rustling beneath him, and could detect among the bushes his uncle creeping cautiously up, his rifle in hand, cocked, ready to fire. The boy felt strongly disposed to call out, but he was ashamed at having disobeyed his uncle, and was silent for the moment. Meanwhile his uncle had reached the very tree he was in, and, peering from behind it, had caught sight of the bear, and leveled his rifle to fire. The next instant he lowered it from his shoulder with a puzzled expression, then let it fall into the hollow of his arm. He saw that the animal was dead. Walking forward—cautiously at first—he finally punched it with the end of his rifle, exclaiming:

"Well! who in cre-a-tion?"

This was more than Venable could stand, and sliding rapidly down the tree he approached the astonished Texan.

"Oh, uncle," he exclaimed, "I'm so sorry! I ought to have gone home. Please forgive me. I was only up there waiting for you to come."

His uncle only replied by taking a seat beside the bear on the tree, paying no attention to the enraged bees swarming around him, looking steadily at Venable.

"And it was you who shot it?" he said, at length, after regarding him a while in silence.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Yes, uncle, I'm very sorry; I waited a long time for you first. Are you angry with me?"

"Angry with you!" said his uncle, with sudden energy. "Angry with you! I guess not! But how was it?"

Venable then gave him a full account of the whole matter, to which his uncle listened with grave and even respectful attention. It was evident to the boy that his uncle thought a vast deal more than ever of him, and his heart bounded within him.

"Now, Ven," he said at length, "off with your coat, roll up your sleeves, out with your knife, we must get to work."

In a short time they had dragged the bear—and hard work it was—away from the bees, flayed it, then disemboweled it, then cut up the huge carcass, tied it up in the skin, laid it on the stronger of the two horses which Venable brought up for the purpose, and were slowly on their way home.

"It was a panther I got after," said the uncle, as they went. "Or rather it was a panther got after me. I had two good shots at him too. It's the second time we've had a pitched fight. I'll tell you about it. You know my Dutchman up in the Cedar brake, Hoogenboom. Well, he has a wife and a cabin full of white-headed children way up among the mountains. One cold day last winter the Dutchman had gone over to New Braunsfeld. I happened to be in the wagon, Francisco driving the oxen, going toward the cabin. When we were within a quarter of a mile of it we heard the most awful screams.

"I was sure it was Indians. My rifle had been left behind—never leave it behind you, Ven, when you go out, you'll be certain to be sorry for it before you get back. I ran on, however, telling Francisco to come on with the wagon. When I got to the cabin, there was the woman and all her children outside, yelling like forty. They were all at dinner, when all at once a panther lighted right in the centre of the table, making a beautiful smash of plates and things. The smell of the fried pork had drawn it, and it had jumped in through the open door. In half a minute the woman and her children were outside. Before the woman had done telling Francisco had stopped the team in front of the cabin. None of us had any thing except a pair of tongs the woman had brought out in her hurry.

"While we were consulting what to do the panther climbed up the chimney and made a jump from the roof at Francisco, who was riding on one of the oxen, knocking him off between the yoke on to the wagon-tongue.

"I snatched the tongs and jumped on the animal, and began pounding it the best I could; but it managed to slip out, and was gone like a shot. I knew it this morning by one eye knocked out with the tongs. I dare say we will meet again, and next time—never mind!"

SLACK A LITTLE.

Slack a little! Slack a little,
Darling wife;
Why such breathless haste and hurry
All thy life?
Slack the vigor of thy striving,
Ere too late.
Tell those monsters, Care and Labor,
Just to wait.

Slack a little! Slack a little,
Busy hand!
Slack thy rubbing and thy scrubbing,
Drop the sand;
Minister thy blessings slowly,
And the longer!
Bind love's thousand precious tendrils
All the stronger!

Slack a little! Slack a little,
Weary feet!
'Tis a thorny road ye're treading,
Death to greet.
Slack your quick and fearless stepping,
Spare your strength!
Ye the golden streets of Heaven
Shall tread at length!

Slack a little! Slack a little,
Precious heart!
Slack the fervor of thy throbbing
Ere we part.
Thrill not thus with every sorrow,
Anxious ever!
Trembling like an Angel Lyre
Forever.
Strung for high and holy themes,
Slack thy sorrow,
Heaven those rapturous themes may wake
Perhaps to-morrow!

Slack a little! Time how fleeting,
Slack thy wing!
To my heart's long-cherished treasure
Let me cling!
Go to Mirth, and from his chalice
Take the pleasure;
Pilfer Wealth, and from his palace,
Take his treasure.
Why such haste my night to bring,
Slack, O Time, thy scythe and wing!

Slack a little! Slack a little,
Death, O Death!
Vain thy strife and panting haste,
All out of breath!
See! she fears not thy approaching—
Thou hast no sting!
Clasp her! in thy cold embracing
She will sing!
Slack, O Death! how sure thy loss,
Thou wast conquered on the Cross!

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THREE DAYS OF TERROR.

ON the tenth of July, 1863, my mother and myself arrived in the city of New York. We had set out on a grand tour of visitation. After vegetating year after year in a New England village, we had sallied forth in genuine country fashion to hunt up our kinsfolk in various parts of the land. We were in no hurry. We had the whole summer before us. We wished to avoid crowds, noise, and excitement, to stop whenever we pleased, as long as we chose, and have a slow, old-fashioned, sociable, sensible journey. Thus far our tranquil visions had been more than realized. For three weeks we had been loitering placidly along our way, and nothing had occurred to mar our tranquillity. We hoped now to spend a few days quietly with my brother J., call on various friends and relatives, visit Central Park and a lion or so, shop a little, and move onward at our leisure.

But man proposes and Fate disposes, and nothing in New York turned out as we expected. Instead of visiting our friends and meandering leisurely about the city, we were caught in a mob and penned up in our first stopping-place. From the first moment of our arrival every thing went wrong. J. did not meet us at the boat as he had promised, and we had to find our way without him in a drizzling rain. The streets were dark, dirty, and crowded with ill-looking people. The whole city was enveloped in fog and gloom. The home regiments had gone to drive the rebels from Pennsylvania, and many hearts were trembling. The household which received us had its full share of anxiety. Its youngest member, a youth of seventeen, had gone with the volunteers, and other friends were in the Army of the Potomac. The disappointing brother, too, was employed on a sad mission, helping a friend to Gettysburg to find the body of a slain brother; so that within doors we found it as dismal as without, and our first impressions of the great city were any thing but cheering.

Our prospect was limited to two rows of brick-houses and a broad expanse of house-roofs from our room in the upper story. "Nobody was in town," but the streets were jammed with carts and children, and the noise and clatter were incessant and deafening. The weather continued most oppressive. Low, dingy clouds possessed the sky, and not a breath of fresh air was attainable. I thought New York a most detestable summer residence, and resolved to leave it as soon as possible.

On the third morning of our sojourn, however, the sky brightened. The sun attempted to shine, and the papers brought good tidings. Lee was retreating, Meade pursuing, the Potomac rising, and our spirits rose with it. At breakfast Central Park was moved and carried by acclamation; but soon some pattering raindrops brought out an opposition, which induced us to defer our jaunt till settled weather. So we scattered in various directions—J. down town, and I to Broadway. But even there I could see nothing attractive. Every thing looked hot, glaring, and artificial, and every body looked shabby, jaded, and care-worn. An overworked horse dropped dead in the street before me, and I was glad to take refuge for a time in the Astor Library.

Returning thence at mid-day I first saw signs of disturbance. A squad of policemen passed before me into Third Avenue, clerks were looking eagerly from the doors, and men whispering in knots all up and down the street; but I was too much a stranger to be certain that these appearances were unusual, though they annoyed me so much that I crossed at once to Second Avenue, along which I pursued my way peacefully, and once at home thought no more of it. We were indulging ourselves in siestas after our noonday lunch, when a great roaring suddenly burst upon our ears—a howling as of thousands of wild Indians let loose at once; and before we could look out or collect our thoughts at all the cry arose from every quarter, "The mob! the mob!" "The Irish have risen to resist the draft!"

In a second my head was out the window, and I saw it with my own eyes. We were on a cross-street between First and Second avenues. First Avenue was crowded as far as we could see it with thousands of infuriated creatures, yelling, screaming, and swearing in the most frantic manner; while crowds of women, equally ferocious, were leaning from every door and window, swinging aprons and handkerchiefs, and cheering and urging them onward. The rush and roar grew every moment more terrific. Up came fresh hordes faster and more furious; bareheaded men, with red, swollen faces, brandishing sticks and clubs, or carrying heavy poles and beams; and boys, women, and children hurrying on and joining with them in this mad chase up the avenue like a company of raging fiends. In the hurry and tumult it was impossible to distinguish individuals, but all seemed possessed alike with savage hate and fury. The most dreadful rumors flew through the street, and we heard from various sources the events of the morning. The draft had been resisted, buildings burned, twenty policemen killed, and the remainder utterly routed and discomfited; the soldiers were absent, and the mob triumphant and increasing in numbers and violence every moment.

Our neighborhood was in the greatest excitement. The whole population turned out at once, gazing with terror and consternation on the living stream passing before them, surging in countless numbers through the avenue, and hurrying up town to join those already in action. Fresh yells and shouts announced the union of forces, and bursting flames their accelerated strength and fury. The armory on Twenty-second Street was broken open, sacked, and fired, and the smoke and flames rolled up directly behind us.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

With breathless interest we watched their rapid progress till diverted by a new terror. Our own household had been invaded. My brother's wife was gone; no one knew whither. Above and below we looked in vain for her. We could only learn that a note had been brought to her just before her disappearance. What could have happened? At such times imagination is swift and mystery unsupportable. We were falling into a terrible panic, and devising all manner of desperate expedients, when the wanderer appeared, looking very heroic, accompanied by J., all bloody and wounded. He had been attacked by the mob while passing a little too near them, knocked down, terribly beaten, and robbed of watch and pocket-book. Reality for once had outstripped imagination. For a time all our attention was absorbed in him. The wounds, though numerous, were happily not of a dangerous character. The gang which attacked him, attracted by his little tri-colored badge of loyalty, were fortunately only armed with light fence-pickets; so that, though weak from loss of blood, and badly cut and bruised in head, limbs, and body, no serious consequences seemed likely to result from his injuries.

Outdoors, meanwhile, all was clamor and tumult. Bells were tolling in every quarter. The rioters were still howling in Twenty-second Street, and driving the firemen from the burning armory. The building fell and the flames sunk, and then darkness came all at once and shut out every thing. We gathered gloomily around my brother in the back-parlor. An evening paper was procured, but brought no comfort. It only showed more clearly the nature and extent of this fearful outbreak. It only told us that the whole city was as helpless and anxious as ourselves. Many were in far greater danger, for obscurity is sometimes safety; but the black, lowering night, and the disabled condition of our only male protector, oppressed us heavily. Our neighborhood was all alive. Men tramped incessantly through the street, and women chatted and scolded in the windows; children cried and cats squalled; a crazy man in the rear raved fiercely for Jeff Davis and the Southern Confederacy; but over every other sound every few moments the bells rang out the alarm of some new fire. Some were very near; some at a distance. We would start and count the district, and tremble for the Tribune or the Arsenal.

Thus passed the eve, till at last we separated and tried to compose ourselves to rest; but who could sleep with such terrors around them? That fiery mass of frenzied creatures which had passed so near us in the afternoon was raging somewhere in the city, and that frightful roar and rush might any moment burst again upon our ears. They might sweep through our street and scatter every thing before them. Fires kindled by them illumined many parts of the city.

As the clocks struck twelve a great shout startled me, and a light flamed right up before me. A huge bonfire had been kindled in the middle of the street not far below us. Wild forms were dancing about it, and piling on fresh fuel. Great logs and beams and other combustibles were dragged up and heaped upon it. Sleep, now, was of course impossible. From a seat in an upper window I saw it rise and fall, flame up and fade. Was it a plaything or a signal? In either case I dared not leave it. A gang of noisy boys gathered around it. "Bring out Horace Greeley!" once was called. At last, after two hours' watching and wondering, a heavy shower put out the fires and drove the rioters homeward. Dark figures slunk to darker lanes and hovels, and rest and quiet fell on the distracted city.

At break of day it roused again. Another cloudy, foggy, warm, oppressive morning. Very early I resumed my post of observation. A black, charred mound loomed up below, and cinders, smoke, and soot filled the air and encrusted every object. Rough-looking men were already astir. A car passed down the avenue crowded inside and out; another passed; another, and no more. No rattling carts were heard, no shrieking milkmen. All ordinary sights and sounds were missing. Soon hordes of ragged children attacked the heap of rubbish in the street. Little fair-haired girls and toddling boys bore off great armfuls of sticks and brands. Meanwhile the larger children, great boys, grown women, had hurried off to the smoking ruins in Twenty-second Street, and returned laden with spoils. Charred beams, baskets of coal, iron rails, muskets, and musket-barrels were carried by in vast quantities. The "dangerous classes" were evidently wide awake.

Our household meanwhile bestirred itself slowly. J. had rested little, but was free from fever or any alarming symptoms. Much time was spent in dressing his wounds, and some in preparing breakfast. There was no milk, no ice to be had, and meat and bread were on the wane; and so I ventured out with my sister H. for supplies. We found our street full of people, excitement, and rumors. Men and boys ran past us with muskets in their hands. We heard that a fight was in progress above Twenty-second Street. The mob had seized a gun-factory and many muskets; but the police had driven them off and taken back part of their plunder. It was cheering to find that the police were still alive. Second Avenue was densely thronged, but no cars were running. A great crowd surrounded the ruins of the Armory and blackened the Twenty-second Street crossing. Men talked in low, excited tones, and seemed afraid of each other. The stores were mostly closed and business suspended. With difficulty we procured supplies of provisions and a newspaper; but percussion caps and ammunition were stoutly denied us. No one dared to admit that they kept any such articles lest the rioters should take them away by force. A

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google friendly bookseller at last supplied us. He had been out in disguise, he said, and heard the rioters boasting among themselves. One said he had made a hundred dollars already, and now he had arms and meant to use them. All the shops on the avenue had been threatened. The mob were gathering in great force in our vicinity, and things looked every moment more threatening; so we hurried home as fast as possible, and I took my post again at the window.

New and strange sights met my eyes. Such multitudes of people every where; filling street and sidewalks, crowding all the doors and windows, the balconies and roofs of the houses. Many were merely spectators; some not far distant were actors. In the First Avenue the crowd was now very dense and clamorous. The liquor store on the corner was thronged with villainous-looking customers, and the women who had welcomed the mob on their first appearance were again talking loudly as if urging them on to action. "Die at home!" was the favorite watch-word which often reached our ears. Every thing indicated that a collision was approaching. We caught, after a time, a glimpse of soldiers, and heard the welcome rattle of musketry, distant at first, then nearer and nearer. The soldiers marched to and through Twenty-second Street and turned down First Avenue. The mob yelled and howled and stood their ground. Women from the roofs threw stones and brickbats upon the soldiers. Then came the volleys; the balls leaped out and the mob gave way at once and fled in every direction. A great crowd rushed through our street, hiding in every nook and corner. We closed doors and blinds, but still peeped out of the windows. The soldiers marched slowly back up the avenue, firing along the way; crossed over into Second Avenue, marched down opposite our street and fired again. Again the mob scattered, and scampered in droves through the street. Yet another volley, and balls came tearing down the centre of our street right before us, dashing along the pavements and carrying off frames from the trees. A boy on the sidewalk opposite was struck; he fell in a pool of blood, and was carried away to die. The streets were now cleared, the crowds had vanished, the soldiers withdrew, and the mob was quelled. For two hours peace and quiet prevailed. Our neighbors retired to their several abodes. We took dinner by gas-light with closed blinds, and flattered ourselves that the worst was over.

But as night came on the sun came out, and men crawled out into sight again. A stranger on horseback rode slowly up the street. Crowds quickly gathered around him. Swarms rushed out of the old liquor store and from all the neighboring alleys, and greeted him with shouts and cheers. We saw him waving his hat and haranguing the multitude, and heard their storm of response, but could catch no words. Great bustle and preparation followed. Women were foremost among them, inciting and helping. The rider slunk off again eastward as he came, while men formed in bands and marched off down the avenue. A squad of lads, decently clad and armed, marched down our street and joined those on the corner, were received with loud cheers, and sent on after the others.

The sun set clear, and a beautiful night came on; a radiant midsummer night, but darker to us than the preceding. Dark skies seemed more in harmony with the scenes around us, and the contrast only deepened the gloom. The papers brought no encouragement. Fearful deeds of atrocity were recorded. The mob were increasing in power and audacity, and the city was still paralyzed and panic-struck. The small military force available could only protect a few important positions, leaving the greater part defenseless. Our inflammable neighborhood was wholly at the mercy of the mob. Again with heavy hearts we assembled in the back-parlor and discussed probabilities and contingencies. Our position on the very edge of one of the worst of the "infected districts" had in it, after all, one element of security: the mob could not touch us without endangering some of their friends. The incessant din and clamor without were little calculated to strengthen our courage. The warm, bright night set every evil thing in motion, and man and beast conspired to fill the air with all manner of hideous and discordant sounds. The tramping, scolding, screaming, squalling, and raving of the preceding night were repeated and intensified. Cats and dogs squalled and howled, bells rang incessantly, and mingled with all these sounds came at intervals the most mournful of all, the long-drawn piercing wails of Irishwomen bemoaning their dead.

Worn out with listening we resolved at last to try to rest. I made up a bundle, put my clothes in running order, read the most comforting Psalms I could find, and laid myself down to sleep. Scarcely had my head touched the pillow when a new alarm of fire sounded. Lights streamed through the door of my room and illumined the houses opposite. "Another fire in Twenty-second Street!" was the cry. The police station had been set on fire, and volumes of smoke and flame were rising again very near us. From the rear windows we saw it all with the utmost distinctness; heard the roaring and crackling, and felt the heat of the flames. Soon they wrapped the house and caught the adjacent fire-tower, whose bell was clamoring even now for aid. The mob yelled with delight, and drove off the eager firemen. The flames soon wreathed the tower and rose in majestic columns. The whole neighborhood was flooded with light. Thousands of spectators gazed upon the scene, crowning the house-tops as with statues of living fire. The blazing turret shook and reeled, beams snapped and parted, and the bell plunged heavily downward, "tolling the death-knell of its own decease;" but its dying notes were lost in the triumphant shouts of the mob maddened by their success.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

We heard them hurrying on to the gas-works, leaving the waning fires at last to the firemen. We could hear them pounding and shaking the gates, swearing at their inability to force them, and then rushing off again for some easier prey.

The fires were now quite subdued, and we ventured to return to our several rooms. It was past midnight, but the city was still wide awake. The streets were thronged, and the opposite houses were all open and brilliantly lighted. They belonged to the better class of tenement houses; and their occupants, though not themselves rioters, so far sympathized with them as evidently to feel no fear of them. Many were chatting at this time about the doors and windows with a careless merriment which I could not but envy. I gave a parting look up and down the street, and again sought my pillow. The tramping in the street gradually subsided, the din and discord slowly died away, and a slight stupor was stealing gently over me, when a sudden rush and scream brought me again in an instant to my window. There was a spring and a chase, and then such piercing, thrilling cries as words can not describe. I could see nothing. Not a person was in sight; but from the vicinity of that wretched liquor store I distinctly heard dreadful cries, and caught these broken words: "Oh, brothers! brothers! Save me! save me!"

The sounds thrilled through the opposite and nearer houses. Lights quivered and wavered, and doors were shut hastily. The cries and groans continued. There were confused sounds as of dragging and lifting, and then silence. A mist had veiled the stars, and darkness fallen upon the street. Our noisy neighbors were struck dumb. Every door and window was closed, and every light extinguished. I trembled from head to foot, and could scarcely grope my way to the back chamber. Part of our household were still watching there, more bells were tolling, and three new fires were raging. Destruction and death were on every side.

Again I returned to my old position in the window, and peered out into the darkness. All things looked ghostly and ghastly. The houses opposite were dissolved in mist. I seemed to see through them far down into the heart of the city, and heard in the distance the roar as of great multitudes in commotion. What was passing I could not tell, but any thing and every thing seemed possible at this hour. Would the night ever end, or any thing be left should morning come? Once only the welcome report of musketry reached my ears. At last the glimmering of dawn appeared. The mist dissolved; the wandering houses came back to position; the street resumed its old familiar look, and men and boys their ceaseless tramp, tramp, tramp.

One of these men stopped across the way, and said, in a low, scared tone to some one in the house: "They hung a Massachusetts —— over there last night." One word was lost to me—what it was I can only conjecture; but whether citizen, soldier, or negro, I do not doubt that some poor fellow very near us met the fate of so many others in those days of terror; and though his name and story may never be known on earth, his cries for help will surely rise up in judgment against his murderers.

But another day had come, Wednesday, July 15th. A long, bright, blazing midsummer day was before us. There was little change in the aspect of affairs without. The city was not all burned down, we found. The newspapers were still alive, and insisting that more troops were on hand and the mob checked; but we saw no signs of it. The morning indeed passed more quietly. The rioters were resting from the labors of the night; but business was not resumed, and swarms of idle men still hung about the streets and stores. No cars were running in the avenues, no carts in the streets. No milkmen came, and no meatmen, and not a soldier or policeman showed his head.

The day dragged on heavily. There was little to be seen, and nothing to be done but write letters that could not be sent, and wonder at our situation. Little had we thought that our quiet pilgrimage would lead us to such turbulent and tempestuous scenes. All our plans had been brought to naught. Visiting, shopping, sight-seeing, were not even to be considered. All ordinary pursuits and pleasures had ceased, social intercourse was given up, and nothing remained but chaos and confusion. We heard but the vaguest reports of the doings of the city, and still less of the outer world. The war at the door drowned the battle afar off.

It was most humiliating, it was almost incredible, that such a state of things should exist in the heart of a civilized and Christian community. "Was this your joyous city, whose merchants were princes, whose traffickers were among the honorable of the earth?" Could it be that this great city, the pride and boast of the nation, was trampled down and held under the feet of these mad rioters? She seemed utterly prostrate and helpless. Her vast treasures, her immense store-houses, her long lines of palaces, her great multitudes of citizens, were bound and offered up for sacrifice. The whole nation was trembling and terror-struck. No one could see when and where it would terminate.

Flight seemed the only refuge. Could not we, wearied travelers, at least steal away to some green nook and be at rest? We discussed plans and dismissed them. Nothing seemed feasible. There were no cars and no carriages, and no one to help us to them. J., though improving, was still unable to go out, and we were unwilling to leave him and his family in such circumstances. We were bound, hand and foot, in this miserable neighborhood, unable to stir out of doors, and with the prospect of another night of horrors.

The day, though quieter than the preceding, was far more irksome. The brick walls and glaring streets, the heat, confusion, and con-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

finement were intolerably wearisome. The sun blazed more and more fiercely. The stillness was oppressive and ominous. It seemed the calm before a storm. Already clouds were gathering in the horizon. As night approached we heard drums beating, and gangs of rioters marched up their favorite avenue. The whole population bestirred itself at once. Men, women, and children rushed out cheering and clamoring, some hurrying on with the crowd, some hanging around the corner. Many soon returned, laden with spoil—bedding, clothing, and furniture. The crowd increased rapidly in the street and around the liquor store. Great excitement prevailed. There was loud talking with fierce gestures. Some ran thither with fire-arms, some with poles and boards. Then some one shouted, "They are coming!" and a small band of soldiers appeared marching up our street. The mob seemed to swell into vast dimensions, and densely filled the whole street before them. Hundreds hurried out on the house-tops, tore up brickbats, and hurled them with savage howls at the approaching soldiers. Shots were fired from secret ambushes, and soldiers fell before they had fired. Then they charged bravely into the mob, but their force was wholly inadequate. One small howitzer and a company of extemporized militia could do little against those raging thousands. A fierce conflict raged before our eyes. With breathless interest we watched them from door and windows. We feared the soldiers would be swallowed up and annihilated. Some now appeared in sight with a wounded officer and several wounded men, looking from side to side for shelter. Their eyes met ours with mute appeal. There was no time to be lost; the mob might any moment be upon them. There was a moment's consultation, a hasty reference to J., an unhesitating response: "Yes, by all means;" we beckoned them in, and in they came. Doors and windows were at once closed, and the house became a hospital, and seemed filled with armed men. The wounded men were carried into my brother's room; the Colonel was laid on the bed, and the others propped up with pillows. There were a few moments of great commotion and confusion. We flew for fans, ice water, and bandages. Some of the soldiers went out into the fight again, and some remained with the wounded. A surgeon, who had volunteered as a private under his old commander, dressed the wounds of the sufferers. The Colonel was severely wounded in the thigh by a slug made of a piece of lead pipe, producing a compound fracture. The wounds of two others, though less dangerous, were severe and painful.

Twilight was now upon us, and night rapidly approaching. The soldiers had been forced to retreat, leaving the mob in great force and fury. We heard them shouting and raving on the corner, and knew that we were in great danger. Already they were clamoring for the wounded soldiers who had escaped them. We thought of Colonel O'Brien's fate, and could not suppress the thought that our own house might be made the scene of a like tragedy. Could we defend ourselves if attacked? A hurried consultation was held. We had arms and ammunition, and, including J. and the slightly wounded soldiers, half a dozen men able and willing to use them. But we could not "man our lines." We were open to attack at once from the front and rear, the roof, the front basement, and the balcony above it. We might, indeed, retreat to the upper stories, barricade the stairway, and hold it against all the assailants that could crowd into the hall. But if they chose to fire the house below we could not prevent it, and then there would be no escape either for our wounded or ourselves.

The Colonel promptly decided the question; resistance was hopeless, could only make the case worse, and must not be attempted. Not only so, but all signs of the presence of soldiers must be removed. Arms, military apparel, and bloody clothing were accordingly concealed. The Colonel was conveyed to the cellar and placed on a mattress. The young soldier, next to him most severely wounded, was assisted up to the rear apartment on the upper floor and placed in charge of my mother and myself. The soldiers who had remained were then ordered to make their escape from the house as they best could, and to hasten to head-quarters with an urgent request that a force might be sent to our relief. The surgeon was also requested to go, but would not listen to the suggestion. He had been regimental surgeon for two years under the Colonel, and insisted on remaining by his side, to take care of him, and to share his fate whatever it might be. He took his post, therefore, in the cellar, extemporizing as well as he could some scanty means of concealment for both from the boxes and bins which it contained. The remaining soldier, though severely wounded in the foot, could yet walk with pain and difficulty; and it was decided that, as soon as it should be safe or necessary, he should try the chances of escape through the scuttle and over the roofs of the adjoining buildings.

J., with his bandaged head and disabled arm, was liable to be taken for a wounded soldier, and his wife and her sister, Mrs. P——, insisted that he also should betake himself to the roof. He could render no material assistance if he remained; on the other hand, his presence might precipitate a scene of violence which would not be offered to ladies alone. They did not feel that they were personally in danger—so far there was no report that the lawless violence of the rioters had been directed against women; and if he could get away he might be the means of bringing speedier relief. Very reluctantly he yielded to these considerations, and prepared to accompany the wounded soldier. The mother of the household took refuge in her room on the second-floor. To her daughter-in-law, wife of an absent son, was assigned a post of observation at

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

a front window. The two heroic women, H. and her sister, remained below to confront the mob.

Of all these arrangements, made mostly after we had assumed the charge assigned us, we at the time knew nothing. In utter darkness and desolation we sat above by the bedside of our young soldier, receiving his farewell messages for his mother and friends, and knowing not how soon he might be torn from us. There was no human power to help us in this extremity; we could only trust in Him "who stilleth the madness of the people." The suspense was terrible. In the rear, as we stole an occasional out-look through our closed blinds, we could see men here and there climbing the fences; they might be rioters breaking in, or residents breaking out. All was confusion and uncertainty. We knew not friends from foes.

In front the demonstrations were still more alarming. The rioters had taken possession of the street, stationed a guard on both avenues, and were chasing up and down for the soldiers. Then they were seen searching from house to house; beginning, fortunately for us and ours, on the opposite side, proceeding toward Second Avenue, then crossing the street and coming back gradually toward us. At last they reached the house next to ours. A few moments we waited in breathless silence. Then came a rush up the steps, and the bell rang violently. Not a sound was heard through the house. Again and yet again the bell rang, more and more furiously. Heart throbbed, nerves quivered, but no one stirred. Then came knocks, blows, kicks, threats, attempts to force the door. Come in they must and would; nothing could stay them.

Having gained for the retreating party all the time she could, Mrs. P—— at length unlocked the door, opened it, passed out, and closing it behind her, stood face to face with the mob, which crowded the steps and swarmed on the sidewalk and the adjacent street. What could she do? She knew that they would come in, that they would search the house, that they would find the men; but she was determined not to give them up without an effort to save them. Possibly, in parleying with them, she might at least calm somewhat the fury of the passion that swayed that howling mob; possibly in that brutal and maddened throng there might be a few with human hearts in their bosoms to which she might find a way, win them to her side, and enlist their aid in saving the lives of the intended victims. That was her only hope.

"What do you want?" she asked, while the air was yet ringing with the cry that came up from the crowd, "The soldiers! the soldiers!" "Bring out the soldiers!" One who stood near and seemed to be a leader replied, "There were two soldiers went into this house, and we must have them. You must give them up."

"There were two that came in, but went out again. They are not here now."

She spoke in a low but perfectly clear and steady voice, that compelled attention, and the crowd hushed its ravings to catch her words.

"Let us see; if they are not here we will not harm you; but we must search the house."

"We can not let you in; there are only women here—some that are old and feeble, and the sight of such a crowd will frighten them to death."

"They shall not all come in," was the reply; and after some further parley it was agreed that half a dozen only should enter and make the search. The leader gave his orders, the door was opened, and the men detailed came in; but before it could be closed the mob surged up, pressed in, and filled the hall. Many of them were armed with the stolen carbines.

"Light the gas!" was the cry.

"My sister has gone for a light."

It came, and the parley was renewed. The leader again demanded the soldiers; insisted that they were there, and said it would be better for themselves if they would give them up. She persisted in the statement she had made.

"She is fooling us, and using up the time while they are getting away by the roof!" cried one, and pressing forward with his musket pointed at her, endeavored to pass her. Very deliberately she took hold of the muzzle and turned it aside, saying, "Don't do that. You know I am a woman, and it might frighten me."

The leader returned to the charge. "We know the men are here, and if you give them up to us you shall not be harmed. But if you do not, and we find them, you know what a mob is. I can not control them; your house will be burned over your heads, and I will not guarantee your lives for five minutes."

"You will not do that," was the reply. "We are not the kind of people whose houses you wish to burn. My only son works as you do, and perhaps in the same shop with some of you, for seventy cents a day."

She did not tell them that her amateur apprentice boy had left his place to go to Pennsylvania and fight their friends the rebels. A young man, whom she had noticed as one of the few of decent appearance, stepped to her side and whispered to her, advising her compliance with the demand, assuring her that the men could not be controlled. The tone more than the words indicated to her that she had made one friend; and she found another, in the same way, a moment later.

Meantime the leaders were consulting whether they should go first above or below, and decided on the latter. Stationing one man with a musket at the door, and one at the stairs, they proceeded, pioneered by H., first to the parlors, and then to the basement, thoroughly examining both. Most fortunately the sentinels were the two young men in whom Mrs. P—— felt she had found friends, and she was not slow to improve the opportunity to deepen the impression she had made. But now the crowd outside, thundering at the basement door, burst in the panels, and forcing it open, with terrible

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google oaths and threats rushed in and filled the lower hall. Part joined the searching party, and some hurried up the first-floor. One, crowding past the sentinel, was striding up the stairs. We heard his call to his comrades, "Come on up stairs!" and our hearts sunk within us. But the sentinel's stern command, enforced by his leveled piece, brought him back.

The main party, having ransacked the basement rooms, now turned to the cellar. In a moment a loud shout announced that they had found a victim. The surgeon was dragged up, forced out at the lower door, and delivered over to the crowd outside. A blow from a bludgeon or musket felled him to the earth, inflicting a terrible wound on the head. "Hang him, hang him!" "To the post at the Twenty-second Street corner!" were the cries as they hurried him off. The search within proceeded; a moment more and they had found the Colonel. A new and fiercer shout was sent up. An order from a leader thrilled through the hall, "Come down here some of yees wid yer muskets!"

At the first cry from the cellar Mrs. P—— sprung for the basement, intending to make her way at any hazard. A sentinel stood at the head of the stairway; a stalwart brute, reeking with filth and whisky. He seized her, with both arms about her waist, with a purpose of violence quite too evident. She struggled to free herself without raising an alarm, but in vain; then a sudden and piercing shriek, which rung through the house, made him for an instant relax his hold, and, wrenching herself away, she hurried back and sought the protection of the friendly sentinel.

"He will not let me pass; I must go down."

"You must not," he replied; "it is no place for you." And then he added, looking sternly at her, "You have deceived us. You said there was no one here, and there is."

"I would have done the same thing for you if you had been wounded. Look at me; do you not believe me?"

He did look, full in her eye, for an instant; then said: "Yes, I do believe it. You have done right, and I admire your spirit."

"But I must go down. Go with me."

"No; it is no place for you."

"Then go yourself, and save his life."

And turning over his charge to the sentinel at the door, he did go. Meantime the searching party, having found the Colonel, proceeded to question him. He said he was a citizen, accidentally wounded, and had been obliged to seek refuge there.

"Why did you hide, if you are a citizen?"

Because, he said, he was afraid he should be taken for a soldier. They would not believe, but still he insisted on his statement. Then the muskets were sent for, and four pieces leveled at his head, as he lay prostrate and helpless.

"Fire, then, if you will, on a wounded man and a citizen. I shall die, any how, for my wound is a mortal one. But before you fire I wish you would send for a priest."

"What, are you a Catholic?"

"Yes."

This staggered them; and while they were hesitating the sentinel joined the group, and as soon as he looked on the Colonel exclaimed: "I know that man. I used to go to school with him. He is no soldier."

This turned the scale. The leaders were satisfied, and decided to let him go. But before leaving him they rifled his pockets; and here he narrowly escaped falling into renewed danger. While the parley was in progress his fingers had been busily occupied in quietly and coolly removing from his pocket a quantity of bullets which he had forgotten, and which, if they had been found, would certainly have betrayed him.

Those of the mob who had remained above, disappointed of their prey, with oaths and execrations protested against the action of their leaders, and sent the ruffian at the head of the stairway down to see if it was all right. But the positive statements of the friendly sentinel, which Mrs. P—— had the satisfaction of hearing him rehearse, as the two met in the lower hall, disarmed even his suspicions, and the rest could do no otherwise than acquiesce. So well satisfied, indeed, were the leaders, and, as it is not unreasonable to suppose, so impressed with the resolute bearing of the two ladies, that they volunteered to station a guard before the door to prevent the annoyance of any further search. As they had found the two men who had been reported to them as having entered the house, it did not seem to occur to them that there might be still others concealed; and so they took their departure, leaving the upper stories unvisited.

The surgeon in the mean time had been no less fortunate. In the crowd which hurried him off to death there happened to be one or two returned soldiers who had served in the same regiment with him, and when he came where it was light recognized him. They insisted on saving him, and, raising a party in their favor, finally prevailed, and having rescued him escorted him in safety to his home.

While these events were passing below our alarm and anxiety were beyond all expression. Our poor charge especially was in the greatest distress; ignorant of the fate of his Colonel and comrades, and apprehending every moment that he might himself be found and dragged out by the mob. Of course we knew but imperfectly at the time of it what was going on. We knew that the soldiers were in the house, and that men bent on their destruction were seeking for them. We heard the clamor without, the cry for "The soldiers!" the rush into the hall. Then we heard the calm, steady tones of the ladies, holding the mob in listening attention, and took courage. We heard the movement through the parlors and downward to the basement. Then came the irruption of the fierce crowd into the lower hall; and very soon loud cries from below told us that some one was

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google found. It might be the surgeon or the Colonel; it might be my brother, for we did not then know that he had effected his escape.

Again came up screams from below, ejaculations, loud words. Could it be that another was found? Again the heavy tramp of many men, this time moving upward and talking eagerly and rapidly. They paused in the hall; we dared not move or breathe; would they come up the stairs? No! The door is opened, men pass out, it is closed after them, and all is silent. Have they gone for others to complete the search, or to murder those already carried out?

Venturing at last below, as the stillness continued, I learned how favorable a turn affairs had taken. But though relieved for the moment, we were still in great anxiety, and in not a little peril. No one knew certainly what had become of J. The Colonel was greatly in need of immediate surgical attendance, and removal from the damp, chilly cellar. Our poor young soldier, too, was suffering much, both in mind and body. He was a volunteer of a day's service only, and this first experience of civil war was very painful. The rioters might learn or suspect that they had been deceived, and return to the search. He could bear to be shot in open fight, but not to be so hunted down. Help seemed to him impossible. The whole military force in the city, he knew, was already detailed on special duty, and none could be spared for us. If the rioters should come again nothing could save him; any further attempt at concealment would be worse than useless, and flight in his condition was impossible. We tried our best to cheer him, and to wait in patience, trusting to Him who had thus far kept us in safety. The weary hours dragged heavily onward. My mother and myself still sat in the dark with our young soldier, while the other ladies attended to the Colonel in the cellar.

The continued absence of J. gave us now much uneasiness. What had become of him we could not conjecture. From time to time I looked out from my old loop-hole in the front window. All was dark and desolate. Not a light in the opposite houses; not a person in sight but the men stationed before our house by the rioters. These marched back and forth in silence while a large body were carousing around the old liquor stand. "Come on," I heard one call, "and bring eight or ten with you!" They might come on again any moment, maddened with drink and disappointed vengeance. As time went on they grew more and more uproarious, singing, dancing, swearing, and yelling.

Anxious and troubled, I wandered from front to rear, now leaning out of the window to catch every movement without, and carrying back reports to my still more anxious and troubled soldier.

It was now, we thought, past midnight. We had no hope of relief, no thought or expectation but of struggling on alone hour after hour of distress and darkness; but as I was listening in my window to some unusually threatening demonstrations from the mob, I heard the distant clank of a horse's hoof on the pavement. Again and again it sounded, more and more distinctly; and then a measured tread reached my ears, the steady, resolute tramp of a trained and disciplined body. No music was ever half so beautiful! It might, it must be, our soldiers! Off I flew to spread the good news through the household, and back again to the window to hear the tramp nearer and fuller and stronger, and see a long line of muskets gleam out from the darkness, and a stalwart body of men stop at our door. "Halt!" was cried; and I rushed down stairs headlong, unlocked the door without waiting for orders, and with tears of joy and gratitude which every one can imagine and nobody describe, welcomed a band of radiant soldiers and policemen, and in the midst of them all who should appear but my brother, pale and exhausted, who had gotten off the house-top in some mysterious way and brought this gallant company to our rescue!

There was no time for inquiries or felicitations. The wounded men were our first care. Our young soldier in his delight had hobbled to the stairway, and was borne down in triumph by his sympathizing comrades, while a larger company brought the Colonel from the cellar. A pitiful sight he was, all bleeding and ghastly, shivering with cold and suffering great pain. Both soldiers were placed carefully in the carriage brought for their conveyance, and then we ladies were requested to accompany them immediately. It was unsafe to remain in the house, soldiers could not be spared to protect it, and it was best for us to go at once to the Central Police Station.

There was no time for deliberation or preparation, with two wounded men waiting. My mother was stowed away in a corner of the carriage, the other mother of the household perched up with the driver, and the remainder straggled along with my brother in various stages of dilapidation — some without bonnets, and some without shawls, and some in the thinnest of muslins and slippers. My own clothes were locked up and the keys unattainable; so I snatched what I could and ran with the others. Our military escort soon brought us into subordination. While we had been preparing, one of the two companies had been fighting, and had utterly dispersed the mob on the corner; but this we had hardly noticed, so intently had we been occupied. They were now ready to resume their march. We were formed into column with the utmost formality and precision. One piece of artillery and one company of infantry preceded, and another of each followed the carriage, marching slowly and majestically along the middle of the street; while we ladies moved as slowly along the sidewalks, surrounded by officers, policemen, and newspaper reporters.

The change was so sudden, so unexpected, so magical, that it was difficult to believe that we

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google were really in the body. We, who had been so lately in the depths of darkness and desolation, were now encompassed by armed bands eager to help and serve us. Dangers, seen and unseen, were still around us; great fires illumined the southern sky; house, furniture, and clothing were left behind us unprotected, but still we could only exult in the rescue of our hunted soldiers and our own blissful release from suspense and terror. With joyful hearts we followed our martial guard. This midnight flitting was full of romantic interest. The streets were silent and dark, lighted only by distant lurid flames. Slowly and solemnly the long, black procession moved onward down the broad avenue, through narrow and winding streets, stopping only from time to time for water for the wounded soldiers, or to scatter the foes lurking around us. Sometimes the skirmishers in advance charged out into the darkness, sometimes fired down the cross-streets, but no serious interruption occurred; and at last, after a weary march, the steady light of the Central Police Station gladdened our waiting eyes.

All now was life and animation. Well-dressed citizens were hurrying to and fro. Stalwart soldiers lined the street and guarded the steps and entrance, through which we were conducted to an inner apartment, and with much state and ceremony presented to the chieftains of civic power. Three days' experience of anarchy had made us feel the blessedness of lawful restraint, and surely no body of men ever looked so beautiful as these executives of law and government. Such fresh, radiant, energetic, clear-headed, and strong-hearted leaders looked able to conquer all the rioters in the land. Every body was wide-awake, dispatches coming and going, messengers flying about in all directions.

We were received with great civility and offered every possible accommodation, but the best attainable were somewhat scanty. The two rooms had each a table, a writing-desk, and a stack of arms, but no sofa or rocking-chair, no chance for napping or lounging. We saw at once that it was no resting-place for us, and after a brief council resolved to follow the fate of our Colonel; and so, leaving a spot which shines brightly in my remembrance, we continued our march to the St. Nicholas Hotel, obtained admittance, ascended four flights of stairs, parted with our kind and gentlemanly escort, and sat down to rest at half past two Thursday morning!

Sleep was of course still impossible. The exciting scenes of the night, and the incessant roar and rumble of Broadway, kept all awake; and at four o'clock loud cheers brought us to the window to see the glorious returning "Seventh" marshaled before us, and with all our hearts and voices we joined in the welcome which greeted them. A brighter morning dawned upon the city; other regiments had arrived in the night, and we knew that it was now safe. Broadway was busy and noisy. Business was resumed, and the mob much subdued, though still rampant in our old neighborhood. A reconnoissance showed that it was still unsafe to venture there. We passed the morning comparing notes and considering what to do with ourselves. My only desire was to quit the city—to beat a retreat as soon as possible. Our quiet tour had been rudely interrupted, our plans and purposes brought to naught; we had suffered great fatigue and anxiety, and we were unwilling to stay a moment longer. It was humiliating to leave our luggage in the enemy's country; but what were clothes to rest and quiet? A place for our heads was of more consequence than bonnets! Our friends were compelled to stay, but we could go; and most happy were we, now that we were sure of their safety, to improve that privilege. And so at three o'clock on Thursday afternoon, just three days from our first glimpse of the rioters, we shook the dust of New York from our slippers, and, trunkless and bonnetless, sped up North River.

STOOL-PIGEONRY.

LOUNGING on corners contiguous to "cigar divans," or sauntering leisurely along our fashionable thoroughfares, may be seen any day, from noon to sunset, individuals of dubious physiognomy, whose raiment and demeanor blazon forth the fact that they neither toil nor spin; men with superlatively glossy hats and artificially blue-black mustaches; resplendent in the matters of velvet and jewelry; immaculate as to linen: a trifle over-gorgeous, perhaps, and diffusing a somewhat too strong aroma of musk; attractive specimens, nevertheless, of sartorial and tonsorial art. These men are to most of our city readers cognizable at a glance as stool-pigeons—decoys in the pay of gambling hells and other disreputable establishments, and are, doubtless, to the unsophisticated majority, types of the highest pseudo "respectability" attainable by their class. It is not of these, however, that this article shall treat. There are recondite mysteries of stool-pigeonry which some few have to their cost explored. Besides these gay-plumed birds there be other less known varieties; demure, sad-colored pigeons—cooing doves, so to speak; pompous, white-neckclothed pouters, ay, even silken, soft-billing "turtles," whom to suspect were mild delirium, to detect utter frenzy.

The prevalent mania for incorporating "Companies" in every imaginable department of speculation has elevated stool-pigeonry almost to the dignity of a science, while the lavish expenditures and ingenious devices of the modern advertising system have resulted in rendering bribery and corruption not only admissible, but even "respectable." Men whose social standing should keep them above reproach sell their good names and honorable consciousness for lucre with as little compunction as Esau

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google sold his birth-right for a mess of pottage. Mammon and morality are at open war, and it needs no gift of prophecy to foretell the issue of their strife, if poor morality be left to its own unaided resources.

Of clerical stool-pigeonry in relation to quack medicines, musical instruments, wishy-washy novels, and other bepuffed wares, it would be superfluous as well as indelicate to say much. The numerous "testimonials" wherewith are studded the columns of most newspapers, state the case forcibly enough, and imply their own homilies.

The political stool-pigeon is such a very Proteus in form that to attempt his thorough description were a task requiring years of observation and reams of manuscript. From the diplomatic Premier, who disrupts nations by plausible mock-conciliation, or the incorruptible Congressional candidate, hired by his pretended opponents to draw votes away from his pretended fellow-partisan, down to the shallow trickster who bribes, bullies, or cajoles ignorant or venal electors into fraudulent ballots—through all the gradations of party chicanery in Cabinet, Congress, Lobby, and "Ward-meetings," ranges the repertory of the political stool-pigeon. Now we hear of him in the Imperial Chamber of Deputies, sounding by well-feigned opposition the probable reception of some doubtful measure projected by his royal master; anon he greets us in the Western country as a mountebank on the "stump," with howling energy of declamation exhorting his "feller-citizens" to "rally round that grand palladium of liberty, the ballot-box, and demonstrate to an attentive universe the superior intelligence of Squashville by giving an overwhelming majority to the upright and unimpeachable Seth Partyhack, who now, through his disinterested medium, solicits their suffrages"—the said upright and unimpeachable gentleman having given him, the orator, five hundred dollars in cash, and a promissory-note for as much more, payable after his election. Sometimes he may be seen plying busily between the City Hall and the Astor House, wherein, just before municipal elections, assemble in mysterious conclave the magnates—the Dii ex machinâ—of State and City politics; or, mayhap, shouldering his way, with many oaths, through the motley crowd that throngs "Old Tammany" on council nights; but almost before we have had time to note his appearance, hey, presto, change! Our London correspondence shows us that he has doffed his Democratic disguise, and is creating a great hubbub in Parliament about some new "Reform" bill or "Ministerial crisis."

Of all the forms of stool-pigeonry, however, the one most nearly concerning our social integrity is that practiced in speculative financial circles. Has thine eye, O reader! ever been caught by the announcement of some much-promising Stock Company for "mining, manufacturing, or chemical purposes," for the promulgation of some new patent of incalculable value to mankind, or for the reaping of rich dividends by prodding the earth's bowels in the "oil region?" Hast thou, after running over the list of directors, and finding therein names well known to thee of prominent bankers, merchants, and professional men, been led, in the lamb-like innocence of thine heart, to invest a hardly-spared portion of thy worldly goods in their auriferous shares? Hast thou then dismayedly watched the quotations of thy stock as, day by day, its market-price dwindled, until at last thou wast glad to rid thyself of it at the sacrifice of more than half that thou hadst expended? Dost thou even now wonder how men of such repute for financial sapience could have so overestimated the probabilities of lucrative success, and seek to soften the acerbities of thine own lot by sympathetic condolence with them whose losses must have exceeded, as their shares outnumbered, thine?

A whispered word in thine ear, good friend! These mighty capitalists, these reliable directors, the mere sound of whose names did seduce from thee thy little store, were not losers but gainers by the transaction that impoverished thee. They were stool-pigeons; decoys, the sale of whose gratuitous stock brought them clear profit at a price ruinous to thee; and thou wast duped, swindled, fleeced, villainously robbed!—robbed, not as by vulgar cut-purses, who at least run risk of legal penalty, but through the agency of "respectable" "'ticers," who, keeping safely within the letter of the law, and assured of a share of the booty, lured thee into the den of thieves where thy despoilment was accomplished.

A, who owns some worthless acres of land in a rocky district of Pennsylvania, consults with B, a speculative broker, as to the best means for converting dirt into "dross." B, for a handsome con-sid-er-ation, undertakes to incorporate a Company, with a capital of, say, one million, in ten thousand shares—par value ten dollars, subscription price two dollars per share. To this end he hunts up five or six bank-officers and eminent mercantile men of purchasable probity, who will allow their names to head the subscription-list and constitute the Board of Direction, in return for one thousand shares of stock to them, and each of them, delivered. The general public, always ready to follow the lead of wealthy notoriety, is then graciously allowed to compete for a certain number of shares at "the present low price," and a meeting of corporators is held, whereat a committee is appointed to examine the property prior to a transfer of the title-deed. This committee, consisting of A and B, with perhaps two or three of the purchasable probities (who give themselves no further trouble in the matter), returns a report in a week's time, giving a glowing description of "surface indications," "hundred-barrel" wells already flowing, and other phenomena guaranteeing at least fifty per centum interest on the investment. A receives a quarter of a million for his unarable land (one-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

fifth of which sum goes into B's pocket as "commission"), and is elected president of the Company. A flaming prospectus is issued, setting forth the immeasurable advantages of this particular incorporation over all other incorporations, and proudly referring to the report of its Committee and the social standing of its officers. The remainder of the stock is thrown into the market, enhanced, possibly, by a little judicious "cornering;" and while the excited "outsiders" are eagerly buying, A, B, and their stool-pigeons quietly dispose of what cost them nothing, and chuckle over the discomfiture of their victims, when, after falling gradually from dollars to cents, the stock finally ceases to be quoted at all.

Did our space permit we might elucidate other mysteries of stool-pigeonry. We might tell at length how great manufacturing firms have lent their influence to patentees of wondrous processes, and how, after thousands—ay, hundreds of thousands—had been obtained by false pretenses from other firms in the same business, these alchemic secrets failed to give any result. We might speak of grave geologists and chemists, bribed to append their signatures to fictitious reports and false analyses of mining ores. We might obscurely hint at monstrous frauds wherein complicity as stool-pigeons attached to some of either sex who still make vaunt of their "respectability;" but if we have said enough to put the gullible public upon its guard against "respectable" Stool-pigeonry our task is done.

THREE HUNDRED A YEAR.

I SUPPOSE that it is as proper to experiment with moral armor as with Palliser's projectiles; also, that much of the pith of experience is in that very homely old proverb, "The proof of the pudding is in eating;" also, that I may ask my readers to assist me with the experiments referred to—as in these days a writer no longer courteously shows his readers through his chapters, expatiating all the way in the spirit of "Thrice learned are ye now, and nine times learned shall ye be;" but, after rolling up the curtain, falls cozily to work with his audience to make his story or deduce his theory.

For reasons of my own I prefer also to reverse the usual order, and first state my case in point—at least one of my cases—and afterward the point itself, only premising that the portion of Miss Margrath's history with which I commence is strictly true.

For our purpose we need to know nothing of her before that time when, after twenty-nine years of suffering and dependence, she became an independent woman. That might mean, for some people, ten thousand a year; with her it was the salary and position of teacher in a public school. She held it just three months, and then there came to her a cry for help from a brother, a hopeless invalid. Those who should serve abused him. She resigned the situation—which had been procured for her with great difficulty, and was considered a perfect godsend—to the intense indignation of her friends, and went to her brother, in spite of their passionate remonstrance. But it was a weight about her neck.

The case itself, which she had now taken into her own hands, presented uncommon difficulties. A man's disease—when you talk of ordinary invalids—is in his lungs, his throat, his stomach, his liver. He is specifically treated, and is amenable to doctors and medicines. You make him comfortable, and he, in consideration of bodily debility and corresponding mental weakness, obeys you. But here was a man who fell ill, when a lad, of mismanagement; was kept ill by ignorance and quackery; and was now bedridden, and dying as fast as a powerful constitution and tenacious will would allow. His malady was exhibited neither in lungs nor liver, but through the nerves, which, some one says, are the tram-ways of intelligence and sensation. His nerves were tramways of pain; the ordinary sensations of seeing, hearing, and feeling were agonies. These agonies became at times extreme; in these extremes he was frantic. The sight of the dearest face was then a torture, and he writhed under sounds and jars as under hot coals.

Now if the sight of a face, the opening of a door, the sound of a voice, the whisk of a broom, the rustle of a dress send your patient into convulsions, unless at exceptional times, if you mean to see, feed, help, and make such a patient comfortable, you must resign yourself to be guided neither by rule nor convenience, but by the varying symptoms of a subtle and constantly changing malady; you must abnegate entirely yourself, your comfort, opinions, and customs. This is what Miss Margrath did. She became the intelligent, quick-witted, sweet-voiced pendant of the bell by which he called her to his bed when he was able to bear her presence, and only wished she could conquer the outside difficulties as easily.

She was living in an old frame building, in the poorer section of one of those country towns that get stranded among the hills in an evil hour, and have neither the energy to grow nor the self-respect to die. The street was a hill; the house was built against it. The plank-walk was not far below the level of her windows. All day men clattered over the walk and wagons rumbled down the hill. They tenanted only a flat. There were two tiers of families below them. Children squalled, dogs barked, people walked heavily about and transacted their existence with the usual everyday noises. The house was a wooden shell, echoing every noise faithfully at the sick man's pillow, while his bed jarred at every step beneath. Miss Margrath's first move was to suspend the frame of his bed from the ceiling by four cords, so that he swung clear of the floor, as in a hammock. But I could hardly tell you what care, what thought, what anxiety this device

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google cost her before perfecting. First, it was to be invented; and though such a device may be common, she had not seen it before, neither have I. She only knew that human ingenuity was nearly unlimited, and out of ingenuity a remedy must come. When she had found it, it was to be executed; and to save her little purse she tried it herself, hacking at the floor and beams with an old case-knife, and achieving holes that made the carpenter stare, though she could not save the little purse after all.

Next, there were the noises of living, already mentioned. Some were unavoidable; some—like cutting wood beneath his window—were not unavoidable; and against this Miss Margrath remonstrated. The people were sullen. They "had hired their place, and had a right to do what they liked for all the whims of any man." She coaxed and explained; they were dogged and persistent. She would have bribed, but, alas! she was too poor. She watched her opportunity, took the wood to the cellar, cut it herself, and offered to install herself as hewer of wood in future, so they would spare her brother. That struck shame into the hard hearts and thick skulls, and made an end of the wood-chopping. For the dogs and children, and the treaties and bargains made and attempted with the parents and owners, space would fail me if I should attempt the history. Whatever hurt him she fought. Noise—except in his states of reaction and torpor—was torture. In this world nothing is done without noise. Imagine his life and hers!

He was too weak to eat in the usual way. He took his food by spoonfuls and sips, with exhausted pauses of from half an hour to hours between. A breakfast was sometimes the business of a day. Whatever could be done for him must be done in similar installments—that is, as he was able to bear it. She swept his floor, for example, a foot at a time, and with a bundle of old cloths in place of a broom. She seldom stirred from the house lest he should ring his bell—no stranger could enter his apartment. She answered this bell perhaps forty times a day, and at night she lay down by his door. With winter came new trouble. Watching the first vacancy in the rooms below, she had applied for them herself, and taken the rent on her shoulders to keep them vacant. Already straitened, this reduced her to extremity. It was bitterly cold, and the wind searched the old house through and through; and as she could afford but one fire she was obliged to sit in the sick-room, where three-fourths of the time the patient could not see her face. As the outline of her head was visible from a low chair through the curtain across the foot of his bed, she sat on the floor. She could neither read nor write, because paper rustles; or sew, because working-materials can be dropped. When her posture grew unendurable she crawled like a snake out into the cold again. There was necessity for further retrenchment, and she retrenched again. She stopped the extravagance of three meals a day. According to the state of her finances, she ate once a day, or once in two days, till she went about, bowed from weakness, as we see men and women in extreme old age; till, finding that natural laws could not be braved in this way, she allowed herself Indian meal twice a day.

She had one pleasure only. The poor sufferer for whom she exhibited this devotion had his days of reaction and comparative freedom from instant pain. In these days he bitterly repented him of his frantic ravings—as if, poor soul! they were within his control. In these days he talked to her of his art—he had an art—and told her fondly how alone and exactly she comprehended his wishes and tastes. In these days also he delighted and astonished her with the fancies and reasonings of a brilliant and powerful mind. So you see she found honey even in the gall of bitterness, and that reward at the hands she loved best for which more true women than one would give a life. In this way she lived a year, and then he died.

Miss Margrath buried her dead, and four days after, through a series of uncommon events—or, as she called it, a Divine Providence—she stepped quietly back into the school that she had "thrown away," and that lost and much-lamented salary of three hundred a year.

I felt then that her troubles were ended; that she had stepped down from her distress into a comfortable and uninteresting position, and was preparing to sluice off my sympathy into other channels. She was equally penetrated with a deep sense of her affluent and prosperous condition, and confided to me what she should do with her surplus wealth. Heaven knows how many poor and embarrassed folk were to be made glad out of that three hundred a year!

This was before she went hunting for a room with board.

She commenced, as people generally do, with defined notions of what she wanted. On the second day she discovered that the point was, not what she wanted, but what the boarding-house keepers wanted. That was: first, a gentleman; if that was not to be achieved, then two ladies, in an apartment with a bed, chair, wash-stand, and standing room near the door. And by those of the milder sort, who might possibly wedge in a single woman somewhere, five dollars a week was the lowest sum mentioned—fuel and lights extra.

"Impossible!" declared Miss Margrath, firmly. "I receive only twenty-five dollars a month. If I pay five dollars a week I should have left only five dollars a month for coal, kerosene, shoes, clothes, paper, postage stamps, and so on.

On the third day she became deeply convinced of her own smallness and weakness in a crowded, bustling world, and prepared herself to be thankful for a shelter in any decent attic that she could occupy at four dollars a week. On the fourth day she was blank.

"Can't you write about it?" she asked me,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in a sort of helpless desperation. "How can I live on a salary that was fixed years ago, when the price of lodgings, coal, car-fare, books, York Mills, flannel, sewing cotton, shoes, stationery, every thing that can be bought, sold, eaten, drunk, used, consumed, has nearly doubled since? The boarding-house keepers are a unit on prices. But five dollars' spending money a month! Why, the maids of all work who have 'no extra fire and lights,' and none of the requirements of a lady, get six, eight, and ten dollars a month besides their board. What can I do? I am not an expert at the needle. This salary is entirely insufficient. Why is there not something else that women can do? Without this three hundred a year I should be entirely helpless."

"But the helplessness of women is their best armor," I broke in. "I have just read it, on the authority of a certain statesman, who is opposed to the feminine clamor for more chances of labor, and thus disposes of all the perplexities cognate to the vexed 'Woman Question;' and I know that a large number of respectable and intelligent people agree with him."

Miss Margrath looked obstinate. "A truth," she replied, "will work, my dear, whether it is in iron, and you call it a gun, or in words, and you call it a theory. If helplessness is the best armor for women, then it would be the best thing for me; and it is evident that if I were really helpless I should starve or go to the poor-house. I think if your statesman were in my place his first move would be to bring pressure somewhere to raise his salary. If he failed in that he would enter on some other business. If he knew no other he would learn one. Why then should he oppose himself to the female clamor for the same privilege in the same position? It is God who made me a lonely, struggling woman. I should prefer to be somebody's petted daughter or wife. But since I am not such a one, if I can not earn my salt by sewing, and can barely live by teaching, why should I not urge for better wages or a more lucrative employment? What is this panacea? It does not mean cessation from labor, for none of its advocates propose an asylum for maintaining the ideal helplessness of women. Has it any practical application? If so, why will it not apply in my case? If not, is it not a wickedness to make it a stumbling-block—I do not say in the way of such women as I, but of those who are forced to support families on half of my income? There are so many people having no personal interest in the matter who are satisfied with a phrase like that, when they might otherwise inquire into our case and help us."

Miss Margrath is a low-voiced, gentle, ladylike little woman, and I was surprised at her warmth. But I confess that I sympathized with it; and I have commenced with this bit of her history, hoping that you will sympathize with her also—I do not mean with her views; but the best way of understanding an evil is to experience it. The next best way is that it should be experienced by a person in whom you are interested. I thought that possibly, as she is an actual person and I have told you something about her fortitude and devotion, that you would experience a moderate interest in her and her perplexities. Some among you, no doubt, advocate the helpless theory, and in that event I wish that you would apply it to her case as she herself has stated it.

The point is, you know, not whether it is desirable for women to be self-dependent; but whether, when they are so by the providence of God, it is best that they should live in pinching poverty, often in extreme misery, or whether they should enjoy the same chances for a competence and ease as the male laborer? We ask this question, and are answered by such assertions as "Helplessness is woman's best armor;" "Men can not admire masculine women;" "Woman's sphere is the domestic hearth," etc. Have these answers any bearing on the question? How shall we apply them to Miss Margrath's case? If they will fit any woman's case surely they will fit hers. I long for some lucid exposition of what is actually meant by these phrases. Something besides the dust of formulas about meekness and submission that any agitation is sure to raise about our ears.

Meekness and submission are excellent things in women. I wish they could be all adorned with the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit. But what has this to do with bread and butter, fire, roof, and clothes? Or if they have some occult connection, where is it? and how are we to use it? Does it mean that we are to drift down stream, and trust to the gallantry of men to get us off when we run upon a rock or stick fast on a bar? The gallantry of men is an agreeable item in a woman's existence, but there are many lives like Miss Margrath's, in which there are no men to be gallant; no man who would have title or disposition to interfere or to help. What is to be done then? And there are many women who can hardly row the boat at all, because of the weight of some great hulking fellow who lies in the bottom of it. What is to be done then? I believe that the majority of men will work to the death for their own, and will readily and generously lend a helping hand to any friendless woman whose case comes under their observation. But an occasional kindness, or the gallantry shown on the street and on routes of travel, is not a way of earning honorably a comfortable subsistence, and that is what is needed.

What has the talk about modesty and the home virtues to do with it? Miss Margrath, our case in point, is a woman of exquisite gentleness and refinement. She is a home heroine. Besides that one year's sharp experience just narrated, she has spent the best of her life in the house of sorrow and by the bedside of the sick. She has no yearnings after trowsers or the outside rides on omnibuses so pathetically deplored. But despite this fact and all her admirable qualities—the very qualities so contin-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google ually insisted upon—she is none the less perplexed by her narrow salary; none the less eager for a better prospect.

I say over again, the question is not whether woman shall unsex herself and make herself a small-voiced, ridiculous little man; but whether, when she is obliged to depend on her own resources, she shall be so prepared by a wise education, and so fortified by public opinion, that she shall have any resources worthy of the name. It seems to me that I can hardly state our needs and wishes too often, for out of the many papers, speeches, and opinions of our unfriends on the subject I find none that answer to the point. They all laboriously dispose of other issues, and in the fog of words our case is lost. The question is tangled with an overgrowth of side issues, like the suit in Chancery that the lawyer left to his son as a valuable legacy, till many people have come to regard it very much as Dickens's alderman did the reform agitation. He was always sure to come out strong against feeding paupers and vagabonds on turtle-soup out of a gold spoon. So if women find that they are hampered by the want of a practical education, and that there are twenty women to every situation, and ask for help, they are at once supposed to be demanding the right of suffrage and a man's hat—perhaps I should say trowsers, as I believe we have the hat already. If we state plaintive facts, we are thought to be bitterly aiming a thrust at that good old Salic law which declared that a woman could not serve in battle because of the decorum of her sex, nor advise, because of her limited intellect, nor keep counsel, owing to the infirmity of her disposition. It seems to me that this turtle-soup and gold spoon sort of misapprehension does infinite mischief. There are people who sympathize heartily with distress but not with Bloomers; those who would readily be convinced that the laborer was worthy of her hire if they were sure that the argument meant justice, not "isms."

It is not out of cold and cruel indifference, but out of general fogginess, that we are so often answered by a contrast between a round, rosy, sparkling, loving, little woman, and a spare, spectacled, abstruse female, with her hair in a knob; or a dreadful woman who calls men by all the bad adjectives in the language. And once more, what have these portraits to do with our claims? There are spare females and viragos among the most conservative of womankind; there are smiling, sparkling little women who would have no dinner unless they earned it; and, for that matter, it is cold and hunger, every minute work, and all the year round anxiety, that makes the nose sharp and the skin gray, pinches the mouth, dulls the eyes, draws dark circles about them, and wastes the figure. It is comfort and hope that keep women fresh, plump, and well-natured; so that those gentlemen who are averse to gaunt, haggard, and sharp-tempered women, should work in behalf of the great army of working-women, if only in the interest of their eyes. But round or raw-boned, rosy or haggard, these qualities have nothing to do with the demand for more work or better wages.

If all working-women—I include in that term all teachers, governesses, artists, authors, etc.—if all these women were ugly, bad tempered, and professed objectionable "isms," have not disagreeable people the same right to fair wages and business chances as the interesting people? and is it not desirable, for the interest of society, that they should have this right? Is not a woman, solitary and penniless, a widow left penniless, and with or without children, a woman deserted by her husband and left with children or without, a girl grown to woman's estate, and the care of infirm parents or little brothers and sisters, are not all these women evidently obliged to labor? and are there not thousands of such women in every city? Is it any body's fault that these women are obliged to work? and is it right for them to work under such circumstances? If so, is helplessness their best armor? or can helplessness be considered as a weapon or working material? Also, if it is right to labor at all, and statistics prove that there are dozens of sewing women to every chance, of teachers to every situation, of boarding-house keepers to every prospect of profit, and hundreds of girls for whom there is no room behind counters, in mills, and in factories, is it a Christian duty to find work and fair wages for these women, or should we hand them over, in the name of all that is good, to starvation, temptation, and the devil? If the number of women who must support themselves increases, ought we to make provision for this fact or not? If so, ought we to accustom ourselves and our children to think that it is creditable for a woman to labor as it is for a man? and ought we to teach a girl, whose prospects are not assured, any thing that will be of practical use, or a little French, less music, and a smattering of arithmetic and grammar? Also, if it is right for a woman to work at all, ought she to receive the same money for the same labor as a man, or one-third as much, because she is a woman?

A large number of people will answer these questions affirmatively, and consider them as unnecessary, as an elaborate disquisition on "the sum of two-and-two make four." Will some one of that large number of other people, who vaguely consider the urging of such questions as upside-down-ism, tell us why these questions should not be answered in the affirmative? and if none of the things proposed should be done for these hosts of women, what shall be done? Something must be done. As Christians we have no right to pass suffering by on the other side.

It seems to me that these questions so disentangled contain their own answer, though perhaps that is because I am already convinced; and that our great difficulty is that of interesting people in ideas, needs, wishes, and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google beliefs, with which they have no flesh-and-blood connection. As said a friend to me:

"I used to label all proposed changes in the condition of women as strong-minded "isms," and put them aside with a smile. I was comfortable, and I thought that the position of our sex was admirable. It was not till I was myself pushed into the arena and set at work that I discovered the hitch in the system. I am a favored woman by comparison. I have congenial work and fair pay. I am not half-starved or half-frozen; but I have children, and since I have acted toward them a father's part I feel for them that anxiety that we call paternal: I desire for them the position and education that their father could have given them. I have as much industry, will, energy, and capability as many of the average men that I see about me. I could do more than just bar the wolf from the door, as I am doing now, and I have gone over and over the narrow ways left open for women, looking for a gate into a wider field—and there is none. Formerly I could not have been convinced that one was needed. Now that I sharply feel the want, it does not seem to me unfeminine to wish and work for some such opening. I am told that men will not help us in such attempts because they wish to find in us their opposite, not a pale copy. As there are no statistics I must answer from within the sphere of my own observation, but that has been an extended one. I think that the various grades of working-women can claim as large a share of feminine beauty, virtues, and excellences as their luckier sisters. I find that I myself am yet capable of the trimmest boots, the daintiest gloves, and the most heart-breaking hats, if I can get them; and that I do not yet disturb myself about the equality of the sexes, though I confess I side with the little girl, who, as her brother strutted pompously about, declaring—

'Shall I, a future barn-yard king,
Stay cooped up in a pen,
And hovered o'er as if I were
No better than a hen?'

exclaimed with much indignation: 'You ain't no better than a hen; you ain't no better than I be!'

"If, then, one does not lose feminine conditions and instincts by earning four hundred, seven hundred, or a thousand a year, I do not believe three thousand or five thousand a year would produce the deprecated change. For the disapprobation, in common with most women, I have a deep desire to be pleasing in the eyes of the opposite sex; but if I were offered the choice between this disapprobation on the grounds just mentioned and an opening in business that would insure the future of my children, I think I should accept the disapprobation and the business chance; though I should certainly be very sorry, and should not rest easy under it."

So far my friend.—Do you think she is very unreasonable?

OLD AUNT MATILDA.

IN TWO PARTS.-PART I.

IT is now a good many years since Matilda Hastings was a young girl spinning wool in her mother's garret of a summer afternoon. The sunshine streamed in at the curtainless southern window and made a golden path along the carpetless floor, up and down which she ran by the side of her big wheel, piecing "roll" upon "roll," and singing:

"We are marching forward to Quebec,
And the drums are loudly beating,
America has gain'd the day,
And the British are retreating.
America has gain'd the day,
And the British have departed,
So open the ring and choose another in
That you think will prove true-hearted."

Strange to say, only one word of her song had in her mind any meaning attached to it, and that word was the last, which dropped from her tongue again and again with a deliciously tender trill. As to that great day when the British came to the worse, and the United States held up their heads under flying colors, she thought nothing about it; she thought only of her sweetheart, Nathan Armstrong; who but he was the man for her? true-hearted and altogether lovely!

Ah, how poor and plain and worthless seemed all the young fellows of the neighborhood in comparison! No blue eyes but his had such tenderness in them, no tongue but his such truth upon it, no courage was so stout, and no morality quite so sincerely moral. She had a slender gold ring on her third finger that he had given her, and she had a good many dried roses in her bureau drawers that had one time after another been slipped out of his hand into hers.

They were not engaged—that is to say, not by any positive pledges given or taken—but Nathan had kissed her a good many times, and it was always understood that he should go with her to church of a Sunday evening, and to the quilting and the evening party, and once he had said to her, as at parting they lingered under the wide-spreading apple-tree by the door-yard gate, "Will the time ever come, Tilly, when we shall always be together?" and she had not said him nay.

He had not been long home from college at the time our story begins, and once or twice since his return matters had not gone quite so smooth as they used; still, there had been no quarrel. A little arrogance, or the like of it, on the part of Nathan, and a little smothered displeasure on the part of the girl—not quite resentment, but something that just for the moment hovered toward it. These trifles, however, did not affect the general stability of the relation between them.

He was made specially at home in the house of Widow Hastings upon that sort of understanding that somehow comes about without words, and came and went when he chose—breakfasting or supping if it chanced—quite as one of the family.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Mrs. Hastings was, in her motherly way, almost as fond of the boy as Matilda herself; for though he was a little wayward and impulsive, and given to carry things upon occasion with something too high a hand, he had many generous and noble qualities, was healthful in body and mind, young, ambitious, and more than commonly good-looking.

These were cause enough for liking him without our supposing that she superadded the fifty acres of land that had been set apart for him, or the thousand dollars that were invested for his benefit in his Uncle Tom's big commercial house in the neighboring city—Cincinnati. We may, and will, therefore, leave such a supposition quite out of the case, merely suggesting that there possibly are mothers in the world with whom these considerations might have weighed.

It was a pleasant thought to the poor widow, certainly, that her Tilly was going to do so well; and if she was a little proud of it withal, why she had right to be so; and as her girl spun in the chamber she spun below stairs, only her threads were drawn from a material more subtile. She had sometimes spun her threads so long that they easily entangled themselves among the horns of the elder Mrs. Armstrong's sheep and cattle, and drew them off as Natty's portion! An agreeable pastime, and harmless enough, as it turned out. She was a poor widow, as before said, renting her little plot of garden ground and the few acres she cultivated, and the desire of her life was to see Matilda better situated in the world than she had ever been. Not that they had not enough of common comforts; she was thrifty and managing, and her girl, as well as she, did her part cheerfully, and was content to wear a washed and ironed gingham to church, and to make the summer bonnet answer for the winter too.

Ah, they were happy days, the days when they dreamed dreams and saw visions, for they were more like sisters, these two women, than mother and daughter. Mrs. Hastings was young at forty, and Matilda was old at nineteen. Sometimes, as they sat in the glow of the fire-light of a winter evening, it would have been hard to tell which Nathan was courting as he tossed his gay trifles of talk from one to the other.

Strange to say the match was regarded favorably by the Armstrong side of the house—more especially by Mrs. Armstrong, who, in her provident zeal, had already put aside, under lock and key, much fine linen, both for bed and table, marked with the initials M. H. A. wrought cunningly by her own loving hand.

"Natty," she would say much oftener than was prudent, for there is nothing like a little offishness with regard to these affairs if one be desirous of helping them on—"Natty, when are you going to bring Tilly home?" And in one way and another she would make allusion to his private and personal feelings and expectations with a taking-for-granted manner that rasped upon him sometimes, and made him reticent to obstinacy. She was not wise in this, and it contributed its share toward costing her trouble in the end. The other mother plied him some too, though not so directly, and between them he had taken the bit in his mouth and was ambling a trifle, just for the pleasure of having his own head. Matilda was unconscious of all this as she spun in her chamber that day, though even then circumstances were combining to change the amble to a curvet.

She had a sweet seriousness in her heart and in her eyes, and something like a shadow flitted now and then across her thoughts. But Nathan was coming that evening to drink tea with them, and afterward to walk with her in the lane; and she made the wheel fly fast that she might finish the stint imposed upon herself and so gain time, after the early milking, for the dressing of her hair, and the careful arraying of herself in the dimity petticoat, clock stockings, and sky-blue lawn, all of which lay already so neatly folded upon the snow-white coverlet of her bed. Should she wear a rose in her heavy braids, or a knot of violets colored like her dress? This was the question that was uppermost in her thoughts as she reeled up the last skein preparatory to fetching home the cows.

The reel had snapped, and the thread was just being tied round the skein, when the mother's eager, girlish voice was heard calling from the foot of the stairs, "Tilly, Tilly! look out the north window and see what you will see!"

She ran fast enough, and coming back to the head of the stairs the next moment cries anxiously, "Oh, mother, what shall I do? The cows are not even fetched home, and then there is the milking, and then my hair is to do, and all my things to put on! What made him come so soon, I wonder?"

"A pretty wonder, to be sure! as if you didn't know well enough. Girls didn't make-believe so much when I was young!" And then she tells her that the cows came home of themselves, and are already milked, and that she has nothing to do but comb her hair and slip on her dimity petticoat and blue lawn.

Matilda had run back to the window again by this time, and was slyly peeping out. Nathan had never looked so smart. She hardly recognized him at first, indeed, in white trowsers, a rose in his button-hole, and such a shining new hat! He was come for a purpose this evening—that was plain. Her heart was all of a flutter, so that her long hair tumbled down over her pretty white shoulders as often as she wound it up, and she could not clasp her belt till she had tried over and over.

When all was completed she stood on tip-toe before the small looking-glass, not half satisfied—she was looking such a fright—her cheeks on fire, and the handkerchief across her bosom of a tremble. In vain she tried to hum, "We are marching forward to Quebec"—the tune ran into quavers and broke off in spite of herself; and as she set aside her wheel, hoping by a little busy delay to regain her self-possession, the "wheel-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google pin" came rattling to the floor, and the spindle turned itself about and punctured her arm till it bled smartly, and pained her not a little into the bargain.

At last she came down stammering and blushing. "We were not expecting you so soon, Nathan," she said, "and that accounts for my not being ready to see you."

"Oh, it makes no difference!" Nathan answered, playing with his watch-key; "I have been entertained by your mother all the same."

He did not smile, nor speak with that lightness that would have given the words another meaning than they of themselves expressed; and as the large eyes of Matilda rested upon him her hot cheek grew cold in an instant.

"I did not mean to say you had missed me, or any thing of the sort," she said, directly looking down and picking at the frill of her apron—"I only meant to excuse myself for what seemed bad behavior."

"Excuses don't amount to much that ever I found," says Nathan, still twirling his key, and tipping his chair with rude independence.

"Why, Natty, Natty, what has come over you?" says Mrs. Hastings, lifting her hand playfully; "I have a great mind to box your ears for speaking so to our Tilly—don't you see you almost made her cry."

"Made her cry! What for I should like to know? Here, Tilly, here's an orange to make up," and taking one from his pocket he tossed it into her lap.

She thanked him coldly, and laid the orange aside on the table as though it were a gift she did not much prize. He had called her Tilly before only when they were alone, and then with timidity and tenderness of meaning, not at all with the off-hand indifference with which he had spoken it now. It all comes of his going to college, she thought.

"Don't you like oranges?" he said, after a little. "I thought every body liked them that knew what was good."

"Maybe I don't know what is good," she answered; "any how, I don't care much for them."

"I do," says Mrs. Hastings, trying to make matters better. "Ain't this a beauty? Where did you get it?"

"Oh, Uncle Tom brought out a whole lot of 'em this afternoon."

"Indeed! your Uncle Thomas is at your house then? Any of the folks with him?"

"Yes, Aunt Mary, and one of the girls."

"Which one?" says Mrs. Hastings—"the youngest?"

Matilda, for some cause, she could not have told what herself, had fixed her eyes upon him when he said one of the girls, and was still looking at him. His eyelids lowered of themselves, and his smoothly-shaven cheek colored visibly as he replied that it was Lamsie who was come with her mother.

"Lamsie? I didn't know there was a Lamsie!" says Mrs. Hastings, as she straightened the table-cloth and adjusted the tea-things; "and I'm sure I thought I knowed all your Aunt Mary's girls. Which one of 'em is it?"

"The oldest, I believe," says Nathan; and then he says, including Matilda with his glance, "she is going to stay out a week, if she can put up with our country fare so long, and I hope you will have a chance to get acquainted."

"I hope so," says Mrs. Hastings; but Matilda felt as if the tone were patronizing, and said nothing.

"They was all purty little girls," says Mrs. Hastings, "the last time I seen 'em, but that's four or five years ago, when your Aunt Sarah was buried; and I reckon some of 'em are amost young women by this time?"

Nathan made no reply to this question, for it was meant for a question, and Mrs. Hastings went on directly: "I remember your Aunt Mary had bows of crape on her mourning bonnet that day, the first time I had ever seen crape made into bows, and it looked strange, very purty though. Your aunt is a gay woman for her years, isn't she?"

Nathan says he doesn't know so much about that; town folks always seem gay to country folks, he believes; but he does know that she is a good housekeeper.

"I dare say!" Mrs. Hastings replies with admiring emphasis; and then she asks if the girls take after her.

"Oh, you must see and decide for yourself, but I doubt if this one who is out now knows so much about house-work that she can't learn something of you and Tilly. By George, what delicious cake!"

He was standing up now, and had taken a slice of the pound-cake which Mrs. Hastings had just put on the table, and was eating it. Matilda remarked that in speaking of his cousin Nathan seemed less communicative than common—that he said he believed Lamsie was the oldest, as though he did not know; and again, that instead of calling her name he said this one who is out now, and somehow she did not like the sound of it.

"Why," says Mrs. Hastings, pleased to see him enjoying her cake, "I was just going to ask you and Tilly to take a turn round the garden while the biscuits were baking; but it seems you can't wait!" And then she says she is afraid he is a spoiled boy, and that she shall have to take him in hand one of these days, for she is sure no one else can ever manage him! Intending that he shall understand, doubtless, that she will take him in hand when he is married, and that Matilda will not be able to get along with him in her overmuch gentleness and sweetness.

But the girl had spirit enough in her own soft way, if she had known it, though it is not likely she was altogether ignorant of the fact. Be that as it may, she had no fears of the sort indicated. What she does fear is that matters are not going quite as she would have them—hence all the fond scolding and familiar gayety.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Nathan seemed to hesitate over the suggestion of a walk in the garden, took out his watch and looked at it as though he were not quite sure he had the time to spare, and, in the end, said in an indifferent sort of way: "What do you say, Miss Tilly; shall we go? or shall we not?"

"As you please, Mr. Nathan." She had not risen as she spoke, nor did she lift her eyes, and her manner of pronouncing Mr. Nathan was just the least bit sarcastic.

"Then Mr. Nathan pleases to go," he said; "shall I have the honor?" and he offered his arm with a sort of mock gallantry that was not just offensive, but, in the circumstances, certainly not altogether agreeable. She arose with more compliance than pleasure in her manner, and they went out together.

"Mind you don't forget yourselves and walk too far!" Mrs. Hastings calls after them.

"Trust me for that!" replied Nathan; and he laughed as though nothing were more unlikely.

Matilda was still further offended, and became severely grave. Nathan seemed not to observe the gravity, but chattered on about this and that, never once lowering his tone or touching even the tips of her fingers. Indeed he walked now before her and now behind her, taken up apparently as much with the sunflowers as with herself.

"Why don't you say something?" he inquired, after a while, standing suddenly before her.

"Because I have nothing special to say," she replied, endeavoring to pass along.

He spread wide his arms, and then she turned and walked the other way.

He came after her now, saying petulantly, "I didn't ask you to say any thing special," and then he pulled out his watch again. It was not the silver one his father had given him when he came of age, as Matilda observed, but a shining new one of gold, with a glittering chain attached that was almost as large as her little finger, and set off by seals and charms without number. She observed all this in silence: another time she would have taken it in her hand, and pleased herself as well as him by admiring and praising it. As matters stood she was not in the humor.

They walked down the path nearly the whole length of the garden without speaking, and at last Nathan made some forced remark about the flower-borders—they were blooming with unusual brightness—"What charm did Matilda exercise upon them?"

"Poor common culture—that was all—she had no charm!"

Then he said, as though he had not heard her self-depreciation: "It is no wonder they bloom, with such hands to tend them."

And then he did take her hand. She drew it away the next moment, for she felt as if she had in some sort solicited his tenderer notice, saying, she only wished every thing she had loved had repaid her as well as her flowers.

"Nonsense, Tilly! What puts such sentimental stuff in your head? Has some one of your admirers been reading Byron to you?"

And he put his arm around her waist and made a playful attempt to kiss her. It was not the deed but the manner of it that caused cheek and brow to flush with so sudden and reproachful a red, and her eyes to lower themselves so haughtily.

"Beg your pardon, Miss Hastings," says Nathan; "I will not offend in that way again." And he fell to cutting off the heads of the hollyhocks with his riding-whip.

If he had lingered beside her a single moment—if his apology had been less off-hand, and if he had not gone slashing at the hollyhocks as he did, she would doubtless have made some concession; but as it was, she could not get her own consent.

The hour was come she had watched and waited for so fondly—Nathan was beside her—they were in the twilight shadows of the garden, and, withal, the tears were gathering to her eyes in spite of all she could do. She turned away her face and busied herself with gathering a rose in order to get the better of her emotion.

"Is that the way you tend your flowers?" he said, coming back to her, for he had seen the tears. And then he said, "There are some days, Tilly, when every thing goes wrong, aren't there? Now every thing has gone wrong with me all day: mother has been teasing me. I told her as much as that I wished she would let me alone; and with that she got cross and fell scolding me, and now you must be cross with the rest."

"Oh, I am not cross, Nathan, I am only sad!" And she turned smiling to him as she tucked the rose in her braids.

Things were in a fair way of being smoothed between them now; but, as he had said, there are days when nothing will go right, and this was one of them.

"Oh, not that way, Tilly!" he cries, abruptly withdrawing the rose from the crown of braids in which she had set it—"that is too high!" and he replaced it so that it quite drooped against her neck.

"There, does that please you?" she asked, when it was done, smiling with as much brightness as she could—her rose had always pleased him till then, no matter how she wore it—a fact she could not but remember.

He made no immediate answer, but without ceremony pushed the hair away from her forehead; then, after observing her attentively, said: "Well, yes, better."

"Indeed!" she replied; and then, with that reproachful generosity women know so well how to use, she said: "However my hair is, yours is certainly arranged to perfection: I never saw it so very pretty and becoming."

"Is it though? I'm glad you think so; for

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I was particularly anxious to look well this evening, and not quite satisfied with my own judgment."

"You would have looked well enough in my eyes any way, you know," she answered, well pleased, and supposing the anxiety had reference only to herself.

"Oh, you're very good to say so, Tilly; allow me to make my profoundest bow," and, smiling gayly, he stooped and touched his lips to her hand. And then he said: "I forgot, really, that I was not to offend in that way any more!"

"You have not offended," Matilda answered, but in a tone and with a manner that told plainly he had offended in some way.

"Well, I am fated for to-day," says Nathan. "Suppose we go in."

She stood still in the path for one moment—her great, solemn eyes fixed on him as if they grew there. Was this, then, her Nathan?

A whole revelation is made to us sometimes by a single word or look, and this brief interview had made one to Matilda. She knew as well as she knew she was alive that Nathan Armstrong was not the great-hearted, true-hearted Nathan she had taken him for; but yet, with that blind perversity that inheres in the nature of woman, she tried with all her might to shut out the truth.

"Yes, let us go in," she said, in a low, strange voice, as she withdrew her eyes from that searching look into the soul of her lover.

He was startled by the something in the tone which the words did not themselves say, and drawing her arm through his, detained her by gentle force. "Not yet," he said, "it is so pleasant here;" and after a slight pause added, "and I am so happy."

Matilda could not help thinking he added the last words to satisfy her, and not to satisfy any necessity there was for saying them in himself. It was Nathan's voice, to be sure, but Nathan's heart was not in the voice.

There were some hives of bees on a rude bench beneath a peach-tree in one corner of the garden, and Nathan, catching at them as for dear life, asked Matilda a dozen questions about their habits and the best method of rearing them. She replied so briefly and concisely that the subject was soon exhausted, and he was obliged to cast about for something else. The currant bushes were discussed, but they were not a very prolific subject either, and then the raspberry vines had their turn, and after that the hops, and the turnips, and potatoes. And then the late rain and its damage to the crops; and this at last brought out a genuine utterance, and left the mechanical utterances to go for nothing—just what they were worth.

"I am sick of farming, and of the life of a farmer!" was the exclamation that had the ring of sincerity in it.

"Oh, Nathan, how can you say so, and with such a nice lot of land as you have?" And then Matilda dwelt on the beauty of the woods and the orchards and the springs of water, and the hills with their sheep and cattle. "All it needs to make it perfect," she said, "is a white cottage nestled under the maple-trees at the end of the lane.

"That's a pretty notion enough that of love in a cottage," said Nathan, chilling all her enthusiasm; "but be-hanged if I believe in it much, after all! Any how, I'm sick of farming; it's all hard and hateful, and I'm sick of it!"

"You don't believe in love in a cottage, after all! After all what?"

"Oh, I don't know—after all that's been said about it," Nathan answered with a slight tone of impatience.

"Well, I do believe in it, and I wouldn't believe in any thing else if I could!" And Matilda began to paint the picture with all the glowing colors that the loving heart reflects so well upon the outward world; but Nathan interrupted her by an ejaculation so completely out of sympathy with her that she could not go on, and both felt it a relief when Mrs. Hastings, from the open window of the kitchen, called out, "Come, children, supper is ready!"

What pains she had taken that Nathan might miss nothing to which he was used at home, and how delicious and plentifully hospitable it all was! The tea-pot was of tin, to be sure, but bright as silver, and the tray was covered with a napkin as fine as her cunning fingers could spin, and as white as the driven snow. The bread was scarcely less white, and the butter was golden and hard, and all printed over with field-lilies. Then there was the honey, and the gooseberries, and the cake, and the cream—but what need that we should name all the inviting delicacies there spread out?

"Come, Natty, you shall sit opposite Tilly," says Mrs. Hastings, herself sitting down; but Nathan blushed, and stammered an excuse—he was sorry, but he could not drink tea with them that night; he had promised to be at home.

"But we will not have you excused!" cries Mrs. Hastings, with good-natured defiance. "Your promise to us is the oldest, isn't it, Tilly? So sit down without more ado. A pretty story it is if I am to go to all this trouble for nothing!"

But still the young man positively declined. He must not, could not, dare not; he had come, indeed, only to make his apologies, and bring an invitation from his mother for Mrs. Hastings and Tilly to pass the evening with her. Would they come? With all his heart he hoped so. And he glanced at Matilda distrustfully. She saw his appeal, but did not answer it with look or smile; and then he said, approaching her and taking her hand: "Promise that you will come, won't you?"

"It shall be just as mother says," she answered, as though it were a matter of no interest to her, and she took her place at the table.

"Really, Nathan, I don't like it one bit!"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google says Mrs. Hastings, half in earnest. "Why don't you persuade him to stay, Tilly?"

"Because I see he prefers to go," she said; "and I am sure I would not stand in his way for the world!"

"Oh, Matilda, you are not angry with me, I hope!" Nathan said, stepping forward impulsively; "if you are going to be vexed about it I will stay at any rate."

She answered that she was not vexed—a little disappointed, that was all; and he, in his dull apprehension, did not feel that a little disappointment on her part was a matter for any serious consideration on his—a matter worth his while to consider at all, indeed. Nevertheless he felt, somehow, uncomfortable with himself as he took his leave.

His father's house was two miles distant from the small tenement in which Mrs. Hastings lived, and for the first half mile of the way he rode slowly, thinking over the constrained interview with Tilly, and of their parting, more like the parting of strangers than lovers. Then saying, "It will all be right when I see her again. I will make it right—I must!" he touched the flank of his gray young horse with the silver spur he wore and galloped home, believing that it was already the same as settled. Lamsie was at the gate waiting for him.

"You good-for-nothing scape-grace!" she said, pelting him with roses as he dismounted, "I have a great mind never to speak to you again as long as I live! Here have I been this long half hour watching and waiting and weeping for you. Just look at my eyes! aren't they all dim with tears?" And she bent her round, rosy face coquettishly near.

Nathan caught her round the waist and kissed her, as she perhaps designed that he should; when, breaking from his arms, she ran down the walk before him, crying, with mock displeasure, that she would go straight and tell her mother.

Lamsie was older than Matilda by three years, but she was only a big spoiled child; and what was more, she was incapable of ever being any thing else. She was one of those soft, pulpy, rosy creatures that decay without ever having ripened into womanhood. She was pretty to look upon, as a doll is pretty, but she lacked soul and lacked heart, if the truth must be told. She had some sentiment, of that shallow character that is exhausted by a year of marriage, and she had really fine hair and teeth, and a great many fine dresses, rings, ribbons, and furbelows. And many a man wiser than Nathan has thought before now that fine feathers make a fine bird.

The sprightly ease and freedom of her manners contrasted, to his thinking, charmingly with the shy ways and bashful sincerity of the country-bred girls with whom he was acquainted. Then every man has his weak hour, not to say weak side; and, besides, there are things happening about us all the time that we do not pretend to account for—as, for instance, how the snake charms the bird; but that it is done we all know, though doubtless the bird, once out of the awful jaws, would be able to give us very little light upon its case.

"And where is Mrs. Hastings and Matilda?" inquires the mother of Nathan as he goes into the tea-room. Then it came out that he had not asked them to come home with him to tea, but only for the evening. "Well," says Mrs. Armstrong, in great displeasure, "it is no wonder they didn't come. I would not have accepted such a poor invitation neither!"

Nathan was perhaps a little humiliated that his mother should be cross with him, and perhaps too anxious to appear independent before his cousin Lamsie, and made haste to say that for his part he was quite willing that both Mrs. Hastings and her daughter should do as they chose; he certainly had not urged them.

"Suppose we run over after tea," says Lamsie, smiling her sweetest, "and fetch them home with us?"

It was not that she cared so much for the disappointment of Nathan's mother, but rather that she liked the prospect of a long walk with Nathan; and besides, she was one of those restless creatures that are never satisfied more than five minutes any where.

"That would be fetching them a day after the fair," says Mrs. Armstrong, who did not like the prospect of the long moonlight walk for her son with the like of Lamsie.

But Nathan said, quickly, "We will go and pass the evening with them, then; we are not obliged to fetch them the day after the fair."

"That will do better," Mrs. Armstrong says, seeing that she could not prevent the moonlight ramble; and then she says she will go along and "make her apology at any rate, since Nathan is no more to be trusted."

"I'm sorry I didn't know your mind, mother," says Nathan.

"I'm sorry you don't know your own," she answers, sharply; and then there was silence till Lamsie broke in with—

"Come now, good, sweet Aunt Armstrong, don't be cross with poor Nat. This Tilly has shown him the cold shoulder, that's evident, and no wonder it put things out of his head. Own the truth now, Nat, isn't it so?"

And then she clapped her hands and laughed, asking him if he didn't feel a little bit better as time went on. Then she ran round to him at the table where he sat, and put a great lump of sugar in his tea, to make up, she said, for deficiency of accustomed sweetness. Then she teased him about his hair, and told him she knew he had been trying to make himself irresistible, and that she had never in all her life seen him look so awfully ugly! "Just see for yourself!" she cried, holding him round the neck, and forcing him to see himself in the polished bowl of his tea-spoon.

"It was too bad of you, Lamsie," whispered Nathan, as his mother was putting away the tea-things.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

To which the girl replied that she was only just in fun, and she was so sorry, and would he forgive her if she'd kiss him, and promise never to do so any more?

Yes, he would forgive her on those terms.

And so she kissed him, and then she said it was all true she had been saying, and she would say it again, and then she ran laughing away.

"Well, Tilly, shall we go and see this charming Miss Lamsie, or whatever her beautiful name may be?" Mrs. Hastings had said when the evening work was done.

Matilda had burst into tears at that, and there was an end of it; for the effect of tears, let poets say what they will, is neither advantageous to the spirits nor the face. In vain Mrs. Hastings had said, "Don't mind, child—the course of true love never did run smooth—it will all be right next time." The more she had tried to comfort the poor girl the less she had been comforted; and so they sat in gloomy silence when the gay voices of the approaching visitors arrested their attention.

The rose was gone from Matilda's hair, and the brightness from her eyes and cheek, and she made no effort to appear more light-hearted than she was; she was young and simple-minded, and knew nothing of the requisitions of society. Besides, she could not readily come into sympathy with the fine young lady from town. If the truth must be told, she contrasted unfavorably that night with her shallow visitor, who had all she knew at her finger-ends, and was not disconcerted by any thing.

Seeing that Matilda failed to entertain her she entertained Matilda, running on from one gay trifle to another as lightly and as thoughtlessly almost as the bird sings. What did she do with all the long days? And wasn't she lonesome, and didn't she get tired of seeing the same old moon and stars every night? Why, she should be moped to death, and run away with the very first fellow that would have her! And she turned smilingly upon Nathan, as though she should be only too glad to run away with the like of him.

Then she found her own way into the garden, and came back with her arms full of roses, which she tossed about with playful profusion—over the heads and shoulders of the two elderly ladies, over Nathan, over the sleepy watch-dog, and all about the neatly-scoured floor. Her fair face was lighted up with smiles and good-nature, her white dress floated about her like a cloud of mist, and the airy nothings of her conversation were pleasing, because they were perfectly spontaneous and free from that tinge of melancholy which is apt to accompany deeper thoughtfulness.

"She is a silly chatter-box, and vain and selfish withal," mused Matilda, as she looked upon her from the dim corner of the room in which she kept herself withdrawn, "but she is certainly pretty." And this last she admitted with a little shiver of her whole body, as if something cold and disagreeable had touched her.

She had done no injustice to the young lady as to her selfishness and vanity; but they were qualities rather intuitively felt than seen as yet, being well hidden by her affluence of spirits and gay good-humor, but sure to come to the surface with the inevitable pressure of time, or under the weight of any sudden trial or misfortune perhaps. A butterfly of the summer, she, that required a garden of roses, and all sunshiny and beautiful things for its pleasure—nay, more, for its very existence.

Matilda must show her the big spinning-wheel, and then she must herself spin a thread or two, and Nathan must come and turn the wheel—the wool was as much as she could manage—and as often as she broke her thread she made him responsible, and gave him a pretty scolding for it; and when she succeeded in winding a perfect thread on the spindle, she clapped her little white hands and screamed with delight.

She wore a green spray and a little bunch of dark-blue violets in her golden hair, and Matilda noticed with a jealous pang that they drooped low against her neck. As she shook back her tresses in her glee the flowers came to the ground, and then Nathan must adjust them; and when in his bashfulness he said he could not reach so high, she answered with coaxing playfulness, "Do now, dear Natty!" And when he still made excuses she dropped on her knees before him and bent her bright head low, so forcing him against his will to replace the flowers.

Her arms were bare and the neck of her dress so low as to scandalize the prim little country maiden, and she offered her a shawl, expressing the fear that she might take cold in the unaccustomed air.

"Oh, how good you are!" cries Lamsie, seizing and kissing the hand that offered the shawl, and then she says she will come and spin for her every day, and help her with the milking, and that in the evenings Nat shall let them ride the horses, and they will have such fun!

She tossed the shawl about her shoulders with an airy grace that Matilda could never have counterfeited, and then she put it over her head and made it into a hood, and crossing her hands demurely called herself a nun, stringing her roses into a rosary the while. Matilda could not relax much, however—she could not, I say; she saw that Nathan was charmed, and she found it difficult to accord the charmer simple justice.

There was another who found it difficult too, and that was Nathan's mother. She had already accepted Matilda as a daughter-in-law, and she was determined to accept no other. "The foolish boy!" she said to Mrs. Hastings, as they talked apart, "I feel like boxing his ears and shutting him up in the closet! A pretty wife that chit would make him, to be sure!"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

And then she told Mrs. Hastings confidentially that her brother Tom was trying to coax Nathan off to town; that he had offered him a fine salary, and an easy situation in his establishment; and that she was very much afraid the boy would take up with it. Adding: "And if he does, who knows what will come of it?" And by this Mrs. Hastings understood that she feared he would marry Lamsie. And she hinted as much.

"Ah, that is just it!" says Mrs. Armstrong; "the boy doesn't know his own heart, nor his own head, as it seems; and what will be the worst of it, he will find them out when it is too late—mark my words!" And then she says, spitefully, that the girl's name is not Lamsie at all, but Eunice instead. "That is what she was named any how," she goes on, "and what they always called her while they lived over the store on Fifth Street; but since Tom has made money, and they have gone down onto Fourth Street, and got a stone front, plain Eunice has got converted into Lamsie somehow!" She didn't see, for her part, what pretense they had for it; she was sure the names were not much alike. And then she said she would give Nat a talking to, and see if that would bring him to his senses; and directly after they all went away, Lamsie looking back and laughing and kissing her hand to Matilda again and again. And with her hanging on his arm, Matilda watched Nathan pass out of sight. Only once during the evening had he spoken apart with her, and then he had said with offensive anxiety of tone, "How do you like her, Til?"

"She's a pleasant little thing enough," says Mrs. Hastings, as she locked the door, "but she never did a day's work in her life, I reckon, and Nathan has got too much sense to be carried away with the like of her!"

There was no flutter in Matilda's heart when she slipped the blue lawn from her shoulders, as there had been when she put it on; all there was heaviness, and, to say the best of it, suspense. And this, then, had been the evening to which she had looked forward with such eager delightfulness of anticipation!

She did not sing at her spinning the next day, nor the next; and all the week went by, and still she had not repeated the song that she had joined in her thoughts to Nathan. Lamsie had been to call upon her two or three times, but she had not returned the calls. She had not time, she said; and she feared, no doubt, that Nathan would think she was seeking to see him, and this she would not do, however much she desired it. Matilda knew by this time that Nathan had a chance of going to town, and she almost knew that he would go; still, she thought he would come and talk with her about it before he quite decided.

From the window of the chamber where she spun she could see him at work in the hay-fields that adjoined her mother's grounds every day; and often the wheel stopped, and she stood with the wool in her hand quite still, as she saw Lamsie come into the field with a pitcher of water in her hand, or with a rake across her shoulder. Sometimes, when Nathan stopped to drink, they would remain apparently chatting together a good while; and sometimes they would sit down in the shade, nearer each other than she liked to see them sit.

She could fancy the girl's ringing laugh as she tossed the hay over Nathan while he stooped before her swinging the scythe; and once she saw him chase and catch her, and put his face very close—close enough to have kissed her. All this made her very uneasy, and was enough to keep her from singing, as it did.

"What is the matter, my child? Do cheer up!" Mrs. Hastings said, time after time. But she knew well enough what was the matter, only she had not the heart to acknowledge it openly, and almost thought by ignoring it she could make it as though it were not. Perhaps we have all of us done something of the sort at some time.

Matters, meantime, were going from bad to worse, if the truth had been known. When Lamsie raked the hay for Nathan, and picked out the flowers and tossed them in his bosom, she tempted him to retaliate in the like playful fashion; and so it often happened that their hands met, and sometimes it happened that the playful quarrel ran almost into earnest, and then it was to be made up, and we all know what comes of such things. What came of it with them was, in the first place, that the work was neglected; and, in the next place, that the lost time must be made up, and so Lamsie would stay, hindering and helping, till long after dark, as it fell out once or twice; and upon these occasions, as they walked home through the shadows, it happened that Nathan's arm was around her waist.

Two or three times, at the beginning of her visit, Lamsie had "run in," as she called it, to see Matilda, but the visits grew shorter with each repetition. She had always promised "Nat" that she would assist him in the garden or the hay-field, or at whatever he chanced to be about, and Matilda never insisted that she should break her promise. So the end of the week came, and for several days Lamsie had not "run in" at all.

And now it was known to Matilda, through general rumor, that Nathan Armstrong was going to leave the farm for good and all—going to town to live with his uncle Tom and become a fine gentleman, and forget his country friends and neighbors, so people said. Every word of this sort, and many such were spoken, went like a knife through the heart of Matilda; but she pondered in silence, and breathed never a word of reproach or of complaint. Nathan was blinded, bewildered, for a time, but he was still true-hearted; she never dreamed that he could really prefer another to her, because she knew she could not prefer another to him; and then, had he not told her in a thousand ways that he loved her? She blamed

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google herself more, in reality, for harboring a doubt than she blamed him for giving her cause. She was unreasonable; she hoped and exacted too much. But under all and over all there was a boding of ill, that kept her from smiling and from singing as she used.

Mrs. Armstrong was out of all patience, as she said to her neighbor Mrs. Hastings, to think that Nat was come of age now, and had his fifty acres, and his own team, and his choice of the cows, and his father to assist him in the building of a house, and just as nice a little sweet-heart as ever was, into the bargain, and he must go and throw it all away! And for what? He would see for what before he was many years older; but young heads couldn't be put on to old shoulders, she supposed, and Nat would have to burn his fingers before he could be made to know that fire was hot! She had a dozen coverlets and sheets, and table-linen, and all things to match, laid away in the press, that had been called Tilly's things for a year past, and now to think! Well, they might lie there seven years and rot before Tom's Eunice, the lazy, good-for-nothing thing, should have them! She had talked and talked to Nat, but what good came of it?—the more she said against Eunice, why the more he was for her; and he was not a child any more so that she could shut him up in the closet; she only wished he was, and she'd keep him there for one while she guessed.

In this way the disappointed mother got some bitter comfort; but not much, for there is never much comfort to be got out of being wroth with one we love.

Natty was Natty, and her own boy after all; and she could not bear that he should burn his fingers and learn for himself that fire was hot. Perhaps, if he had his own head for a while, he would see the folly of his ways, and be glad enough to come back and settle on the fifty acres. This was the last consolation she could get for herself when she was driven to the wall, and forced, for the time being, to give up her cherished plan. So with one gleam of sunshine among her shadows, she washed, and bleached, and pressed, and knitted, and darned, and mended, and got all Nat's wardrobe in the best condition possible against his going. And the old trunk that had been his father's was packed, and the last day, and the evening of the last day of the home-staying, was come.

"You are going to see Matilda?" says she, when the latest "chores" were done.

"Of course we are," answers Nathan. "Come, Lamsie, get your shawl and hat."

"Is that Matilda's shawl, Eunice, and torn in that way?" says Mrs. Armstrong, taking hold of the shawl, a part of which the careless girl had left among the briers in the hay-field.

"Yes, aunty, but I'll get her another; this was an old thing any how!"

"See that you do," says Mrs. Armstrong, to the manifest annoyance of her son; and then she says, "if you were my girl I would give you a downright scolding!"

"Ah, but you mustn't scold now, dear aunty, because if you do I shall cry; and I am so sorry about the shawl, indeed I am, and I'll give her one of mine, so do pray forgive me!"

She had fallen on the neck of her aunt and was kissing her, and the kind-hearted woman was in some sort pacified, and dismissed her with a little box of the ear that was half in earnest and half in play.

The evening was beautiful, and it was the last walk they would have together through the green lane, so they made it leisurely, and Mrs. Hastings and Matilda were just lighting their candle to go to bed when the click of the gate-latch detained them.

"I was sure he would come, mother! I was sure of it! That is his step!" and putting down the candle Matilda ran and opened the door. It was Nathan sure enough; but not as she expected to see him, not alone.

"I knew you would never forgive me if I came without Lamsie," he said; "and so I have fetched her along. Besides, she needed the exercise, for she does nothing from morning till night; she is a very lazy creature. I wish she was a little more like you, Matilda!"

And with that they came laughing into the house, and Lamsie kissed Matilda on the cheek, saying: "I am sure I second your wish, Nat, with all my heart!" And then she told Matilda that her cousin was a great big story-teller, so he was, and that he made her out as bad as she could be, and that she meant to be avenged on him when she got him away from his friends.

"And so it is really true that you're going to leave your friends, is it, Nathan?" says Mrs. Hastings, turning very serious eyes upon him.

"For a short time," he answers; "that is, I am going to town, but I shall be home every week, you know."

"And you had like to have gone without so much as mentioning it. Really, Natty, I don't think it was kind of you!"

And then he laughs gayly, and says such a trifling matter was hardly worth mention, and that he has been so busy, and that he has intended to come night after night, but has been somehow prevented; and he appeals to Lamsie to say if all is not just as he has stated it to be.

"Oh! we have no fault to find, of course," says Mrs. Hastings, "only we should have been glad to see him." And not another word was said about his going away first or last.

Lamsie asked Matilda about her spinning, and said she was so sorry not to have learned more, and that next time she came to the country she was going to be a better girl; that really her cousin Nat had made her help him all the time; her poor hands were blistered with raking, and she showed the palms to Matilda, asking her to have pity upon a poor, helpless girl that was the victim of such a tyrant! But there was constraint upon all parties; and after a little commonplace talk the visit came to an end, Nathan saying that he had no doubt

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google but that he should see them oftener than ever when he came to be further removed.

"You will be more likely to forget us altogether," says Matilda, repressing her tears.

"Forget you!" says Nathan; "not till my right hand forgets its cunning!" But he said it with a lightness and gayety that made the words almost a mockery; and the next minute he was chatting and laughing with his cousin far up the lane.

And this, then, was the parting to which the true and tender-hearted young girl had looked forward with such hope and confidence. For a little while all courage misgave her; her hands and her feet refused to obey her will, and the wheel stood idle against the wall; but she was young, and gradually hope resumed sway; but confidence lingered, for, when once lost, that is not got back so easily. We need not paint nor try to paint the flutterings and sinkings of the heart with the coming and going of the tide; the blushes and the pallor that succeeded one another as news that was agreeable or the contrary came from time to time. Weeks went by, and hope faded into fear, and fear brightened into hope again and again; and at last the fears vanished and hope was predominant—Nathan was come once more.

And they walked in the garden and sat on the thyme bank by the bee-hives in the soft moonlight, and the young man told the girl all about his new life, and all about the high ambition he was beginning to nurse. He meant to be a rich man yet; he had been a baby to think of marrying with only his hands and fifty acres of land! He must wait. He did not say we must wait, but Matilda did not notice that; and perhaps, after all, there was as much happiness in the anticipation as the reality. This was a new tone for Nathan, to be sure—but were they not alone together on the thyme bank, and was not her hand in his, and how should the simple and single-hearted child be distrustful or afraid? Nathan was come back, and every thing must needs be right!

He spoke not one word of Lamsie, and Matilda had not the heart to name her. He called Matilda his good angel, and said how much he had needed her help and guidance amidst the temptations that were constantly being thrown in his way. She would never forsake him, he hoped; never cease to be to him a steadfast star, let come what would. She was very dear to him—dearer than he could say; and he almost wished it were possible to die for her then and there; to have the bees humming about him and the long grass blowing over his face were an end to be coveted indeed! And then he sighed and hung his head, and they remained a long time silent, Matilda pitying him from the bottom of her innocent heart, and wondering why so strange and sad a mood had come over him.

If she had been older or wiser in the world's wisdom she would have seen that all was not right. Perhaps it was as well that she did not see; it put the evil day afar off.

She did not remember till after he was gone how little he had said that was not shadowy and vague; as she looked back and tried to catch it, it escaped her like the mist or the moonlight, and she could not but wonder what it was out of which she had gotten so much happiness at the time.

When her mother asked her at what time Nathan was coming again, she was vexed with her mother. He had said nothing about coming again, and when pressed and forced to admit it, she was more vexed than ever, but not with him. Oh no! He had not thought of it perhaps, and perhaps, in the multiplicity of his cares and the embarrassments of an occupation new to him, he did not himself know when he should come; but it would be as soon as possible, she was sure of that.

Had he not called her his "angel," and said he was "ready to die for her?" This was not saying he was ready to live for her, if she had chanced to think of it, but she did not chance. She saw through the medium of her own affections, and she saw in some sort, as we all do, what she wished to see. And there was besides, even yet, underlying all her fears, an almost unshaken belief in his moral integrity. Almost unshaken, I say, for it had been, as the reader knows, jarred if not moved. She loved him all the same, and she could not bear a hint of his falsity, but somehow she found no rest in her love.

One day, when a month was gone by since his last visit, there came a letter from Nathan. Matilda dare not break the seal, she feared so much, and by this time had reason to fear so much. She hid it in her bosom, and there it fluttered over her heart the long summer afternoon; and not till the evening work was done, and the door of her chamber locked, did she venture to draw it forth. A stifling sensation oppressed her at the first words. "My life-long friend, my good little angel," it began. And then he went on as though no other relation than one of friendship and neighborly regard had ever existed between them. He had fallen in love, he said, but he distrusted his judgment without her sanction, as he always did, and if she did not send him her approval he should certainly be very miserable. The lady was not so young nor so beautiful as herself, and to be frank, he feared, nay, he knew she had not her excellent qualities; in truth he wished she were more like his own good little Tilly! But the meshes of fate were about him, and he was committed irretrievably. He could say to her, his angel, that he hardly knew whether to be glad or sorry. He hoped, however, in case that the worst came to the worst (this was underscored and pointed with an exclamation), she and his Lamsie would always be the dearest of sisters, the truest of friends. This was the hope that gave him the sweetest happiness he knew. He thought daily, nightly,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google almost hourly of the delightful hours they had spent together, when it had sometimes seemed to their foolish imaginations that such hours were never to end—ay, he thought of them, and thought of them regretfully. Did Matilda remember them? And would she consent to renew those happy hours with another, more closely joined, but scarce dearer than she! He hoped and believed she would say yes, for there was nothing too much to expect of her generous nature; though, if the cases were reversed, and he should venture to propose such a thing to his wayward Lamsie, she would tear his eyes out! Ah, my angel, my lost angel, I would she were more like you!

Then he said the wedding-day was not even spoken of as yet; indeed it could hardly be called a real engagement, though it seemed to be regarded as such, insomuch that he felt himself tied to an apron-string! And then he said, "Do pity me, my darling! I am sometimes almost miserable!" No, the wedding-day had not been spoken of, but if ever there were a wedding—he hated weddings, and wished the whole affair were over—and if there were bridemaids, and of course Lamsie must have her way about that, would she, his dearest, best, sweetest friend, honor them and make them happy by being one? He would send her a dress—he supposed some flimsy affair would be required—he would send it, that she might have no trouble about it. "And now my dear Lamsie"—Lamsie was carefully erased, and Matilda inserted—"I want you to write me a long, kind, loving letter, such as no other woman would or could write, but just what your generous nature will of itself prompt. Write me, darling, from your very heart, and if you do not approve of the step I am committed to, your better judgment shall be my 'thus far.' This I promise you sacredly, and that means a promise to be kept come what will." If, however, he had her sanction he hoped she would make haste to follow in his footsteps, and that her mate would be more perfect than he had found. And with this hope he was "always and always her affectionate friend and devoted admirer."

Was ever kindness crueler than this?

Matilda read this letter calmly from first to last, and then she read it again word for word, and then she folded it, and went with it straight to her mother, and when she had put it in her hand she laid her head on her bosom, and said: "Read it, dear mother, but let us say no word about it; and for the time to come I will try to be a better child to you than I have ever been—try to be worthier of the love that I know is true."

"As if you had not always been worthy—as if you had not always been too good!" cried the mother, bursting into a flood of angry tears; and then she said, "God will never let him rest, and I hope—"

"Oh, mother, mother!" interposed Matilda, placing one hand over the mouth that was uttering the revengeful hope, and then she took the letter and laid it in the fire, and not another word was said about Nathan between them, or then, or ever.

A long time after the gray ashes were blown to the winds they sat together in silence, the cheek of the mother resting on the daughter's head, and many and many a night thereafter they sat the same way, each understanding the other's thoughts, but speaking no word that represented the thoughts.

And the heart of the girl did not break—hearts do not break so easily as they are said to do in stories—it suffered and ached and throbbed for many a weary day and month, and then it settled into a dreamless and hopeless quiet, and the face wore its old smile—a little sadder, but not less sweet—and she took up the cares and duties of life with a more steadfast and energetic will.

Matilda did not sing the old song at her spinning, but she sung hymns instead; went much to church, and mused upon the green fields beyond the swelling flood, and tried to lay up her treasures there, not altogether without success, though not in perfect tranquillity.

But though they were so silent in the household of Mrs. Hastings the neighborhood was not silent, and, strange to say, there was little sympathy expressed for Matilda.

"She was in love with Nathan Armstrong," the gossips said, "and he has gone off and married his rich cousin, and left her to dance in the pig trough!" and they laughed as they said it, even as though a good thing had befallen themselves. Then they wondered if she would not be ashamed to show her head abroad, and a few, from sheer curiosity, made excuses to call at her mother's house, simply to see for themselves how she bore herself in her desertion. She was calm, to all seeming, and kindly, and quiet as ever, and they one and all went vexed away that they could not get something of a startling sort to tell about the town.

But to go back a little. The letter was never answered, and one day when the rumor was flying every where that a beautiful daughter-in-law was shortly to be brought home to Mrs. Armstrong, Nathan suddenly presented himself at the door of his forsaken little sweet-heart. He looked unhappy, restless, flushed with excitement, as if he were neither master of himself nor of any thing.

Would Matilda grant him one more last walk in the garden? That was what he was come to ask. He had no right, he made no pretense of right, but would she grant him, of her sweet generosity, thus much? He was going away—going out of the country, and might never have another favor to ask. He whispered this as she bent over her sewing work—a wedding-cap for his mother—beneath the west window through which the sunset lights were shining darkly red, for it was autumn and the close of the day.

She turned the cap of fine yellow lace on her hand for a moment, and then put it down and went with him to the garden. He put one arm

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google about her when they turned down the narrow path, but she said, "No, Nathan!" without smiling or blushing, and softly pushed the arm away. Then he asked her why she had not written to him—perhaps that he did not know what else to say.

"Because, Nathan, I had nothing to say to you, nor have I now," she added, quietly, and without anger.

"Oh, Matilda, that is cruel, very cruel—if you only knew—"

"I do know," she answered; "you were good enough to tell me, you remember?"

"But you don't know, you don't begin to know how much I suffer!"

"I am sure I am very sorry."

"Oh, Matilda, don't kill me with such coldness—I had hoped you would help me—it was madness I know, but I hoped."

"You yourself made it impossible for me to help you; and besides, what help can you need? You have money, beauty, every thing you desire?"

"I haven't what I desire—it is yourself I desire! to hold and to keep, from this day forward till death do us part!"

And all against her will he put his arm about her and drew her to the thyme bank by the beehives, and so held her as he poured out his heart, stirred now to the very bottom. He told her how his mother had vexed him with her constant importunities, and how she herself had been cold to him and held herself apart, just when he required her tenderness the most; how ambition had blinded, and at last beauty and artfulness bewildered him; and how, by one means and another, he had been pushed and goaded to the very edge of the precipice; but the last fatal step was not yet taken; would Matilda, his own little sweet-heart, all the true sweet-heart he had ever had, or ever could have, help him to recede?

No, she would not help him; he was not the man she had taken him for.

"No, Matilda, nor am I the man I took myself for; help me to be what I once thought myself, and what you once believed me!"

Then he took all the blame upon himself, and abased himself to the very ground, confessing his utmost weakness and wickedness.

But she only said, "How can you begin to be true to me upon a lie to another? No, Nathan, you have shaped your own destiny; I must accept mine."

There was much more between them, but we need not repeat it; it ended where it began. At last Nathan said, picking a faint little flower that was yet struggling for life in the grass at their feet: "Forgive me, at least, and take this in token of your forgiveness."

But she refused the flower. "I can not forgive you," she said, "to-day, nor to-morrow, nor for twenty years."

Then he offered it again, saying her acceptance of his poor gift would add something to his happiness.

"I have nothing to do with your happiness or misery," she said. "They are of your own making; go and keep the faith you have plighted!"

"Is not a bad promise—one that was wrung from me, too—better broken than kept?"

"You might come to think another bad to-morrow. And if you did not, why you are not the man I took you for, that is all."

It was quite dark now, and the wind blowing chill. "Where is your shawl?" asked Nathan, endeavoring to shield her.

"With your Lamsie," she answered, "but let us go in; the last time we walked here I waited till you, in your weariness, proposed it, and I have no desire to repeat that experience."

"Nor any other you have had with me?"

"No, nor any other."

"God help me, then!" cried Nathan, and hid his eyes in his arm that his tears might at least be unseen. And as he sat thus she arose and walked away from him.

A month after this there came a little package to Matilda, sent her from Lamsie on her wedding-day; the package contained a rich and beautiful shawl, and to save the offense, a reminder of the pretty one she had so negligently carried off, and which, if her dear friend would allow her, she begged leave to keep.

Matilda returned the fine shawl with the simple statement that she preferred her own; and this was all the intercourse there ever was between the two women.

MEDICAL DELUSIONS OF THE OLDEN TIME.

THE possession of medical knowledge was considered by the ancients to be an inspiration from Heaven, and so Ashmole declares physic to be "a divine science, even God's theologie; for the Almighty wrote his Scripture in that language before he made Adam to reade it. The ten fathers before the flood, and those that followed, together with Moses and Solomon, were the great physitians in former ages, who bequeathed their heavenly knowledges of naturall helpes to those they judged as well worthy, in honesty and industry, as capable thereof: and from their piercing beames all nations enlightened their tapers. Abraham brought it out of Chaldea and bestowed much thereof upon Egypt, and thence a refulgent beame glanced into Greece."

Judicial Astrology, Alchemy, and Natural Magic were the progenitors of chemistry and modern medicine: thus, imposture begat science; at any rate it was the forerunner. Nevertheless, it is not to be presumed that the ancients regarded these in any other light than as sciences; in fact, they were the sciences of ignorance. They were the best and most efficacious of the times in which they were in vogue. Astrology was the one of greatest antiquity, and in some of its forms has continued

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google with the superstitious to the present day. To a greater or lesser extent "the rising and setting of the stars, the eclipses of the sun and moon, the appearance of comets or other fiery meteors, the aspects, conjunctions, and oppositions of the planets, have all been considered to be intimately influential in the production as in the relief of diseases." Frascatorius, a poet and physician, sought for the causes of diseases in the heavens. Certain positions of the heavenly bodies he considered to be of malignant influence, by which contagious diseases were produced. A conjunction of many stars under the large fixed stars predicted a contagion; falling stars and comets denoted putrefaction. The Jesuit Kircher, after a strict examination of almanacs and astrological tables, contended that putrid diseases had always prevailed at those times when the planets Mars and Saturn were in conjunction. He therefore inferred that those two planets emitted very deadly exhalations, which infected the air and all terrestrial productions with a putrescent tendency, when myriads of animalcules were instantly generated, and the plague, the smallpox, the measles, or some other putrid fevers became inevitable.

Burton, in his Anatomy of Melancholy, says: "Paracelsus is of opinion 'that a physician without the knowledge of stars can neither understand the cause or cure of any disease, either of this [melancholy] or gout, not so much as toothache; except he see the peculiar geniture and scheme of the party affected.' And for this proper malady [melancholy] he will have the principal and primary cause of it proceed from the heaven, ascribing more to stars than humors, 'and that the constellation alone many times produceth melancholy, all other causes set apart.' He gives instance in lunatic persons, that are deprived of their wits by the moon's motion; and in another place refers all to the ascendant, and will have the true and chief cause of it to be sought from the stars. Neither is it his opinion only, but of many Galenists and philosophers, though they do not as peremptorily maintain as much."

Even Hippocrates and Galen held a knowledge of astronomy to be essential to physicians. The latter declares all who are ignorant of it to be no better than homicides. By astronomy these ancient physicians meant astrology. Chaucer, too, in his picture of a good physician, says:

"With us there was a doctor of physike;
In al the world was thar non hym lyk
To speke of physike and of surgerye,
For he was groundit in astronomie.
He kept his pacient a ful gret del
In hourys by his magyk naturel;
Wel couth he fortunen the ascendent
Of his ymagys for his pacient."

This idea, carried to excess in olden times, and the especial favorite of empirics, is now reduced to the one simple fact that diseases are much dependent upon the weather and the state of the atmosphere.

Closely allied with astrology was alchemy, the chief theory involved being the transmutation of the baser metals into gold and silver. Secondary objects were to remedy diseases and prolong life, even to an indefinite period. In all their theoretical practice alchemists were evidently ruled by the want or love of money. Thus Henry VI. endeavored to recruit his empty coffers by recourse to this pursuit. The record of his singular proposition contains "the most solemn and serious account of the philosopher's stone, encouraging the search after it, and dispensing with all statutes and prohibitions to the contrary," referring doubtless to an enactment of Henry IV. prohibiting "the craft of multiplication." Alchemists all over Europe supposed this stone to be endowed not only with the power of transmuting the baser metals into gold, but also the power of curing and preventing disease, and prolonging indefinitely the period of human existence. What connection there can be between a metal-changing agency and a health-giving one it is difficult to conceive; but the analogy was never questioned by any of the multitude of alchemists, as they worked day and night so earnestly and patiently over their crucibles, nor by the people, who were eager to welcome with plaudits the fortunate one who should make the grand discovery.

Elias Ashmole, who styled himself "Mercuriophilus Anglicus," has collected together in his "Theatrum Chemicum Britannicum" many curious pieces on alchemy. He says: "Judiciall astrologie is the key of naturall magick, and naturall magick the doore that leads to this blessed [the philosopher's] stone." He wrote in his diary, under date May 13, 1653: "My father Backhouse," an astrologer who had adopted him for his son, a common practice with those men, "lying sick in Fleet Street, over against St. Dunstan's Church, and not knowing whether he should live or die, about eleven of the clock told me in syllables the true matter of the philosopher's stone, which he bequeathed to me as a legacy." "By this we learn," says Disraeli, "that a miserable wretch knew the art of making gold, yet always lived a beggar: and that Ashmole really imagined he was in possession of the syllables of a secret." He thus verified the hit of Ben Jonson in his play of "The Alchymist:"

"If all you boast of your great art be true,
Sure willing poverty lives most in you."

Puerile as may appear such vagaries, it has nevertheless been maintained that they have been of great advantage to the development of science. For all this, it appears strange that men of eminence in letters and science should have been guilty of the egregious folly of giving their countenance to them. Sir Thomas Browne rendered much assistance to the alchemists of his day. Dr. John Dee held a firm belief in the theory of transmutation, and declared to Sir Thomas that he had "ocularly, undeceivably, and frequently beheld" the change

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of base metal into gold and silver. Lord Bacon speculated upon it, and said: "The sons of chymistry, while they are busy seeking the hidden gold, whether real or not, have, by turning over and trying, brought much profit and convenience to mankind." And Sir Isaac Newton is said once to have entertained the possibility of finding it, and that he also acknowledged that the idle and vain pursuit of astrology had led him to cultivate astronomy.

There appears to have existed even in the present century a "forlorn hope" that what could not be produced by alchemy will yet be effected by modern chemistry. Dr. Girtanner, of Göttingen, a few years ago adventured the prophecy that "in the nineteenth century the transmutation of metals will be generally known and practiced. Every chemist and every artist will make gold; kitchen utensils will be of silver, and even gold, which will contribute more than any thing else to prolong life, poisoned at present by the oxides of copper, lead, and iron, which we daily swallow with our food."

We may now pass to notice some few of the delusions attendant upon the ancient systems of medicine and surgery. The real history of these sciences this paper can scarcely touch. It appears as if we must go back even to the garden of Eden for the origin of them. Le Clerc contends that our first parent was not only the first accoucher but also the primary physician and surgeon in the world; and Brambilla, surgeon to the Emperor Francis II. of Austria, attributes the invention of surgical instruments to Tubal Cain, "the instructor of every artificer in iron and brass." According to Dr. Thomson, Geber, of the seventh century, wrote the earliest chemical treatise in existence. Dr. Johnson pronounces the word gibberish or geberish to have arisen from the style of his writings. Among other beginnings, we may notice that Hippocrates was the first physician to relieve medicine from the trammels of superstition and the delusions of philosophy.

The zodiacal signs of ancient astrology are still left to us. The appropriation of the constellations to the various parts of man was of Egyptian origin. Manlius has thus described them: "The Ram claims the head; the Bull, the neck; the Twins, the arms; the Crab, the breast; the Lion, the thorax; the Virgin, the bowels; the Scales, the reins; the Scorpion, the secrets; the Archer, the thighs; the Goat, the knees; the Water-carrier, the legs; and the Fishes, the feet."

Southey, in his "Doctor," admirably and humorously describes the anatomy of man's body as governed by zodiacal signs, as exhibited in that amusing work of the sixteenth century, the "Margarita Philosophica:" "There Homo stands, naked but not ashamed, upon the two Pisces, one foot upon each; the fish being neither in air, nor water, nor upon earth, but self-suspended, as it appears, in the void. Aries has alighted with two feet on Homo's head, and has sent a shaft through the forehead into his brain. Taurus has quietly seated himself across his neck. The Gemini are riding astride a little below his left shoulder. The whole trunk is laid open, as if part of the old accursed punishment for high treason had been performed upon him. The Lion occupies the thorax as his proper domain, and the Crab is in possession of the abdomen. Sagittarius, volant in the void, has just let fly an arrow, which is on the way to his right arm. Capricornus breathes out a visible influence that penetrates both knees; Aquarius inflicts similar punctures upon both legs; Virgo fishes, at it were, at his intestines; Libra at the part affected by schoolmasters in their anger; and Scorpio takes the wickedest aim of all."

Medicine originated in the East, passed into Egypt, thence into Greece, and was soon disseminated over the whole civilized world. It being a popular belief that all disease was caused by the anger of the gods, the supposed remedies were at the outset almost entirely in the hands of the priests, who, with their learning, readily found wide scope to satisfy their cupidity by exciting and acting upon the credulity of the people: therefore the employment of amulets, charms, etc., to satisfy the demands of popular ignorance.

To charms, talismans, and amulets we may allude under one general heading. The charm and amulet differed only in the manner in which they were used. The talisman consisted of certain cabalistic characters engraved on metal or other material, and might be deposited in any place or carried about the person at will, without losing its efficacy, while the others were required to be worn by the individual constantly. Fosbroke, in his "Encyclopedia of Antiquities," arranged talismans into five divisions: 1. The Astronomical, with celestial signs and intelligible characters; 2. The Magical, with extraordinary figures, superstitious words, and names of unknown angels; 3. The Mixed, of celestial signs and barbarous words, but not superstitious, or with names of angels; 4. The Sigilla Planetarum, composed of Hebrew numeral letters, used by astrologers and fortune-tellers; 5. Hebrew names and characters formed according to the cabalistic art. An illustration of the last class is given in the Gentleman's Magazine, and reads: "It overflowed—he did cast darts—SHADAI is all-sufficient—his hand is strong, and is the preserver of my life in all its variations."

Arnot, in his "History of Edinburgh," says that "on all the old houses still existing in Edinburgh there are remains of talismanic or cabalistical characters which the superstition of earlier ages had caused to be engraved on their fronts. These were generally composed of some text of Scripture, of the name of God, or, perhaps, of an emblematic representation of the resurrection."

Talismans, charms, and amulets were used not only to cure and ward off disease, but also to avert danger. In the Travels of Marco Polo,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the Venetian, we read that, in an attempt of Kubla Khan to make a conquest of the island of Zipangu, a jealousy arose between the two commanders of the expedition, which induced an order for putting all the inhabitants of the garrison to the sword; and that in obedience thereto the heads of all were cut off, excepting of eight persons, who, by the efficacy of a diabolical charm, consisting of a jewel or amulet introduced into the right arm, between the skin and the flesh, were rendered secure from the effects of iron either to kill or wound. Upon this discovery being made they were beaten to death with a heavy club.

For many diseases, and for convulsions and fits particularly, rings composed of various substances were supposed to be efficacious. In 1066 King Edward of England, dying, called to him the Abbot of Westminster, and gave to him a ring which was said to have come from the East—a miraculous gift to a pilgrim by St. John the Evangelist; this had been given to Edward by the palmer in token that the monarch's decease was at hand. "St. Edward's ring," long preserved in Westminster, was believed to be powerful in curing epilepsy and the cramp; and hence arose the custom of the English kings solemnly blessing rings for distribution, which were held potent in cure of disease. These rings, made either of gold or silver, were blessed always on Good Friday, and were composed of the metal of the king's offering to the Cross on that day. The ceremony for blessing the cramp rings, and that for blessing epilepsy rings, involved certain prayers, the MSS. of which are still extant. Such rings were called "medicinable rings." The use of these rings did not cease in England till the change of religion, for we find notices of it in 1557 as a custom in full force. It is not even yet wholly banished from the rural districts: "instances occur where nine young men of a parish each subscribed a crooked sixpence to be moulded into a ring for a young man afflicted with this malady (epilepsy)."

Somewhat akin to this strange fallacy was the view entertained by many, in fact by almost all, learned men in the Middle Ages, that the emerald changed color in the presence of any deadly poison. Hence they set this stone in signets, that they might ward off evil to themselves on the sight of this infallible talisman. Southey has made use of this superstition in his wild tale "Thalaba," where Abdaldar places his hand quietly on the arm of the young destroyer:

> "Then, as in familiar mood,
> Upon the stripling's arm
> The sorcerer laid his hand,
> And the fire of the crystal fled!"

In the Gentleman's Magazine for 1794, we are told that "a silver ring will cure fits, which is made of five sixpences, collected from five different bachelors, to be conveyed by the hand of a bachelor to a smith that is a bachelor. None of the persons who gave the sixpences are to know for what purpose or who gave them." Brand, in his "Popular Antiquities," acquaints us that in Berkshire, England, it was believed that a ring made from a piece of silver collected at the communion service was a cure for convulsions and fits of every kind. If collected on Easter Sunday its efficacy was greatly increased. In the county of Devonshire the people preferred a ring made of three nails or screws that had been used to fasten a coffin, and that had been dug out of the church-yard. The London Medical and Physical Journal, for 1815, noticed a charm consisting of a silver ring contributed by twelve young women, which, worn on one of the patient's fingers, was successfully employed in the cure of epilepsy. In Father Jerome Merolla de Sorrento's "Voyage to Congo," he mentions the foot of the elk as a certain remedy against epilepsy. The way to find out the foot in which the virtue lies, he says, is to "knock the beast down, when he immediately lifts up that leg which is most efficacious to scratch his ear. Then you must be ready with a sharp scymitar to lop off the medicinal limb, and you shall find an infallible remedy against the falling sickness treasured up in his claws."

During the visitation of the plague in London, in 1665, resort was had to various delusive means to avert its ravages. Some of these were not only delusive but ludicrous. Amulets composed of arsenic were very commonly used in the region of the heart, upon the principle that one poison would destroy the other. [Similia similibus curantur.] For the same purpose quills of quicksilver were worn about the neck, and also the powder of a toad. Pope Adrian, it is reported, was never without the latter. His amulet was composed of dried toad, arsenic, tormentil, pearl, coral, hyacinth, emaraz, and tragacanth.

For headache Grose recommended as a cure "a halter, wherewith any one has been hanged, tied about the head. Moss, growing upon a human skull, if dried and powdered and taken as snuff, is no less efficacious."

For fever, Brand, in his "Popular Antiquities," gives the following from a manuscript in his possession: "Wryte thys wordys on a lorell lef: + ysmael + ysmael + adjuro vos per angelum ut suporetur iste homo N., and ley thys lef under hys head that he wete not thereof, and let him eat letuse oft, and drink ip'e seed smal grounden in a morter, and temper yt with ale." "The fever," says Werenfels, "he will not drive away by medicines, but what is a more certain remedy, having pared his nails and tied them to a crayfish, he will turn his back, and as Deucalion did the stones from which a new progeny of men arose, throw them behind him into the next river."

Although not strictly relevant to the subject in hand, we can not forbear quoting a remarkable remedy for a specific fever. It is contained in an old book, entitled "The Breviary of Health, by Andrew Boorde, Phisyche Doctoure," an Englishman, anno 1557:

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A Cure for Ye Lazie Fevre.—The 115th chapitre dothe showe of an evyll fevre, ye wich dothe much cumbre yonge persons, named Ye Fevre Burden, or Lazie Fevre.

Among all ye fevres I had almost forgot ye Fevre Burden, wyth wich many yonge men, yonge women, maydns, and other yonge persons be sore infected now-a-days.

Ye Cause of the Infirmitie.—This fevre dothe cum naturally or els by evyll and slothful bryngynge upp. If it doe cum by nature, then is thys fevre not to be cured—for itt can never cum out of ye fleshe that is bred in ye bone. If it be by evyll bryngynge upp, itt may be holpen by deligent labour.

Ye Remedie.—There is nothing for ye Fevre Burden as is Unguentum Baculinum; that is to sai—take a sticke or wand, of a yard of length and more, and lett itt be so grate as a man's fynger; and with it anoint ye back and shoulders well, mornings and evenings, thys doe twenty-one days. If this evyll fevre be not holpen in that time, let them beware of waggynge on the gallows.

Nota Bene.—And whyles they doe take thys medicine, see you putt no lubber wort in thyr pottage.

For ague, the chips of a gallows put into a bag and hung around the neck was said to have been a cure. Spiders were used in a similar way for the same purpose. The most singular charm for the cure of ague, however, was the use of some supposed magical word. For instance, the letters composing the word Abracadabra are to be so written that, reading from the apex on the right and up the left side, the same word will be given as at the top:

A B R A C A D A B R A
B R A C A D A B R
R A C A D A B
A C A D A
C A D
A

or, the same word may be used thus:

A B R A C A D A B R A
A B R A C A D A B R
A B R A C A D A B
A B R A C A D A
A B R A C A D
A B R A C A
A B R A C
A B R A
A B R
A B
A

This word was recommended on the authority of Serenus Samonicus, a physician in the reign of the Tyrian Caracalla. The Jews attributed an equal value to the word Aracalan.

Mr. Marsden, in his "History of Sumatra," mentions seeing a charm, consisting of a long narrow scroll of paper, upon the person of one of the natives, on which was written these singular words: "+ When Christ saw the cross he trembled and shaked: and they said unto him, hast thou the ague? and he said unto them, I have neither ague nor fever: and whosoever bears these words, either in writing or in mind, shall never be troubled with ague or fever. So help thy servants, O Lord, who put their trust in thee."

Another charm for ague was directed to be said up the chimney by the eldest female of the family on St. Agnes Eve. It ran thus:

"Tremble and go!
First day shiver and burn:
Tremble and go!
Second day shiver and learn:
Tremble and die!
Third day never return."

Elias Ashmole, in his Diary, April 11, 1681, has entered: "I took early in the morning a good dose of elixir, and hung three spiders about my neck, and drove my ague away. Deo gratias."

Russell, in his "History of Aleppo," mentions a charm used by the natives against mosquitoes! It consists of a little slip of paper, on which are inscribed certain unintelligible characters. The paper is pasted upon the lintel of a door, or over the windows. The power of distributing these charms has descended hereditarily, and on a certain day of the year they are given gratis.

Rich old Burton, in his "Anatomy of Melancholy," also mentions the use of spiders and their webs as a remedy for the same disease, in the following short and pleasant narrative. After saying that pæony doth cure epilepsy; precious stones most diseases; a wolf's dung borne with one helps the colic, a spider the ague, etc., he proceeds:

"Being in the country in a vacation time not many years since, at Lindley, in Leicestershire, my father's house, I first observed this amulet of a spider in a nutshell lapped in silk, etc., so applied for an ague by my mother; whom, although I knew to have excellent skill in chirurgery, sore eyes, aches, etc., and such experimental medicines, as all the country where she dwelt can witness, to have done many famous and good cures upon divers poor folks that were otherwise destitute of help; yet among all other experiments, this, methought, was most absurd and ridiculous. I could see no warrant for it. Quid arenea cum febre? For what antipathy? till at length, rambling among authors (as often I do), I found this very medicine in Dioscorides, approved by Matthiolus, repeated by Alderovandus, cap. de Arenea, lib. de insectis. I began to have a better opinion of it, and to give more credit to amulets, when I saw it in some parties answer to experience."

It is an undoubted fact that most of the cures attributed to these charms and amulets ought properly to be ascribed to mental influences, and the remainder to the efforts of nature. "Imagination," says Lord Bacon, "is next akin to a miracle—a working faith;" and it can not be questioned that in all ages of the world imagination has effected a larger number of cures than medical skill. One or two instances may be cited for illustration: During the prevalence of the cholera in Canada a few years since a man named Ayres, who went from the United States, and was said to be a graduate of the University of New Jersey, was given out to be St. Roche, the principal patron saint of the Canadians, and renowned for his power in averting pestilential diseases. He was reported to have descended from heaven to cure his suffering people of the cholera, and many were the cases in which he appeared to afford relief. Many were thus dispossessed of their fright in anticipation of the disease, who might, probably, but

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

for his inspiriting influence, have fallen victims to their apprehensions. The remedy he employed was an admixture of maple sugar, charcoal, and lard.

A more modern and notable instance is thus given. Alexandre Dumas published some time ago, in a Paris daily paper, a novel in which the heroine, prosperous and happy, is assailed by consumption. All the gradual symptoms were most touchingly described, and the greatest interest was felt for the heroine.

One day the Marquis de Calomieu called on him.

"Dumas," said he, "have you composed the end of the story now being published in—?"

"Of course."

"Does the heroine die at the end?"

"Of course—dies of consumption. After such symptoms as I have described how could she live?"

"You will have to make her live. You must change the catastrophe."

"I can not."

"Yes, you must; for on your heroine's life depends my daughter's?"

"Your daughter's."

"Yes; she has all the various symptoms of consumption you have described, and watches mournfully for every new number of your novel, reading her own fate in your heroine's. Now, if you make your heroine live, my daughter, whose imagination has been deeply impressed, will live too. Come, a life to save is a temptation—"

"Not to be resisted."

Dumas changed his last chapter. His heroine recovered, and was happy.

About five years afterward Dumas met the Marquis at a party.

"Ah, Dumas!" he exclaimed, "let me introduce you to my daughter; she owes her life to you. There she is!"

"That fine, handsome woman, who looks like Joan of Arc?"

"Yes. She is married, and has had four children."

"And my novel four editions," said Dumas, "so we are quits."

In no particular instance was the power of imagination more evident than in what was termed the royal touch for the cure of the king's evil, or scrofula; and this because human credulity attached a thought of something divine to the touch of royalty. But it was mental influence alone, the same which explains the manifest diminution of sickness which was so often seen to follow the driving a nail into the wall of the Temple of Jupiter among the Romans in the time of pestilence. The solemn pomp with which a dictator was chosen for this specific purpose, and the ceremony attending the performance of the act, were well calculated to inspire confidence in the minds of superstitious people. It was the calm, cheerful, hopeful state of feeling thus diffused over the community that produced the result, though the people referred it to the appeasing influence which this public act was supposed to exert upon an offended deity.

The practice of the royal touch, which seems to have originated in the belief that there is something sacred attached to the sovereign, was followed by all the monarchs of England from Edward the Confessor until the accession of the House of Brunswick. In one of the scenes of Shakspeare's Macbeth (Act IV., Scene 3) he distinctly refers to it, and thereby shows the prevalent superstition of the times:

MALCOLM.
Comes the king forth, I pray you?

DOCTOR.
Ay, Sir; there are a crew of wretched souls,
That stay his cure: their malady convinces
The great assay of art; but at his touch,
Such sanctity hath heaven given his hand,
They presently amend.

MALCOLM.
I thank you, doctor. [Exit doctor.]

MACDUFF.
What's the disease he means?

MALCOLM.
'Tis call'd the evil;
A most miraculous work in this good king;
Which often, since my here-remain in England,
I have seen him do. How he solicits heaven,
Himself best knows; but strangely visited people,
All swoln and ulcerous, pitiful to the eye,
The mere despair of surgery, he cures:
Hanging a golden stamp about their necks,
Put on with holy prayers: and 'tis spoken,
To the succeeding royalty he leaves
The healing benediction.

Passing over the claim of France to be considered the first to exercise the royal touch for healing, it may be interesting to notice a few isolated facts drawn from English history, which, although they may not enlighten us much, will at least afford some diversion and illustrate to how great an extent the credulity of mankind may be carried.

Collier, in his "Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain," when speaking of Edward the Confessor, says "that the prince cured the king's evil is beyond dispute; and since the credit of this miracle is unquestionable, I see no reason why we should scruple believing the rest." He then quotes William of Malmesbury as his authority, explains the nature of the disease, and adds: "King Edward the Confessor was the first that cured this distemper, and from him it has descended as an hereditary miracle to his successors. To dispute the matter of fact, is to go to the excesses of skepticism, to deny our senses, and to be incredulous even to ridiculousness."

Henry VII., who was a strict observer of religious forms, established a particular service to be used on occasion of healing, which is contained in the Book of Common Prayer, published in the reign of Queen Anne.

Dr. Badger says that Charles I. "excelled all his predecessors in the divine gift; for it is manifest beyond all contradiction, that he not only cured by his sacred touch, both with and without gold, but likewise perfectly effected

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the same cure by his prayer and benediction only."

In no reign, however, did the practice prevail to such an extent as in that of Charles II., and it is not a little remarkable that more people died of scrofula, according to the bills of mortality, during this period than any other. In Evelyn's "Memoirs" we have an account of one of the meetings for healing as follows: "6 July, 1660. His majestie began first to touch for ye evil, according to costome, thus: his ma^tie^ sitting under his state in ye banquetting house, the chirurgeons cause the sick to be brought or led up to the throne, where they kneeling, ye king strokes their faces or cheeks with both his hands at once, at which instant a chaplaine in his formalities says, 'He put his hands upon them and he healed them.' This is said to every one in particular. When they have been all touch'd, they come up againe in the same order, and the other chaplaine kneeling, and having angel gold strung on white ribbon on his arme, delivers them one by one to his ma^tie^, who puts them about the necks of the touched as they passe, whilst the first chaplaine repeats, 'That is ye true light who came into ye world.' Then followes an epistle (as at first a gospell) with the liturgy, prayers for the sick, with some slight alteration; lastly, ye blessing; and then the h. chamberlaine and comptroller of the household bring a basin, ewer, and towel, for his ma^tie^ to wash."

So general was the belief in the efficacy of this practice that Charles II. "touched" nearly a hundred thousand persons in the course of twelve years.

Dr. Samuel Johnson, the lexicographer, it appears, was touched by Queen Anne, March 30, 1714. When four years and a half old, he was sent to the Queen to undergo this ceremony, at the instigation of Sir John Floyer, a physician of eminence, who practiced at Litchfield, the place of Johnson's birth. Its inefficacy, in this instance at least, was fully established, as he suffered much from the disease during the whole of his life, and bore evidence to the virulence of the disorder.

The history of the "royal touch" might be thus traced as followed by all the monarchs of England from Edward to Queen Anne, with the exception of William III., who rejected the folly. It seems strange that such vast multitudes should have exercised faith in it; but, doubtless, it was that very faith which effected such cures as were supposed to be made by the royal touch. Still, it is a singular fact, that during the reign of Charles II., when we might suppose from the number he "touched" the disease would be almost exterminated, that deaths from the "king's evil" exceeded the number of any former period.

History affords us many other delusions of lesser note, but no less interesting. It was a popular superstition, and exists in the present day to some extent, that the seventh son of a seventh son is an infallible physician. Thus a celebrated ancient author wrote: "The seventh son of a seventh son is born a physician; having an intuitive knowledge of the art of curing all diseases, and sometimes the faculty of performing wonderful cures by touching only." M. Thiers confutes this point by saying much as follows: "Many believe, in France, that the seventh son born in lawful marriage, if no girl comes between, can cure tertians, quartans, and even the king's evil, provided he fasts three or nine days before touching the afflicted. But they reckon too much on the seventh, when they attribute to the seventh child, in preference to all the rest, a power which they might as well ascribe to the sixth or eighth. Of three of these seventh sons that I know, there are two who cure nobody, and the third has confessed to me that he once enjoyed the reputation of being able to cure numerous diseases, although he had never cured any. Consequently M. du Laurent has good reason to reject this visionary power, and place this method of curing the king's evil in the rank of fables."

In Europe, many wells and fountains have various virtues superstitiously attached to them. To those which were medicinal pilgrims resorted, and also the sick for relief. They were called holy wells, or holy springs, wishing wells, etc., and various rites were performed at them at Easter, upon Holy Thursday, and other particular days. Grose, from a manuscript in the Cotton Library, tells us that "between the towns of Alton and Newton, near the foot of Rosberrye Toppinge, there is a well dedicated to St. Oswald. The neighbors have an opinion that a shirt taken off a sick person and thrown into that well will show whether the person will recover or die; for, if it floated, it denoted the recovery of the party; if it sunk, there remained no hope of their life; and to reward the saint for his intelligence, they tear off a rag from the shirt, and leave it hanging on the briars thereabouts, where," says the writer, "I have seen such numbers as might have made a fayre rheme in a paper-myll."

Borlase, in his "Natural History of Cornwall," England, notices a very similar method of curing insanity, mentioned by Carew, in the parish of Altarnum—"to place the disordered in mind on the brink of a square pool, filled with water from St. Nun's well. The patient, having no intimation of what was intended, was, by a sudden blow on the breast, tumbled into the pool, where he was tossed up and down by some persons of superior strength until, being quite debilitated, his fury forsook him. He was then carried to church, where certain masses were sung over him."

Sir Walter Scott notices a practice in Perthshire, where several wells and springs are dedicated to St. Fillan, and are places of pilgrimage and offerings, even among the Protestants. Thus he writes in his "Marmion:"

> "Thence to St. Fillan's blessed well,
> Whose spring can frenzied dreams dispel
> And the crazed brain restore."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"These wells," the poet tells us, "are held to be powerful in cases of madness; and, in cases of very late occurrence, lunatics have been left all night bound to the holy stone, in confidence that the saint would come and unloose them before morning."

Mr. and Mrs. Hall, in their work on Ireland, tell us that the remains of sanctified wells (so-called) are to be found in nearly every parish in the kingdom. They were generally betokened by the erection of rude crosses immediately above them, by fragments of cloth and pieces of rags of all colors, hung upon the neighboring bushes and left as memorials; sometimes the crutches of convalescent visitors were bequeathed as offerings, and not unfrequently small buildings, for prayer and shelter, were raised above and around them. Each holy well had its stated day, when a pilgrimage was supposed to be peculiarly fortunate. The day of its patron saint attracted crowds of visitors, some with the hope of receiving health from its waters, others as a place of meeting with distant friends; but the great majority of them were lured into the neighborhood by a love of idleness and dissipation. The scene, therefore, was generally disgusting.

Until a few years since, according to the same authority, the holy well Tubber Quan, near Carrick-on-Suir, was in great repute for the many miraculous cures effected by its waters. The well was dedicated to two patron saints, St. Quan, after whom it takes its name, and St. Brogawn. The times for visiting it were the last three Sundays in June, when the people imagined that the saints exerted their sacred influence more particularly for the benefit of those who applied for their assistance. It was confidently said, and firmly believed, that at that period the two saints appeared in the well in the shape of two small fishes of the trout kind; and if they did not so appear, that no cure would take place. The penitents attending on these occasions ascended the hill barefoot, knelt by the stream and repeated a number of paters and aves, then entered it, going through the stream three times on their bare knees, but upon the grass. Having performed these exercises, they cut off locks of their hair and tied them on the branches of the tree as specifics against headache. The tree is even now a great object of veneration, and presents a curious spectacle, being covered all over with human hair.

Another delusion, rather than a mere superstition, was once somewhat popular in England, and is referred to at length by Dr. Hooker, and other authorities. Some inventive medical genius made a bold push in the line of discovery, and found that ointments healed wounds much more rapidly if they were applied to the instruments by which the wounds were inflicted. This was undoubtedly a real improvement upon the prevalent mode of treating wounds at that time, for many of the ointments in common use were of such a character that they would irritate rather than soothe a wound, and therefore would retard its cure. It was much better, of course, that they should be applied to the instrument, where, at least, they would do no harm. It took time, however, to discover that the only benefit of thus applying them arose from keeping the wounds out of bad company; and this delusion, strange as it may seem, maintained its sway about as long as medical delusions are wont to do, and prevailed extensively in England and in other countries. And though such things as powdered mummy, and human blood, and moss from the skull of a thief hung in chains, were considered essential ingredients in the weapon ointments of that day, the practice was far from being confined to the ignorant; learned men in great numbers believed in it, just as has been the case with all medical errors and fantasies down to the present time.

From these and other facts we may clearly see that the history of medical delusions most copiously illustrates the truth that folly is very far from being confined to fools. That even pre-eminent wisdom and mental power fail to save from folly in medicine might be shown by many examples; but a few will suffice. Boyle, who has been called "the morning star of medical science," was exceedingly credulous in regard to specifics, and seriously speaks of the thigh bone of an executed criminal as a cure for dysentery. Bacon, who by the force of his wisdom revolutionized the world of mind, was weak enough to attribute virtue to charms and amulets, and could not bring himself to disbelieve the propriety of applying ointments to the weapons that made the wounds instead of the wounds themselves. And Luther, who with such masterly wisdom and energy revolutionized the religious world, gave utterance to the following specimen of weakness and folly: "Experience has proved the toad to be endowed with valuable qualities. If you run a stick through three toads, and after having dried them in the sun, apply them to any pestilent tumor, they draw out all the poison, and the malady will disappear."

From this recital of curious facts we have at least learned something of the natural credulity of ignorance, and of the power of imagination in the cure of diseases. Dr. Reid has said: "Medical can not be separated from moral science without reciprocal and essential mutilation." And as fear may induce, so faith and hope, with the recuperative assistance of nature, may cure disease. Therefore the regular practitioner and the empiric aim to endow their patients with confidence in their skill. This effected, in ordinary diseases one-half of the battle is won. Even mere credulity may produce a similar result. Imagination, also, is a potent ally of the good physician; and we know that the times are growing pregnant with the theory that the medical practitioner, to be accounted skillful, must operate upon most of the ailments of the physical organization through the mental.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Editor's Easy Chair.

THE year 1866 ended upon a much calmer and pleasanter temper of the public mind than it had known during its course. For that Peace hath her victories was never more strikingly illustrated than by the various elections. Party fury seemed never more angry. There was a desperate and un-American tone in much of the conduct of the canvass which startled those who did not reflect that the passions and methods of war can not readily be abandoned. Very foolishly and wickedly certain orators talked of civil war as a contingency of the result. But that was to assume that we were already Mexicanized. It was a consequence of ignorantly estimating both the character and the intelligence of the American people. How can any sane man imagine that Vermont, or Massachusetts, or Ohio, or Wisconsin could behave like the South American States when a party is disappointed at the polls? He might as wisely expect that an Illinois prairie would break out into volcanic fires.

It used to be charged that the people of the cooler latitudes in this country were pusillanimous. But the event has proved that, while they had the natural timidity of a trading people, they had also that inexorable tenacity which explains Saxon or Norman civilization. What was called pusillanimity was patient confidence in law. The truth is, that the Saxon temperament works out civil liberty to noble and permanent results because it regards it with the head quite as much as the heart. It knows that nothing is sure which is not established in a law which is the fruit of the general sentiment. And as this is its principle it naturally regards the law not as an individual or momentary whim but as a fixed national purpose, and in trusting it, it is only trusting the nation. The Celtic civilization is of a very different kind. It has less respect for law because law is less the mature conviction of the people. Consequently it is readier for more summary, even to revolutionary remedies.

The American doctrine of revolution is the natural growth of this reverence for law: That doctrine is not that brute force may be justly invoked when we are oppressed, still less when we are merely disappointed or anticipate oppression; but only when the oppression is intolerable and lawful redress is hopeless. But to make the oppression intolerable it must be worse than the necessary consequences of war. This was the plain declaration of our fathers in taking up arms. This is the sensible Saxon voice that speaks quietly through the hysterical rhetoric of a hundred other revolutions.

In a system which stands upon the appeal to the people the necessity of revolution can scarcely exist, because it is not to be supposed that the people will intolerably oppress themselves. Nor indeed is it presumable that an intelligent people will long or seriously oppress a minority. If they do, they will presently be at war. In our recent history it will be remembered that no oppression was pleaded, but only the apprehension of oppression; and although liberty was invoked it was not because the liberty of a minority was constrained, but because the minority sought the liberty of oppressing others. A tried to break faith with B, not because B hurt him, but because B was unwilling that he should hurt C. If the worst came to the worst, B had certainly as much right to oppress A as A had to torment C. But nothing came to the worst, every thing came to the best; and it was settled that neither should harm the other.

The condition which dispenses with the resort to force is, that the appeal to the people shall be real and not fictitious; that it shall truly be the people, and not a part, arbitrarily selected, who are called by that name. Thus, in every way, the pretense of the stump orators who hinted or openly prophesied civil war was apparent. If the whole people speak, a man is a fool who opposes, unless their decision be such that honest men will prefer destruction rather than submission even for an hour. But that is a fanciful case. When the people speak decisively, and for objects which are both generous and humane, their will remains unquestioned. Even had the late decision been other than it was, we believe the appeal to blood would hardly have been made by either side. The Court may be supposed to know something of law, and the American people may surely be supposed to have common sense.

As it was, a more tranquil election was never known. Even in the great cities a lady might have quietly gone shopping and have remarked no difference from other days. Those who anticipated riots and broken heads might as well have gone to a Quaker meeting on a Sunday afternoon in the dog-days. And when the result was known—strong and bitter as had been the feeling, wild and reckless many of the speeches, seething as we still were with the heat of the last few years—the acquiescence was as entire as it is in the daily sunrise; and instead of invoking blunderbusses and bludgeons, the most acrid chiefs recommend their host to join the ranks of their opponents. "If you can't get sponge-cake get smelts," said the hospitable man to his servant, determined that his guests should have some refreshment. If you can't have your own way, suggests the sensible man who feels that he can not, why, then, take t'other way.

The guild of the quill or of the pen is always profoundly interested in the discussion of the question of literary compensation; and Mr. Richard Grant White lately opened the matter with vigor and directness in the Galaxy. He asks why we have no Saturday Reviews in America—meaning why no weekly periodical of the highest class is supported in this country—and offers several answers to his question, drawn from his own careful observation and reflection. The Nation replies to Mr. White that there is no Saturday Review or highest kind of periodical—of which the Saturday Review is very far from being a type, although it perfectly serves Mr. White's purpose of pointing his question—simply because there is no demand for such a paper. The intellectual appetite of the country, in the Nation's opinion, does not demand such food as such a publication supplies, while the peculiar condition of the country thwarts the development of the special talent which is found in such papers as the London weeklies.

Mr. White's feeling evidently is that literary labor is underpaid; that a man of equal talent and industry, who would but squeeze along as an author, will prosper famously as a lawyer, perhaps, and the nimble imagination is left free to follow him to the high-stepping pair and the "freestone front," which are the final crown of success to the admiring pop-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ular eye. Mr. White, however, makes a general plea. He is not arguing his own case, nor censuring publishers as a parsimonious class. Upon the contrary, he expressly recognizes that "publishers do their business, like other men, for profit," and he honorably signalizes by name some of the most eminent publishers of the country. If he speaks of a "seeming parsimony" upon the part of newspaper publishers, it is not to deride it, nor to denounce it, but merely to note the fact that literary payment is inadequate.

There is, however, one evident reason why the man of equal talent and industry may prosper as a lawyer and very doubtfully succeed as a writer. It is indicated by the Nation in saying that the training of a clever lawyer is laborious and precise and thorough, while the writer is more or less a dweller in the pleasant land of Bohemia. His gifts come more by nature than by art, and his work belongs rather to the realm of luxury or of recreation than of estimable pecuniary value. A late London letter-writer quotes a remark which he said he heard from Thackeray. "It is very well for you young authors to take your two guineas a page and claim copyright in a reprint: many a long year I worked for Frazer at $8 a sheet of sixteen pages—double columns, you know—and even thought it glorious pay." We are very sure there is some mistake here. Thackeray could never have written much for a double-columned Magazine at the rate of fifty cents a page, and have called it or thought it glorious pay. Forty-five years ago, as Barry Cornwall tells us, the London Magazine paid a clever writer a pound on every page for prose and for each page of verse two pounds, while Elia received (very fitly) two or three times as much. But the story of Thackeray serves well enough our purpose. Thackeray was one of the two or three most eminent authors of his time and country. Why was he not always as sure of the same royal income that the two or three most eminent lawyers in England receive? Plainly because upon their learning and sagacity and skill depend the settlement of questions of the most vital and palpable material interest, for which men will gladly pay enormous sums. But there could possibly be no such measure of value for "Vanity Fair" or "The Newcomes." In the nature of things there can not be; for the work of the writer, or the sculptor, or the painter, or the musician, is not a work of necessity, in the ordinary sense, like that of the lawyer.

There is another reason why the writer is at a peculiar disadvantage in America, and that is that he lives in a country in which the demand of a highly cultivated class is less stringent—in other words, where the demand is less—while he is brought into direct competition with the finest foreign supply gratis. To bring it to the point again: the American newspaper publisher can have for his paper at the earliest moment, for half a dollar, the comments of the most skillful foreign critics upon foreign affairs and the cleverest correspondence from the European capitals, for which the English proprietor must pay hundreds of pounds. A liberal writer in London, observing and criticising the late Prussian war, for instance, would probably do his work as congenially to the tastes and convictions of an American reader interested in the question as an American commentator upon the same topic. Why should the American proprietor pay twenty dollars for work which he can have for half a dollar? The same thing is true in many other directions, and in all of them the American writer is at a palpable disadvantage.

But unquestionably, as the Nation insists, there is not a very general, on the contrary there is a very limited, demand either for the discussion of purely foreign subjects, or for the essays upon minor morals and manners which are one of the present distinctions of the periodical literature of England. But neither is there any question, it seems to us, that the profession of literature is getting upon its legs in this country. A writer who would be welcome to any double-columned Magazine, although he be very far from a Thackeray, may be sure that he will not be compelled to call fifty cents a page glorious pay. Let him treat in a manly and interesting way any subject which engages the public mind, and he will be heard and rewarded. But he must not make himself the judge in his own case. An editor is an autocrat. He can not give reasons. He knows, and knows not how he knows, what is suitable for his purpose. Complain, then, of his purpose, if you understand it, and show good reasons for changing it, but do not suppose that he knows less of his own business than you. "Isn't this poem of mine infinitely better than that you published last month or two years ago last July?" asks the indignant poet. Possibly, but what then? There is no question of the excellence of your poetry, but of the prosperity of the Magazine, an editor might reply. But must not the prosperity of a publication depend upon the excellence of its contents? Certainly, but excellence in this case is a mere synonym of fitness. What is excellent for the North American Review may be very injurious to the Ledger.

The whole question may be safely trusted to the unwritten laws which govern all human affairs. Mr. White very justly smiles at the idea of an "American literature," as if it could be made in the course of a year or two by an adroit conspiracy of publishers and writers. The local experiment has never been attempted, we believe, except in the hopes of some of our fellow-citizens in the Southern States, who occasionally issue pathetic proposals for a "Southern" literature, unvexed by the immorality of "Northern" thought. It is a pleasing dream, perhaps, but it is not profitable. The "Southern literature" will be contemporaneous with a Southern atmosphere, untainted by Northern oxygen. The truth is, we must all breathe the same air mentally as well as physically. Dante is found to be as solid nourishment for Yankee minds as the soft air of Mentone for Yankee lungs. Civilization is one, and its great powers, literature, science, and art, are not separated by oceans and mountains. The higher we climb the lower all the hills appear. The ideal goal is not our country but the world; not our nation but mankind. The true economy, doubtless, is that of all working for all. Yet we may be always sure that the perfection of the members is essential to the symmetry of the whole; and it is toward that perfection that the discussion of the question of literary labor and its emoluments directly tends.

A NATION without visible historical monuments is without one of the most subtle and powerful influences of national strength and union; and there can be no poorer economy than the alteration or removal of such monuments for the sake of a few thousand dollars of income. How can the essential value of the Tower, of Westminster Abbey, of St.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Denis, of Nôtre Dame, of the Duomo at Florence, of St. Peter's, of the Coliseum, of the Doge's Palace, be computed in money? How can the results upon national character of the destruction of the most cherished monuments be accurately estimated? Patriotism and the sentiment of nationality are, as the very words imply, a sentiment, and every material manifestation is of incalculable value in developing and confirming them. There is probably no great city in any country of the world so utterly destitute of true patriotic pride and a fine sense of national honor as the city of New York. It is due, of course, chiefly to the fact that its population is so largely foreign and ignorant. But who shall estimate the actual loss caused by the absence of all the memorials which would invest the city with something of a venerable air, and visibly suggest to the new-comers that they had become heirs to ancient renown?

Such memorials have almost entirely disappeared from New York. The most interesting of those remaining is undoubtedly the old hotel at the corner of Broad and Pearl streets, in which Washington parted with his Generals. The story is simply and charmingly told by Irving, and indeed can not be faithfully narrated without pathos. That the building has stood so long is a perpetual wonder, nor can it much longer resist the pressure of the marble and freestone warehouses which are rapidly overpowering that quarter of the city. Another of the old houses is opposite our own windows, the Walton House, in which the citizen Minister of the French Republic, the insolent Genet, married the daughter of Governor George Clinton. It has a quaint dignity of aspect, retaining the air of the past time, like the old Province House in Boston, of which Hawthorne was so fond, and which he selected as the scene of some of his marvelous stories. The Province House is gone—and it is with sincere sorrow we record the unpleasant truth that a building of as much historical interest as any in the country, excepting, perhaps, Faneuil Hall, is about to be altered, so that its peculiar character must necessarily be lost. This is the old State House in Boston; not the conspicuous building, the dome of which, seen far away, crowns the sturdy city; but the building familiar to every one who has been in Boston, which stands at the head of State Street, and which is intimately associated with the men and the times of the Revolution.

The old Boston State House is now about one hundred and twenty years old. It was built four years after Washington was born, and from its balcony the first President received the welcome of the men who had helped win the Revolution and found the Government. In this old building were held the colonial courts. Here, also, were the Council Chamber, hung with the portraits of Charles II. and James II., and the hall of the Representatives of the colony, the body which was afterward known by the awful title, "The Great and General Court." The lower floor was the Exchange of the merchants of the ancient town.

It was here—and we are following the appeals sent to the Boston newspapers by the true descendants of Revolutionary sires—that the encroachments of British imperial power were first strenuously resisted. In the old Council Chamber, said John Adams, "American Independence was born." Here James Otis and Thacher thundered against the Writs of Assistance. Here, in his famous speech of February, 1761, Otis declared that the principles of the writs had cost one king of England his head and another his throne; and here he uttered the war-cry of the Revolution, "Taxation without representation is tyranny." The Boston Port bill, says the Advertiser of that city, in an eloquent protest, "was aimed at a rebellion which had asserted itself in the old State House." In its very shadow the Boston massacre was perpetrated. Beneath its roof John Adams and Josiah Quincy defended the officers and soldiers who had caused the tragedy, that passion might not even seem to have overpowered justice; and "when, after hard riding for fourteen days, the Declaration of Independence was brought from Philadelphia to Boston, it was read to the people on the 18th of July from the balcony of the Council Chamber."

If there be a building left in the country of peculiar national interest and importance, which derives the charm of its association from events which are not local but universal—from men who are not so much Bostonians or New Englanders as Americans, and in which, consequently, the whole country has a certain right of patriotic reverence—it is the old Boston State House. If there be one which should be carefully guarded from the sharp tooth of Time, and from which the malign genius of modern improvement should be absolutely barred, it is the old Boston State House. And yet, for a few more thousands of dollars rent, the city Government proposes to remodel the roof, and consequently and inevitably to alter the aspect of this venerable and sacred building. Yet there is not an intelligent merchant who daily passes it upon the way to his office, not one who daily comes out to stand on 'Change and exult in the national security and prosperity, the foundations of which were laid in the quaint edifice at the head of the street, who would not willingly turn out a favorite old horse to pasture for the rest of his days, and smile at any offer to sell him to an omnibus or a butcher. Can not Boston do for its old State House what any Boston merchant would do for his old horse? We wonder that the sons of those who disdained the encroachments of authority beyond the sea have not assembled spontaneously in the noble old building itself, and by the fiery voices of newer Otises and Thachers and Adamses and Quincys protested so vehemently against the desecration of a precious national monument that the city fathers should have heard through their terrapin and trembled, and have withdrawn the offensive proposition as the turtle draws his head into his shell.

Let the modern Otis resist the beginnings. If terrapin be permitted to desecrate the old State House, turtle will be strong enough to obliterate Faneuil Hall. It is an extremely old-fashioned building. It is utterly out of the way of polite audiences, and its lower story is already a market. What is its revenue to the city treasury compared with the palatial shops that might occupy the site at enormous rents? For what earthly use is it fit except for an occasional public meeting? and how much money, pray, does an occasional public meeting put into the treasury? The Music Hall will hold as many people, and they can be entertained by the Great Organ before Sam Adams and Otis and Quincy begin; and it is infinitely more accessible to Governor Hancock with his gout. Besides, the Governor's own house is gone; the Province House has vanished; the Bunker Hill redoubts have been leveled; the old State House is to be coiffed after the latest French fashion. Superfluous

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google lags Faneuil Hall upon the earth; off with its head, also. So much for Revolutionary memories!

In a letter to William Tudor, written when he was an old man, John Adams urges the preservation of the old State House. Where is the Massachusetts Adams who now authoritatively pleads against the melancholy change? It is the custom in other lands for rulers proudly to inscribe upon buildings which they have erected or restored their names and the date of their benefactions. Which would the municipality of Boston prefer—a plate upon the old State House which should record that, "In the year 1867 this building was surmounted by a roof which destroyed its aspect and character, but increased the civic rents by a few thousand dollars," or one which should say, "Mindful of the Past and of the Future, grateful for the birth and salvation of the nation, the City Government of Boston, in the year 1867, returned unchanged this building in which 'American Independence was born?'"

A FRIEND sends this charade, which is not inferior to Praed's. If any reader guesses it, let him send the Easy Chair the rhymed answer as felicitous:

Lisle Castle standeth strong and fair
In the wide Western vales,
But Cromwell's hands are hard to fill
And Cromwell's treasure fails;
Derby and Settringham are down,
And now with mighty stir
Of men and guns, and trump and drum,
My first has come to her.

The youngest Cornet of the troop
In morning twilight stands,
His corslet glints of burnished steel—
My next is in his hands;
He scanneth keep and barbican,
He scanneth wall and tower,
He glanceth keen where may be seen
The Lady Mildred's bower.

Down the long vale my gleaming whole
Is lost and then is seen,
'Mid hazel copse and alder grove,
And willows waving green,
The hinges turn—the lady comes!
Oh! deep was drugged the bowl,
And soundly may the warder sleep
While they are on my whole.

"In my seventy-seventh year I have been invited to place on record my recollections of Charles Lamb." So writes Barry Cornwall at the beginning of his delightful little memoir of Elia, recently published. It is delightful whether as the work of so old an author or as a general review of the familiar facts of Lamb's Life. There is nothing very new in it, but it is an inimitable introduction to Lamb—a grace before meat.

There are certain authors who are not only tests of taste but even of character. If a youth is passionately fond of Tupper—it is enough. No more light is needed. If a man gives himself naturally, not pedantically nor formally, nor traditionally, but heartily with natural longing and appetite to Shakespeare, or Chaucer, or Jeremy Taylor—that also is enough; we have a clew to the man. So in other arts—the boy who delights in Correggio, whose heart even in the Sistine Chapel wanders yearningly to Parma, and even in Raphael's Stanze does not forget the faces of the cherubs glancing through the palms in the "Flight into Egypt," is a young artist, whose soul is revealed as those angelic faces are. The man who among all Operas prefers Don Giovanni, or Fidelio, or the Barber of Seville, or Robert le Diable, involuntarily unveils himself as he makes his preference known. He rises or falls, he is near or far in our regard just as he instinctively likes or rejects what you feel to be best.

Nor is it altogether a matter of individual taste, if by taste we mean merely whim. Certain things are not disputable. The beauty of a perfect June day or of a rose, the sweetness of the note of the wood-thrush, the fragrance of the wild grape blossom, the brilliancy of the diamond—these are all absolutely beyond question. And certain fames are like them. Homer, Shakespeare, Dante, Raphael, Michael Angelo, Handel, Beethoven, Mozart, they are towering facts like the Alps or the Himalaya. They are the heaven-kissing peaks, and are universally acknowledged. It is not conceivable that the judgment of mankind upon those names will ever be reversed. But there is a lesser region, not the glaciered summits of Mont Blanc, but the hill-country, the uplands of meadow and grove and soft brook sides fringed with flowers, full of the singing of birds and the shadows of foliage. This is the more debatable ground; the country of which you can not surely say whether it be rather the mountains condescending or the valleys aspiring. Yet here, too, there are by-ways, and knolls, and sunny lawns, and twilight bowers, the love and seeking of which introduce other men to us like letters from a friend.

Charles Lamb is certainly not a heaven-scaling peak of storms nor an inaccessible cliff sublime in solitary light. He does not stand among the great masters of literature. His own friends were ever disposed to patronize him. Mistaking the form of his genius for its quality they called him "gentle." Yet he is just as positive and appreciable a phenomenon in literature as his friends Coleridge or Wordsworth, and his image is much more sharply cut upon the public mind than either of them. One of the American Dii majores, speaking of a literary friend, said: "I am troubled by him. I am afraid I have overrated him, for he likes second-rate men; he likes Charles Lamb passionately." If he liked Elia to the exclusion of others; if among all he greatly preferred Lamb, and had only the usual ceremonious acquaintance and formal and traditional approbation of the chiefs, it was a pity for the literary friend; but still it was not absolutely a second-rate taste, it was a taste for what is essentially first-rate. If a man sincerely loves the songs of Burns better than Hamlet or Lear, is he satisfied with the second-rate? It is a curious criticism upon the critic of whom we speak that he said, "What do the young people find in Shelley? To read him is like dipping up water in which the sand sparkles and you think it gold dust. But it only leaves your fingers wet with a handful of sand." The line between first and second rate is that between genius and talent, is it not? Genius, like light, is always the same. It is not so much the more or less as the form of its appearance which overpowers us. One star differeth from another star in glory, but all stars are glorious.

Lamb said that a solemn organ service should be performed before reading Milton. So we advise all young readers to approach Elia and Lamb's Life and Letters through this soft and exquisite prelude of Barry Cornwall's. It is the work of a very old man, but it is wholly untainted with senility. It describes with vivid tenderness all Lamb's intimate

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

friends. Hazlitt, especially, of whom we personally know so little, appears more pleasantly in this book than in any other reminiscence, while the inexpressible melancholy and heroic beauty of Charles Lamb's life and character are affectionately and reverently portrayed. Closing the book, and remembering that its writer is seventy-seven years old, and the sole survivor of those evenings which are as familiar to the lovers of Elia as if they had been themselves present, it lingers in the memory like a strain of the saddest and sweetest music.

At last Italy is free from the Alps to the Adriatic. A result long and passionately anticipated, which has inspired a literature and the noblest sacrifices, the dream and hope of the most emotional nation, has been wholly secured. "A soldier in the sky-blue coat of the Austrian sailed off, on Friday, the 19th of October, to join a ship close by, bearing a yellow and sable flag, embroidered with an eagle. It was the last Austrian Governor of Venice, the last Gesler of his race, General Alemann. The quay was thronged with people; girls, national guards, old men. They made a silent path through them to the water's edge, whence passed the Austrian, a bearded man of iron gray, full of those outward graces which are learned in his military school; a man who could command the execution of Kossuth or Garibaldi with quiet dignity, and go to bed thereafter without remorse.....As his gondola passed off he raised his hat. A silent waving of handkerchiefs from the quay gave him farewell. ....His gondolier landed him, still waving his hand, upon the deck of an Austrian ship. One gun of adieu sounded over the lagune, and Venice contained no soldier save her own, no law but the free behavior of her people, no flag of any designation."

No wonder that there was silence and a certain pride on either side. The Italian, as he watched the slowly receding form of the last of the Maladetti Tedeschi—the cursed Germans—could not help thinking that the day so long prayed for was not utterly cloudless, for though the Austrian was going, and Venice was again Italian only, it was not Italy which had expelled the intruder. After all, the patriotic enthusiasm, the popular uprising, the King leading, Garibaldi coming from Caprera, the peninsula trembling with sublime resolution, and the sympathetic world expectant, it was not Custozza nor Lissa—how those names sting!—it was Sadowa, a Bohemian battle, fought by Prussians and Austrians, which made Italy free. So thought some sad-souled Italian who had given the labor and enthusiasm of his life to the salvation of Italy, as he stood in the shadow and saw the Austrian sail away. And as he watched him waving his hand, and heard the one gun echoing over the water and through the silent city, the Italian knew also the Austrian's thought. He knew that there was a kind of triumph in the Austrian heart as its hand relaxed its hold of Venice. "I go," that waving hand receding seemed to say—"I go, but it is not you who force me. I go, but I baffled your last, most strenuous effort. By land at Custozza, by sea at Lissa, I humbled your armies and your fleets. I go, but I am master still. Farewell, foolish, hot, wayward child! It is a man, not you, who lifts my hand."

But the great burst of emotion that followed the departure of the ship must have been sublime. At first there was no sound. "The piazza—or square—the piazetta, the arcades, the housetops were filled with people. Twenty thousand stood there in silence like bewilderment. Not an oar broke the water, not a cry pealed on the land, no bell sounded, no jeer, nor laugh, nor tread of feet shook the solemn vacant pause. Suddenly, like the flash of a spectrum, a tri-color flag ran up to the peak of the campanile—the church tower. A group of men-of-war mounted the harbor light-house. Their port-holes grew white and thunderous. A field-piece in the Piazza answered them back. Those resonances broke the stupor of the people. With a shout like the falling of the city, they fell into each other's arms."

Then every expression of joy and liberty burst out every where. The city was festooned and tapestried with the flag, and under its gracious folds every sign of the late tyranny vanished. The Austrian spy and cannon disappeared. The passport office fell. The railway time-tables gained in time and diminished the rates of fare, and custom-house and passport stoppages were abolished. Palaces and galleries, the secluded homes of art and learning, were opened wide. The Post-office became honest, and letter and newspaper were delivered unread by Jesuit Austrian eyes. On all sides shone the photographic faces of Italians whom Italy has loved and cherished with a secret worship: Manin or Mazzini, Avezzana or Saffi, and the idolized red shirt, the beloved Garibaldi.

"Have you the picture of Joseph Mazzini?" inquired the correspondent of the Tribune, to whom we owe the warm and living picture of the scene, to a dealer on the Piazza.

"Oh yes, Signore! but old as '49 when he was among us. You love him?"

"Quite! How much is it?"

"Nothing, Signore—absolutely nothing. It pays me to have a stranger wish him—addio!"

And in the midst came the Italian army in barges down the Grand Canal. The bands played triumphal music. The sides of the Canal rang with shouts of welcome. Every grim old palace smiled with gay draperies, and from every balcony flowers were showered upon the soldiers. At the Palace Giustiniani the American Consul unrolled the flag of the Union. Cialdini, bravest and best of Italian Generals, arose and removed his hat to it. His staff followed, and every regiment as it passed lustily cheered the Stars and Stripes. Arrived at the Piazza San Marco the soldiers were removed, and, stepping from the line, were heartily embraced by the people. "The only person," says our authority, "I saw untouched by this beautiful reunion was an Englishman, who said: 'Oh! yas! yas! I da' say! but the city will sadly miss its Austrian customers, you know.'"

But a wise correspondent writes from Florence that he congratulates Italy upon her defeats at Custozza and Lissa. "Victories on the battle-field," he says, "might have inebriated the nation and carried her into the path of military monarchies. Imperialism of the French stamp has now become impossible." These defeats and the failures of General La Marmora and of Admiral Persano "have fortified freedom and constitutional life in the Peninsula, and, smiting national vanity, turned public attention to all that is rotten in Italy. Now that she has succeeded in revindicating her frontiers, she must look to her regeneration by education and honest work."—Wiser words could not be written. The Austrian is gone, let Italy take care that ignorance and vice follow him.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Literary Notices.

Personal Recollections of Distinguished Generals, by WILLIAM F. G. SHANKS. The writer is one of the ablest, and perhaps—taking into account the quantity as well as quality of his contributions—the very ablest of the "Army Correspondents" developed by our late war. Posted successively with the armies of the West and the East, at some of the most decisive periods of the great campaigns, few men had as many opportunities of studying the personal characteristics of the prominent commanders, and of forming an opinion of their military capacities. He certainly formed positive opinions, and has been nowise chary in expressing them in very positive form. While being as far removed as possible from a hero-worshiper, we do not find in his sketches any persistent purpose of belittling those whom history will pronounce to be great men. Yet, while claiming that he has written "with the firm belief that historical truth should only be less sacred than religious truth," he admits that there "has been some gall in his ink." We think that we may detect traces of this gall in the paper upon Sherman. It would be curious to inquire how far this admixture is to be accounted for by the rather cavalier manner in which the present Lieutenant-General was wont to act toward newspaper correspondents. In describing Sherman Mr. Shanks almost uniformly balances his laudatory phrases by a "but," a "yet," or a "though." Of our generals he is the most original, though not the most powerful; the most brilliant, though not the most reliable; the quickest, but not the safest; his "character has many virtues and beauties, but also many glaring defects and faults," and so on. In selecting for illustration the points to be presented, Mr. Shanks seems to us to have had a keener eye for faults than for merits. While we can not pronounce the portraiture to be absolutely untrue, we think it will not be accepted as altogether faithful. Certainly history will not sanction the sweeping assertions of Mr. Shanks that Sherman "never won a battle," and that "all his battles were defeats;" although it may write down that his fame will rest upon his great "Strategic Marches." If we take the word "marches" in its widest sense, including therein all the complex series of operations required to transport a great army from one point to another far distant, and premising that these marches were not mere raids, but movements made for a definite purpose, which, if accomplished, would give shape to a campaign, we may consider that it fairly expresses the peculiar merits of Sherman as a general; that is, he is, as Mr. Shanks correctly denominates him, a great "strategist," rather than a great "tactician." He could, better than any other general, place an army, and maintain it, in the very place where it was wanted. Now, as it happens, this very faculty of "marching" was the very point in which our armies were mainly deficient during the first two years of the war. The Confederates outfought us nowhere; they outmarched us every where. Hence came the disastrous results of McClellan's campaign on the Peninsula; of Pope's campaign in Virginia. Hence came the indecisive result of what should have been the crowning victory of Antietam. Hence really arose the disasters of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, and the inadequate issues which followed Gettysburg. When, therefore, Sherman demonstrated that the Union soldiers could not only fight as bravely, but march as rapidly as those of the Confederacy, the ultimate issue of the struggle ceased to be a matter of doubt; it became one only of time. Hence, when Mr. Shanks designates Sherman as the "Strategist," he accords to him a place than which no general could have a higher, unless, indeed, it were the very highest, which should combine both "strategy" and "tactics." Acknowledging Sherman to be our great strategist, Mr. Shanks, and we think justly, considers Thomas to be the "tactician" of the army; while to Grant, with equal justice, he awards the merit of combining both qualities, and therefore of being the "superior of both"—we would rather say of either—Sherman or Thomas. We consider that Mr. Shanks is quite right in making these three men—Grant, Sherman, and Thomas—the leading figures in his "Recollections." It is useless now to attempt to portion out between them the exact share of credit due to each. They, we are sure, would be the last men to attempt to make any such apportionment. There is glory enough for all. It is enough to say that in all military history there is no recorded instance in which any commanding general ever received such true support as Grant received from Sherman and Thomas, or in which that support was so freely acknowledged. That General Meade appears only incidentally in this work is to be accounted for by the fact that the author was not detailed to the army while under the command of that admirable general. How worthily he will appear in a complete history of the war is shown by the campaign of Gettysburg, and in Grant's noble tribute to his services during the closing scenes of the struggle. Sheridan, Hooker, and Rousseau occupy prominent places in this work, and barring some personal details, perhaps not out of place in a series of "Personal Recollections," but which the grave historian of events will discard as trivial, the chapters give a fair idea of the men. Besides the great figures there are, moreover, sketches, more or less elaborate, of fully a hundred other officers of our army. Of the Confederate generals, Mr. Shanks, justly, we think, accords the highest place, in point of ability, to Joseph E. Johnston. That accomplished commander never, indeed, had a fair chance, after his recovery from his wound at Fair Oaks. He had incurred the bitter personal enmity of Judah Benjamin, and consequently of Jefferson Davis. How this happened is narrated by Mr. Henry S. Foote, in his noteworthy work, to which we have heretofore referred. We assume the statement of course to be correct; but whether it be so or not, the fact is certain that Johnston was never thereafter employed by Davis except under compulsion, and then only in the vain endeavor to repair some of the blunders committed by Pemberton, Hood, or some other favorite of the Confederate President and his incapable Secretary of War. Taken all in all, Mr. Shanks's volume is one of the few really notable works for which the war has as yet given occasion. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

The Authorship of Shakspeare, by NATHANIEL HOLMES.—Mr. Holmes takes up the idea advanced by poor Delia Bacon, that the dramas which the world knows as the "Plays of William Shakespeare" were not written by a certain actor of that name, born at Stratford-upon-Avon in 1564, and dying at

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the same place in 1616. He, however, discards the supposition of that unfortunate lady that these immortal works were produced by a club made up of the wits and geniuses of the time, and endeavors to show that they were the production of Francis Bacon, better known to the world by his simple baptismal names than by his titles, "Baron of Verulam" and "Viscount St. Albans." Now that the player was the author of these dramas is as well fixed as any fact of literary history; and the claim can be set aside only by evidence amounting to demonstration. Mr. Holmes certainly argues the case with great ingenuity, but we imagine that his plea will not carry the verdict of the jury. The plea rests upon several special points: (1.) The author of these plays was a man of the most profound genius. This will be granted on all hands.—(2.) That he was thoroughly versed in all the learning of his day, whether in the departments of Languages, Natural Science, Philosophy, Law, or Medicine. This we think is not shown; we see nothing in the plays, in these respects, which would have been beyond the reach of any well-informed man.—(3.) That Shakspeare, the actor, was not, and could not have been possessed of this knowledge. This is not proven, and can not now be proven, for the records of the man are singularly imperfect upon the very points in question.—(4.) That Bacon had all the scientific knowledge required for the production of these dramas. This will be granted without question.—(5.) That Bacon had, beyond these qualifications, the far higher one of the poetic power which would have enabled him to create a Hamlet or a Lear, a Macbeth or an Iago, a Shylock or an Othello, an Ariel or a Caliban, a Portia, a Desdemona, a Juliet, an Ophelia, a Miranda, or a Beatrice. Not the slightest evidence of any such creative power is contained in any thing existing in what are known to be the works of Bacon. Granting all that can be claimed for his great genius, as shown in his great works, we see nothing to indicate that he could have imagined Hamlet any more than he could have painted the Transfiguration; that he could have created Macbeth any more than he could have composed the Messiah; that he could have moulded Juliet any more than he could have modeled the Parthenon; that he could have dreamed Ariel any more than he could have won Austerlitz. That he wrote sonnets in his youth is wholly beside the question; for there was not probably a man about the court of the Maiden Queen who had not done this. But even if all these points had been proved, instead of being merely alleged, it would only go to show that Bacon might by possibility have written the plays which we call those of Shakspeare. So, possibly, might Bunyan or Coleridge, had they not been extant before their day. Granting, for sake of argument, that Bacon might have produced these plays, Mr. Holmes, with all his ingenuity, has not found the slightest evidence to show that he did so; nor has he been able to adduce a plausible reason why, having done so, he should have given them to the world without reclamation under the name of this shrewd actor, instead of having claimed them as his own, at least after they had become famous. Ingenious as Mr. Holmes's essay is, he has not succeeded in reducing "our Shakspeare" to the shadow of a name. (Published by Hurd and Houghton.)

Morning by Morning, by C. H. SPURGEON. This volume consists of meditations upon striking and suggestive passages of Scripture. There is one for each day of the year, and the whole is intended as a series of daily readings for the family or the closet. These meditations, or "improvements," as sermonizers would style them, are brief, each occupying a single page. They are marked by a tender devotional feeling, and will commend themselves to Christians of every denomination. In this volume, quite as much as in his published sermons, we can discover the secret of the strong hold which Mr. Spurgeon has gained upon the heart of the religious world. (Published by Sheldon and Company.)

Principia Latina: Part II., by WILLIAM SMITH and HENRY DRISLER. This is simply a Latin Reading Book, designed for those just commencing the study of the language, containing such matter only as will be within their comprehension, and therefore interesting to them, accompanied by a Vocabulary and all necessary Notes. It is a matter of congratulation that two scholars as capable as the English editor of "the Greek and Roman Antiquities" and the Professor of Latin in our own venerable Columbia College should have set themselves to the task of preparing a series of elementary text-books. It is not less gratifying that men so competent to decide have come to the conclusion that the usual modes of teaching the classical languages are radically defective. That such is the case the actual result abundantly shows. From the time when a boy begins, say at the age of ten, to learn the Latin Grammar, to the time when he graduates from college, there are fully ten years of school life, of which quite half will have been mainly devoted to Latin. In that time he ought to have become able not only to read any author, but to write and speak Latin with tolerable facility. He will do this in French or German, and there is no reason why he should not do it in Latin or Greek. But the fact is, that not one graduate in five can read with any tolerable facility ten pages of Latin which have not formed part of his lessons; and not one in a score can write a paragraph of tolerable Latin, or converse for five minutes in that language. The reason of this is clearly stated by Dr. Smith, and by Professor Pillans, of the University of Edinburgh, whose admirable Essay is prefixed to this work. The extant works of Roman authors were written wholly for men. We presume that there were Roman Abbotts and Willsons. We do not suppose that Latian boys and girls of ten were expected to take pleasure in reading Livy and Tacitus, Cicero and Sallust, Virgil and Horace, any more than American children are supposed to delight in Burke's Orations, Milton's Areopagitica, Webster's Speeches, and the Federalist. "If we wish," says Dr. Smith, "boys to read Latin with facility, we must provide them with the right kind of books. The language must be easy, and the subjects suited to their capacity. It would be considered preposterous, in teaching boys of ten or twelve years of age the English language, to employ for the purpose Clarendon's 'History of the Rebellion' or Gibbon's 'Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire;' but yet a similar plan is adopted in teaching Latin," and the result is what we all know. This little text-book is a well-considered step in the right direction. We hope at some time to see the design carried still further, and to be able to give our grandsons, if not our sons, by way of Christmas present, a Latin Jack the Giant-Killer and Robinson Crusoe. We have no apprehension that when the time comes they will fail to take to the great works of the great Roman writers, any more than we fear that the lad who to-day is absorbed in the story of the castaway on Juan Fer-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

nandez and his man Friday, will not ten years hence be found poring over the pages of Motley and Bancroft, which to-day he would find wearisome enough. The idea is no new one. It was advanced more than two centuries ago by no less a man than "the Great Schoolmaster," John Milton. Meanwhile, in the name of the rising generation, we gratefully accept this little volume, and are glad to know that its accomplished editors have in preparation a "Principia Græca" on the same plan. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

An American Family in Germany, by J. Ross Browne.—Mr. Browne is no stranger to the readers of this Magazine. During more than a dozen years he has from time to time furnished transcripts from his experiences in many lands, telling his story sometimes in words, sometimes in pictures—often in both. The greater part of this volume, describing social and domestic life in Germany, has appeared in our pages. Interpolated, however, is a charming Christmas story setting forth the "Wonderful Adventures of Little Mitchie with the Old Sea King," which was or might have been told to the American children while resident in Germany. Appended, moreover, is an account of a "Whirl through Algeria," whither the author made one of his many flying trips. We need not say that Ross Browne is a most genial humorist. He has the faculty of seeing more in a rapid trip than most men see in months. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Beethoven's Letters, translated by Lady Wallace. Lovers of music, at all events, will be interested in this series of letters of the great Master. Better than any formal biography could do they set forth the character of the man, and the deep sadness and constant gloom which pervaded his life at almost every period—a gloom which was broken by hardly any thing except his absorbing devotion to Art. We can not anticipate that these volumes will be popular—they lie too far out of the sphere of common experience; but "they will speak to the initiated." (Published by Hurd and Houghton.)

Battle-Pieces, by Herman Melville.—Mr Melville has broken a long silence in a manner hardly to have been expected of the author of "Typee" and "Mardi." Among these poems are some—among them "The March to the Sea" and that upon "Stonewall Jackson, ascribed to a Virginian"—which will stand as among the most stirring lyrics of the war. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

The Great Rebellion: Its Secret History, Rise, Progress, and Disastrous Fall, by John Minor Botts.—Mr. Botts occupies a place almost solitary among Southern men. There is scarcely another person who had occupied any prominent position who remained in the Confederacy through the war and was known and recognized as a Union man. The history of the book is somewhat singular, and explains the form in which it is cast. In 1861 the French Consul at Richmond applied to a friend to furnish him with information upon the question of secession and the rebellion. This gentleman asked Mr. Botts to give the required information. He complied with the request; and a long letter, or rather disquisition, addressed to the Consul, was the result. This letter forms the ground-work of the present volume. Some months later it was rumored that Mr. Botts was engaged in writing the Secret History of the Rebellion. The Confederate authorities endeavored to seize the manuscript, but Mr. Botts had put it in a place of safety. He was, however, arrested and thrown into prison, where he was detained for some time. Writing for the information of a foreigner, Mr. Botts, of course, found it necessary to tell many things of which the people of the United States are and were perfectly aware. Thus he ascribes the origin of the doctrine of Secession to the disappointed ambition of John C. Calhoun, whose aspirations for the Presidency were frustrated in 1832. Still there is much of information contained in this volume in relation to which the American public are even yet only partially instructed. Perhaps at the present moment the most interesting portion of the book is the scheme of reconstruction proposed by Mr. Botts. He objects to that proposed by the majority in Congress, mainly on the ground that the Constitutional Amendment will not receive the sanction of the number of State Legislatures requisite for its adoption; and that the accompanying Bills will not receive the sanction of the President. His plan, in brief, is that no person who was of the age of twenty-five at the time of the breaking out of the rebellion shall, within ten years, be eligible for any office, National or State, without first taking a solemn oath that he has not voluntarily taken up arms against the United States; has not held office under the Confederate States, or any State in rebellion; and has not in any way given aid or comfort to the rebellion. This enactment to be accompanied by an absolute remission of all penalties or forfeitures for acts committed by and under the authority of those in rebellion; and from all those of thirty and under who could not take the test oath should be required an oath recognizing the supreme authority of the Constitution and laws, "any State law, Constitution, ordinance, or convention to the contrary notwithstanding," and promising hereafter to "obey the laws and protect the flag of the country when lawfully called upon to do so." (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

The Sanctuary, by George Ward Nichols. The author of the "Story of the Great March" has wrought into a tale many of the incidents and observations gathered during his army life. While the historic element has considerable prominence, it is yet subordinated to the purpose of a story of the civil war, very much as in Scott's novels history is subordinated to the purposes of fiction, and events are the ground upon which are wrought the embroidery of fancy. The story is very decidedly good. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

To "Harper's Library of Select Novels," now including 291 works, the following are the most recent additions: Sir Brooke Fosbrooke, by Charles Lever.—Kissing the Rod, by Edmund Yates; a novel of very decided power.—The Race for Wealth, by Mrs. J. H. Riddell, author of "Maxwell Drewitt" and "Phemie Keller;" not inferior to either of those clever tales.—All in the Dark, by J. S. Le Fanu, whose "Uncle Silas" and "Guy Deverell" placed him high among the rising novelists of the day.—Madonna Mary, by Mrs. Oliphant, whose former excellent novels are an abundant guaranty for the quiet interest and graceful delineations of character to be found in this.

The Parlor Stage, by S. Annie Frost. This volume, if of no very high literary pretensions, will meet a growing social want. It contains about forty domestic dramas and charades, any of which can be represented by the members of a social circle, with no requirements in the way of dress, scenery, and properties which will not be found in any

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

well-appointed house. This collection will afford a source of much innocent home amusement. (Published by Dick and Fitzgerald.)

Photographic Views of Sherman's Campaigns, by GEORGE N. BARNARD. Photography has done much to illustrate the details of our civil war. We have before had occasion to speak of Mr. Brady's immense collection of views. These relate largely, though by no means exclusively, to affairs at the East. Mr. Barnard, whose field was mainly the West, has collected into one magnificent volume some threescore imperial photographs of the most important scenes made memorable in Sherman's Campaigns. The subjects are admirably chosen, both in respect to the picturesqueness of the scenes and their historical importance, and the execution of the photographs has reached the highest capacity of the art.

Fairy Tales of All Nations. By EDOUARD LABOULAYE; translated by MARY L. BOOTH. It needs a man or woman to write for children. M. Edouard Laboulaye, Member of the Institute of France, whose brilliant work, "Paris in America," has made his name a household word on this side of the Atlantic, has for many years scattered through various French books and journals a succession of Fairy Tales. Miss Booth, perhaps the best translator of the day, whose rendition into our language of Henri Martin's History of France will take rank among our historical classics, has, with the special assent of the author, selected and translated a dozen of the most striking of these tales. The range of subjects is wide, and all are excellent. A sample of the quality is to be found in "Yvon and Finette," reproduced in an earlier portion of this Number of the Magazine. The longest and most ambitious of these tales is Oriental in scene and character; the title being, "Abdallah, or the Four-Leaved Clover; an Arabian Tale." One might well fancy that it was a newly-discovered chapter from the Arabian Nights. If any one thinks the production of such a tale is a mere pastime, he should be undeceived by a sentence in a letter from the Author to the Translator. He says: "It cost me more than a year's study. There is not a detail in it that is not borrowed from some narrative of Eastern travel, and I read the Koran through twice (a wearisome task) in order to extract therefrom a morality that might put Christians to the blush, though practiced by Arabs."—Taken all in all, we do not hesitate to pronounce this volume to be altogether the most charming collection of Fairy Stories which has appeared for a generation. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 1st of December. It is unusually brief, for the reason that the actual events of the month, apart from rumors and speculations as to the future, present little that requires to be placed upon permanent record.

THE ELECTIONS.

The general result of the recent elections demonstrates that a decided majority of the citizens of the Union, as it now exists, sanction the general scheme of policy set forth by the Republican majority in the present Congress, as opposed to that announced by the President and advocated by the late Philadelphia Convention. How far the decision has been influenced by the actions of the President during his recent tour may be a matter of question. But it is certain that upon the vital point of the choice of members of the next Congress the so-called "Radical" Republicans have fully retained their present overwhelming preponderance in Congress. The present probabilities are that the "Conservatives" will gain two or three Representatives, while the "Radicals" will gain as many Senators; but these changes will not affect the general issue. The "Radical Republicans" will have in both Houses more than the majority of two-thirds which is required to carry their measures over any veto by the President. The general result being thus certain, we do not here give the precise majorities in the different States upon local issues. Maryland and Delaware went "Conservative," every other State "Radical."—With the exception of New York the "Radical" majorities were very large upon local issues. In this State the general question was complicated by special interests. Mr. Fenton, the Republican candidate for Governor, in sanctioning a stringent law respecting the sale of liquor incurred the hostility of a very large class engaged in that business, especially in the large towns. The result was, that in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and their immediate environs, his Democratic opponent, Mr. Hoffman, had a majority of nearly 60,000, fully 10,000 more than had been anticipated. This, however, was more than counterbalanced by unexpected majorities for Mr. Fenton in the country, and the result was, that he was re-elected by a majority of about 14,000, the Republican majority on the remainder of the State ticket being somewhat larger. In the Congressional districts comprised within the cities of New York and Brooklyn the Democrats elected all their candidates, gaining here three members of Congress. Among the members chosen from New York is Mr. John Morrissey, known a few years ago as a professional pugilist, the "hero" of several prize-fights, and subsequently as the proprietor of several establishments usually denominated as "sporting." These Democratic gains were balanced by Republican gains in other districts, so that the representation in Congress, as far as the numbers of each party are concerned, remains unchanged, being 20 Republicans to 11 Democrats. The State Legislature, upon whom will devolve the choice of a Senator in Congress, is Republican in both Houses by about two to one. It was also decided, by a large majority, that a Convention shall be called for the purpose of revising the State Constitution.

THE CONGRESSIONAL SESSION.

The action of the present Congress at its last session having thus been indorsed by the popular vote of the country, there is no reason to suppose that it will recede from any of its requirements in regard to the States lately in secession. There is reason to presume, on the contrary, that more stringent measures will be proposed. Some members of the dominant party—notably among them Gen-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

eral B. F. Butler, elected member of Congress from Massachusetts — have suggested the impeachment of the President. The Message of the President, to be delivered within a few days, and the action of Congress thereupon, will probably furnish the key-note to our political history for the ensuing year.

THE AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Although a number of prominent Southerners have urged upon the lately seceding States the ratification of the Amendment to the Constitution proposed by Congress, every thing indicates that it will not be adopted by any one of these States. Probably the general tone of feeling at the South upon this point is fairly represented in the Message of Governor Worth of North Carolina. We give a resumé of what we judge to be the vital points of this Message: The overthrow, he says, of the Southern cause was complete; the people accepted the issue of the contest, and were willing to submit to the Constitution and laws of the United States. They expected to be restored to their position in the Union upon their acceptance of three essential stipulations: (1.) The renunciation of the doctrine of secession; (2.) The abolition of slavery; (3.) The repudiation of the Confederate war debt.— These terms were complied with; and the people of North Carolina elected representatives to Congress, every one of whom "had always opposed secession until the United States could no longer protect his person or property." Congress had, indeed, prescribed a test-oath requiring every member to swear that he had not voluntarily aided the rebellion; few citizens of the State could take this oath, and the repeal of its requirement was anticipated. Having premised that the South as a whole, and his own State in particular, had complied with what were supposed to be the conditions of "a restoration of their constitutional relations with the American Union," for which they were "sincerely desirous," the Governor proceeds to discuss the proposed 14th Amendment to the Constitution. To some of the provisions therein embodied he thinks "there would probably be no objection;" but to others, or to "the heterogeneous whole," he hopes "the State will never give her consent." The main objection, as formally stated, is to the Fifth Section, which renders ineligible to office all persons who, having taken an oath to support the Constitution, had thereafter aided the rebellion. This provision, as he shows in detail, would exclude from office "the great body of the intelligence of the State." As to the Fourth Section, the really vital one, which regulates the basis of representation, the language of the Governor appears studiously ambiguous. The African race, as a body, he says "can not now participate in governmental affairs with any discretion;" but "a few of them are discreet and virtuous, and have considerable intelligence;" and when the State shall become free to manage her own affairs, he does not doubt that "the question as to what share ought to be granted them in the elective franchise will be candidly considered." The Governor suggests that "the cause of the trouble is the unequal distribution of the African race between the sections; the plain and practical remedy is their more equal distribution." "The people of the South do not regard the negro as their equal;" those of the North consider him as an equal, and "in one of the States the people have given a substantial earnest of the principles they profess by electing two Africans as members of their State Legislature." He therefore suggests that, as the negroes are mostly too poor to pay the expenses of emigrating to the North, "a portion of the appropriation made to sustain the Freedmen's Bureau should be diverted to defraying the traveling expenses of those who may choose to move, allowing each one to choose the State or Territory to which he would go." We assume that the Governor is serious in this proposition, for he asks the Legislature to "propose this plan of national reconciliation to the Congress of the United States."

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

From Mexico the current of intelligence indicates that the Emperor Maximilian will return to Europe simultaneously with the withdrawal of the French army, the commencement of which is supposed to be at hand, although a little later than was expected. Meanwhile Judge Campbell, of Ohio, and Lieutenant-General Sherman have been sent to Mexico by our Government upon a special mission. The object of this mission, and the instructions under which it is to act, have not been made public.

EUROPE.

From the Continent the telegraph brings an abundance of rumors, but few facts. The most notable rumor is that Russia has entered into a strict alliance with Prussia, instead of one with Austria, which seemed more probable.

From Great Britain the intelligence which most concerns us is that negotiations have been reopened in regard to our claims for indemnity for the damages inflicted upon our commerce by the Alabama. —If we may judge from telegraphic messages which have the appearance of having been subject to government surveillance, grave apprehensions are entertained of a formidable Fenian uprising in Ireland. The actual intelligence transmitted up to this date is, however, only to the effect that large additions have been made to the British naval and military force in Ireland.

Editor's Drawer.

A FRIEND in Pennsylvania sends the four following:

Evan Evans is a bright little Welshman in one of the Welsh settlements of Pennsylvania. He is very fond of playing the harp, but complains greatly that he can not improve for the want of proper instruction. A waggish Yankee consequently advised him to subscribe for Harper's Magazine, which he did at once, supposing it to be a publication intended specially for harpers. Meeting Evan some time ago we asked him how he liked his Magazine, when he replied: "Tat Yankee is a great rogue; but ta Harper is a vera goot book."

SQUIRE L—— was an elder of the church in H——. He was a very pious man, but was fond of using words of which he did not fully comprehend the meaning. In this respect he would have

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google made an excellent companion for Mrs. Partington. One day his pastor complimented him on his social qualities, when he replied: "Yes, my dear pastor, I have always enjoyed a good social crim. con." He meant confab.

A MINISTER in Maryland was called to the door one bitter cold night in January, by a young man who asked him to perform the marriage service.

"Certainly," said the minister. "When do you require my services?"

"Immediately," was the reply.

"But where is the bride?" inquired the astonished pastor.

"Why," said the groom, "Sal was so bashful she hid herself behind the wood-pile till I had asked you to tie the knot. Come out, Sal!"

Being thus admonished the blushing bride came forth from her place of concealment, followed her affianced into the parsonage, and the loving pair were soon made happy.

THE Rev. Dr. B—— once asked a boy, with reference to the blessed Trinity, "How many persons are there?" As the boy was noted for stupidity the Doctor was delightfully surprised to be correctly answered—"Three." Now it so happened that three prominent members of the church, bearing the family name of Person, lived in close proximity to the church, and to them the boy supposed the Doctor referred. Imagine, then, the Doctor's horror when he asked, "What are their names?" and received the reply, "Jake, Henry, and Mike!"

THEY sometimes have curious decisions out West, as the following note from that region will show:

Having been a reader of the Drawer for a good many years, we feel indebted to it in the following, which we do not remember to have seen in print:

In the early organization of the Indiana courts of justice we had a President Judge and two associates of the Circuit Court, any two of whom would constitute a quorum, to dispense justice — or dispense with it, as the case might be; which duty occasionally devolved upon the worthy associates, as was the case during a session of the W—— Circuit Court not a hundred miles from the Wabash, when a motion to dismiss a suit brought up on appeal from a magistrate was pending. At the close of the argument, the two bowers not being fully advised in the premises, fortified their own opinion by getting that of Mr. W——, a prominent member of the bar and not in the case, who advised them to throw it out. Thereupon Judge —— announced that "the Court, having fully considered the motion, had concluded to throw the case out of court;" and, suiting the action to the word, gathered up the papers in the cause and pitched them out the window!

IT was in the same circuit, but in another county, that Associate-Justices W—— and P——, holding the court in the absence of the President Judge, heard an elaborate argument on a motion for a new trial in a case where an individual had some difficulty with the State, and which, on the trial, had resulted in the individual's being victimized by a jury too scrupulous about the sanctity of personal property. Mr. Justice W—— being aware of an educational deficiency, but somewhat of a wag withal, shifted the responsibility of delivering the ruling of the Court on his associate, who, laboring under a like deficiency, but not aware of it, gravely announced that "the Court, having considered the case in all its bearings, thinks it best to give our fellow-critter another chance to get clear, and therefore grant him a new trial."

OLD Judge —— was sitting in a drug-store in a little town in Kentucky when Burnside's army were passing through for East Tennessee. From the candies kept in the window to amuse the children a soldier naturally mistook the shop for a confectionery, and putting in his head, he asked, hurriedly: "Any pies in here?" The Judge immediately roared out: "No pies, but plenty of pizen!"

COLONEL L——, the Sheriff of a northern county in Virginia, one fine morning was sitting on a low horse-block, in front of a drug-store, discussing the state of the world and the rest of mankind. To add to his dignity he wore a long alpaca coat, and had some apples in a pocket which hung out behind his seat. He did not perceive an old sow who quietly approached, until a peculiarly satisfied grunt aroused him. Turning suddenly, he hallooed, "G'out!" but too late, for the sow had obtained possession and held on, the coat giving way some distance up the back, and away went the sow with her plunder, leaving the Colonel to walk home in his roundabout amidst the laughter of the spectators.

DEAR DRAWER,—A friend, while passing through Vicksburg a few days since, was struck by a sign in front of an auction-store. As he was not very badly hurt he stopped and copied said sign verbatim. Here it is:

WAGGIN FUR SAIL
CHEEP FUR KASH.

THE following is from a Northern Vermont School: As the class in Philosophy was reciting here a few days ago, the question, "Where is the labyrinth of the ear situated?" was given to one of the scholars. The boy did not know. "The next?" said the teacher. "The next" answered up quicker than he ever was known to before: "In the windpipe!" School closed for that day.

NOT a hundred miles from Philadelphia lived, a few years ago, a couple of old farmers; they were brothers and bachelors, and both of them had filled out their threescore and ten years on their ancestral farm; they, moreover, belonged to the Society of Friends. The old gentlemen one fall became suspicious that some one was helping themselves from their corn-crib without consent of the owners—and, oddly enough, each, without consulting the other, resolved to watch in person on a certain night, without informing any one of it, and try to catch the thief. Accordingly, about nine in the evening, Joshua, the elder, passed out of the back-door and wended his way to the corn-crib, which he entered, and, closing the door, seated himself on an inverted basket to await developments. Shortly after Joshua left the room John, who had been dozing behind the stove, awoke and bethought him of the rifled corn-crib and his design to watch it, and proceeded leisurely out of the front-door. He had been gone but a few moments when the family within-doors were startled by the most unearthly yells and shouts, and the cries of, "I have got him! yes, I have got him! Help! quick, before he gets away!"

The nephew, albeit somewhat alarmed, rushed

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google valiantly to the rescue, to find his two ancient uncles prostrate on the floor of the corn-crib, each holding desperately to the other, and shouting lustily for help to secure the thief he had caught.

The old gentlemen's chagrin can be better imagined than described when they learned the truth; and the subject of stolen corn had to be thereafter carefully avoided in their presence.

A RHODE ISLANDER says: The Drawer being the centre of gravitation for all good things said and done, I beg to contribute the following:

A short time ago I employed a "son of Erin" who was "just over," and who boasted of his experience in all kinds of farm-work. One day I directed Mike to take the cart and oxen and remove a pile of rubbish. Happening near the place where it was to be deposited as Mike drove up with his load, I discovered he was in a state of great perplexity, evidently ignorant of the process of dumping. After studying some minutes, a bright idea seemed to strike him. Seizing his whip, and taking his stand in front of and facing the oxen, he roared out, throwing up both arms at the same time: "Rare up noo, ye bastes! rare up, wull yez!"

DEAR DRAWER,—We have in Leavenworth an old Frenchman, Monsieur T——, who has been long enough in this country to imagine that he speaks English very fluently. Occasionally, while sipping our evening glass of lager at his saloon, he entertains us with some of his first experiences in America. On one occasion he got off the following:

"En France I was ver mootch like to hunt, so ven I arrivéé en New York I take ze gun half douzaine mile in ze country; I see one ver fine what you call him gentleman goose? Gandare, eh? I ask one leetle boy, 'Ees zat gandare wild?' He say, 'Certainment.' Den I fire ze gun and shoot ze gandare; ze farmare run out hees house ver mad, and ze leetle boy say to me, 'Old cock, your goose ees cooked!' I say, 'Oh no, my young fren, voila, he frappé her wings!' Den ze leetle boy laff ver mootch. I pay ze farmare for hees gandare, and ven I come back in New York I speak ze story to my fren Americaine. He laff ver mootch too, and say, 'Bully for ze leetle boy!'"

THE following experience of the General Superintendent of the Michigan Central Railroad is related by that gentleman:

Mr. R. N. Rice, the aforesaid General Superintendent, had occasion to cross Detroit River to Windsor, in her Majesty's dominions, at the time serious competition had reduced the fare upon the ferry lines to the small sum of three cents. When the collector (who was also captain and mate) came around to gather up the fares the three cents were tendered by Mr. Rice, but the fare was declined by the collector, with the remark: "No matter about your fare, Sir, as I am going to Chicago in a few days, and it is quite proper that we people in the business of carrying passengers should extend courtesies to each other!" Inasmuch as the fare to Chicago was eight dollars and a half, our friend, the Superintendent of the Central Road, failed "to see it," and rather insisted on disbursing his ferry fare.

DEAR DRAWER,—Youngsters sometimes do very funny things when they are too young to say them. We have one, responding to the sobriquet of Paddy, a two-year-old, scarcely able to waddle as yet, who has a strong partiality for butter, and always bothers his mother by sticking his fingers in it and stealing it whenever the opportunity offers. One day, after handling some, and giving "Paddy" all she thought he ought to have, she placed the plate in the middle of the table, where he could not reach it, and left the room. Thinking he was unusually quiet, she came back to see what the youngster was about, when there stood "Paddy" with a long, crooked stick, which he would run into the lump and then lick the butter off it, to repeat the operation again!—This calls to mind the rats who, finding a jar of oil, managed to get the delicacy by dipping their tails into the jar in turn, and then presenting them to each other to lick. Was child or rat more ingenious?

WASHINGTON, though notorious for its depravity, none the less boasts of quite a number of Temperance Lodges. One of these, that of the Good Templars, not long since was presided over by a Worthy Chief named B——, who, though his character for temperance and sobriety was unquestionable, was suspected by some of possessing somewhat more than his share of self-esteem. It was his especial delight, when giving the instructions to the candidates undergoing initiation, to enlarge materially from his own vocabulary upon the text of the Manual, thereby protracting the ceremony, tedious at the briefest, to a great length, much to the annoyance of the members. He had a way of closing his lips, at the end of any important remark, in a manner indicative of the greatest degree of firmness and self-satisfaction. He was, moreover, not always sure of his word, and occasionally delivered himself of a genuine bull. On one occasion, after an unusually tedious ceremony, when at the close our Worthy was endeavoring to impress upon the novices the importance of the signs, grips, and passwords, he wound up with the following emphatic and triumphant utterance, which he accompanied with a look of supreme wisdom and rather more than the usual compression of the lips: "By these we are enabled effectually to keep outsiders in and insiders out!" The suppressed titter that was audible in different parts of the room was powerless to convey a hint; and to this day B—— congratulates himself upon the happy manner in which he acquitted himself while Worthy Chief of the Good Templars.

DEAR DRAWER,—My sweet "sprig of geranium" has a fashion, when speaking of her beaux during their absence, of styling them "my swains." Her pa heard her speak thus. I went to see Jennie one evening, and was met at the door by the "old man." After the customary "How do you do?" and comment on weather, he blurted out, "I suppose you want to see Jennie?" I nodded affirmatively. He then called her; and from up stairs, over the balusters, sweetest accents replied, "What do you want, pa?" "Come down at once, daughter, here's one of your swine!" Imagine my sensations amidst her ringing laughter after the old boy's exit!

AT a Contraband Sabbath-school, as it is somewhat amusingly termed, conducted by some Presbyterian brethren of Northern proclivities, and located on the sacred soil in Alexandria, Virginia, one of the gentlemen, addressing the children, drew a parallel between the gnarled and knotty condition of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google some trees in the forest compared with their straight and symmetrical neighbors, and the depraved and vicious state of some persons in society. After descanting upon the various causes which impede the growth of timber—as storms, browsing cows, etc., and comparing them to the vicious habits of early years as affecting the character of the adult, he appealed to the school: How is it that we do not find all the trees of the forest straight, beautiful, and symmetrical? An attentive, saddle-colored urchin, who had a little more human nature than Catechism, sang out, "Because God didn't want them all one way!"

The youngster did not realize that he was quoting Pope, and hitting the dogmatic theology of his friend between the eyes.

A FEW evenings since my little Harold, whose ideas of waxing are confined to waxing-string or cord for his dog-harness or peg-top, hearing the text, "And the child waxed strong," asked: "Father, how did they wax him?" A perfectly legitimate question from his point of view.

AN inhabitant of Green Bay, Wisconsin, contributes this:

We have a young man here who is very proud of his native land, and boasts a great deal of Holland, every thing there being on a much grander scale than any thing America ever produced—such as men, buildings, etc. One day, in the course of conversation, the heathen deity Bacchus's name was mentioned, when some one in the company asked who Bacchus was? L—— spoke up: "Why, John, don't you know who Bacchus was? You are a great fellow! He was the man that invented Holland gin. I've seen his picture lots of times in the Old Country!"

DEAR DRAWER,—In a crowd, where it was almost impossible to keep the toes of our boots off the shortest trails flaunted from hoop-skirts ahead, we were pressing our way toward our ferry-boat. At one side marched a "high private," whose face and gait were slightly influenced by something stronger than water. The poor fellow did his best to avoid about a quarter of a yard of silk hailing from a fairy form just ahead. His best was not good enough, and down came the heavy military boot upon the silk. The face that turned did not smile, and the voice was not extremely mild that chided him with, "Take care, Sir!" "'Close [clothes] up in the rear there!' were our orders, marm, always. Them's military orders." The fair face more than smiled, and the worrying crowd joined her laugh with a hearty roar.

MR. P—— and family were boarding for the summer in the country with a farmer who was rather close in the matter of providing for the table. In the course of the summer Mrs. P—— fell sick, and her loving spouse thought that chicken broth would be the thing for her. So down he went to the landlord, and asked that chickens might be slain and the broth provided. The landlord was very sorry, but hadn't got a darned chick. P—— said nothing, but returned to his room, took down his fowling-piece, and sallied forth in quest of game. His route led him behind the landlord's barn, where, to his surprise, he espied quite a lot of spring chickens, evidently in good condition. Without waiting for wilder game P—— raised his gun and fired. Three fine pullets lay weltering in their gore when the smoke cleared away. P—— gathered them up, brought them in to the landlord, and ordered broth made from them for his wife. The countenance of the landlord grew dark, and he rudely charged P—— with killing his chickens. "Your chickens!" said P——, "you never were more mistaken in your life. I know you're a man of your word, and you told me not an hour ago that you hadn't a chicken about the place!" The landlord collapsed, and Mrs. P—— got better on chicken broth.

A SICK man was telling his symptoms—which appeared to himself, of course, dreadful—to a medical friend, who, at each new item of the disorder, exclaimed, "Charming! delightful! Pray go on!" and, when he had finished, the doctor said, with the utmost pleasure, "Do you know, my dear Sir, you have got a complaint which has been for some time supposed to be extinct?"

AT a school in New England all the children were expected to kneel down at morning prayers. The consequences of this posture to the nether garments of the uneasy youngsters were in some cases serious. One little girl, whose mother had frequently reproved her for her carelessness in tearing her pantalets, was determined to initiate a reform. So, when all kneeled the next morning, she persistently sat still. The teacher waited; she did not move. The teacher rapped; the girl remained fixed. Then the teacher waxed wroth: "Sarah, kneel down!" was her demand. "I can't do it," was the reply; "for ma said she should punish me if I tore any more holes in the knees of my pantalets!" They prayed standing in that school thenceforth.

PAT, a raw "son of Erin," at dinner one Friday was urged by some of his fellow-servants to eat some beef-soup. Pat declined, as he ate no meat on that day. "But," says one, "this is not meat, it is only soup." "Faix," says Pat, "yez might as well eat the devil as to drink his broth!"

SEVERAL years ago there lived a Frenchman in Northern Indiana named Curteau, who was an Indian trader, and at the annual payments he used to "stick" it to the Pottawatomie Indians in the most approved style, cheating them in every conceivable way. On the occasion of one of these payments he had a lot of needles which he sold to the Indians, charging them half a dollar for each needle. Some of them remonstrated, saying it was too much. Old Curteau said he knew it was, but it was probably the last they would ever get, as the "needle-maker was dead." It is hardly necessary to say that the balance of his needles went off like "hot cakes."

THE Drawer is relished in Colorado Territory, and one of its readers sends the two following:

In looking over the Drawer for October I am reminded of a circumstance that occurred some thirty-five years since in the city of B——.

There was an old gentleman by the name of Adam Luke, that kept a drug and paint store, and administered physic to his neighbors and their apprentice boys. The boys took a great dislike to the old man on account of the large doses of emetic given, and determined to be revenged on him. After consultation they agreed to change his sign, which read: "Adam Luke, Paints and Dye-Stuffs."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

By changing the L in Luke, P in Paints, and marking out Stuffs, they made it read: "Adam Pukes, Faints, and Dyes."

The next morning there was a great crowd in front of the door, laughing and yelling, and the old man went out in a hurry to see what was the matter. Being naturally of an irritable disposition, great was his wrath on beholding his beautiful sign so sadly changed. The apprentice boys were there, and yelled like demons.

The old man in his wrath determined the sign should come down, and running into the store, seized a crow-bar, and, from a second-story window, made a furious lunge at the sign. The bar slipped from his grasp and struck a large negro in the face, and felled him to the pavement. Luke (having also practiced surgery) had to come down and dress the negro's wounds, which only added to his anger.

In that same crowd there was a fussy little fellow that talked very loud, and said he'd like to see any one change his sign. He had a small swinging sign hung to his door-post, which read: "Wm. Jones, Whips and Canes." The boys noticed this chap and his threats, and the following night they painted under the "Whips and Canes" "his Wife." It read: "Wm. Jones Whips and Canes his Wife;" which, I believe, was not far from the truth. It is needless to say the sign was demolished the next morning by the said Jones, amidst the shouts of the crowd assembled.

The boys were there and enjoyed the fun.

We are sorry that so mean a man lives in Maine as the one illustrated below:

Dear Drawer,—As I was looking over your Drawer to-night I noticed a paragraph about meanness; and as you wanted to hear from any body that could beat it, I thought I would see what I could do. So here goes.

I lived with a man in the country a year, who, I think, is as mean a man as is out. No matter what his name is. He had twelve swarms of bees; their hives were full; and the honey was worth twenty-five cents a pound. As he and I were taking out some honey one day he observed: "If that honey didn't bring so much money in the market we would take out a little to eat in the house."

How is that?

If it won't do here is another:

As I was at work one day I found the old gentleman's wallet, with quite a large sum of money in it. I handed it to him directly. He opened and looked all through it, and asked: "How much have you taken out of it?" That is all the thanks I got.

One more, and I am done:

The old gentleman had an umbrella—a bad one at that. One day it was raining, and as it was all the one that the house afforded I took it, and went to a neighbor's for a few minutes. When I went back the old man said: "That is my umbrella; I bought it and paid for it with my own money, and there sha'n't nobody use it but myself."

Dear Drawer,—The Irish are noted, as you are aware, for their contradictory witticisms. If you can beat the following, from a comical domestic of ours, do so, and we shall readily yield the palm. An accident occurred in which catastrophe was involved an acquaintance. The announcement was made by her that "A young comarad" she knew "got kilt in a factory, but didn't die right away. They took him to the hospital, and there he died before he got well."

An officer of the "Old Army of the Potomac" relates the following:

While our army lay encamped near Falmouth, Virginia, during the winter of 1863, my negro boy, Bill, invested his entire fortune—fifty-five dollars—in a silver watch, with which he readily learned to tell the time, and of which he was very proud, and not at all backward in showing. After a few days I missed his watch, and on inquiring what he had done with it, received the following explanation: "De tam ting wouldn't stop ticking after taps; so I jus kick de guts out ob it. I tried for ten days to keep it quiet—sure I did, Massa."

A Southerner writes: The following served to create a laugh among a few favored passengers on the steamer Von Phul, on a late trip from Memphis, and is offered as a part of my debt due the Drawer for the many good stories I have read therein:

The steamer was lying at the bank taking on cotton; several of us had collected at the railing to watch the exertions of the deck-hands in rolling it on board, when one old gentleman, evidently inclined to be deep in his remarks, began with a dissertation on the various changes through which cotton would pass before it reached us again.

"We plant it," he said, "plow and hoe it, gin and bale it, and then ship to Europe, whence it is returned to us in the form of cloth of different kinds, and for which we pay exorbitant prices. This, gentlemen, is all wrong, and should be changed. All our cotton should be manufactured at home."

"What you say is perfectly true," remarked a quiet, good-natured looking man on his right. "The cotton passes through all the transformations you mention here, is sent to Europe, and is very often returned to us, with large prices attached, in the form of linen handkerchiefs."

Sometimes the sayings of colored folks will provoke laughter in spite of one's self. Last winter, during a revival in a negro congregation in Harmar, one of the members—an old and very earnest Christian woman—relating her experience and rejoicing in the fact that she was a Christian woman, said: "I would rather be a deck-hand on de ark ob de Lord dan be de Captin ob de Wild Wagoner." The Wild Wagoner was then the Wheeling and Cincinnati packet, and one of the finest vessels above the falls of the Ohio.

A resident in New Orleans sends the following:

While taking a stroll on the levee in this city a few days since my attention was called to one of the watchmen, who was amusing himself by abusing the Radicals and the Northern people generally, and finally wound up his harangue something after this fashion: "My grandfather fit in the Revolution for liberty, and got it, and handed it down to his ancestors, and I mean to do the same thing, and hand it down to mine."

On the day of the late election in Ohio Henry G——, a German, who lives in Harmar, stationed himself at the polls as challenger for the Democrats. Henry is the keeper of a small grocery, in the back-room of which is a short counter, and behind this

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google is a shelf, which contains sundry bottles and glasses, indicating that he keeps for sale a little of the "ardent." On the morning in question, when he arrived at the polls it was plainly evident that he had been patronizing his own bar. Some of the Republicans, conceiving the idea that they could have some sport at Henry's expense, induced an old negro to offer his ballot at the polls. Henry challenged, of course, but the negro insisted upon his right to vote.

"What for you wants to vote, eh?" demanded Henry.

"Because I'm more white dan black," replied the negro.

"More white dan black, eh? How ish dat?"

"Well," said the negro, who is as black as a coal, "my mother was a mulatter and my father was a Dutchman and a Democrat."

Henry wasn't troublesome after that.

A WRITER from Tennessee says: I shall make no apology for my first contribution to the Drawer. We have justices of the peace in Marion County the same as other States, and some of them are hard to beat in their decision of cases, as the following will show:

George P. N——, a minor of twenty years of age, after having served three years in the United States army as a private, came home to his father's house, and this year raised a crop. There happened to be a dispute between James, the father of George, and his son, whereupon George went out into the field where his father was at work and commenced pelting the old man with stones, so that he had to flee for his life. James, the father, went to one Harris, a justice of the peace, and got a warrant for George P., his son, charging him with assault and battery, with the intent to commit murder. In due time the sheriff had George before Squire Harris for trial. The usual question of Guilty or Not Guilty being put to the prisoner, he plead "Guilty, but that, being a minor under twenty-one years of age, he was not accountable for his acts, but his father, being his natural guardian, was reponsible for all his acts, civil and criminal." The Court held that this was an unanswerable argument; therefore James was taxed with the costs of the suit, and George P. was discharged. Can any of your squires beat that decision?

THE Drawer wishes all its Southern friends were as sensible and cheerful as the one who writes as follows:

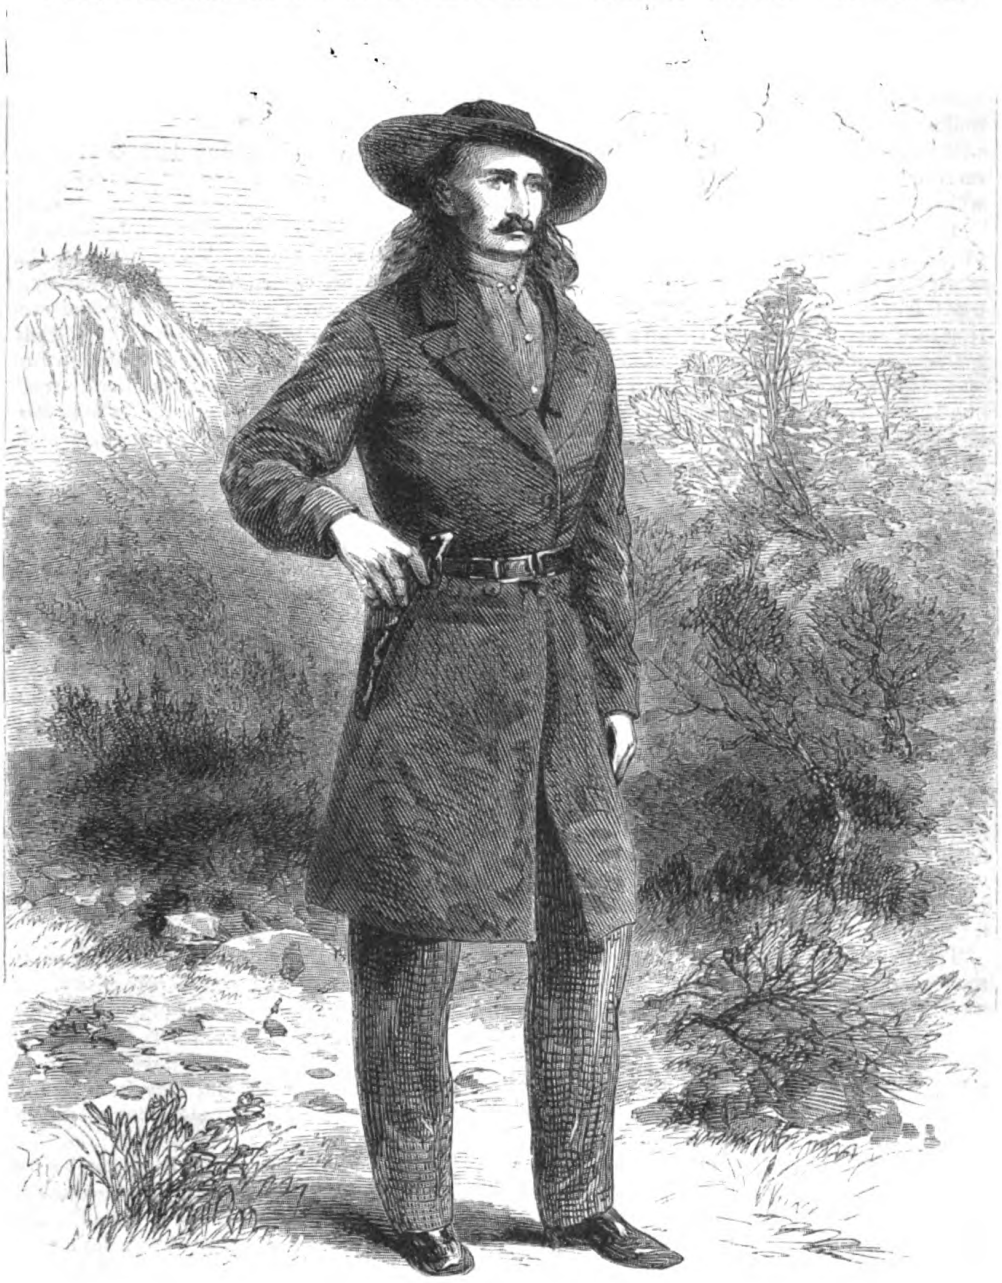
I have been entertained regularly every month since the close of the war with the good things you bring us; and instead of brooding over our "lost cause," discarding Northern literature, etc., as some of our press urge upon us, I rather feel it my duty to contribute to your stock of the "rich, rare, and racy."

We have in our community a family made rich by the war, and their sudden riches has caused them to be dubbed "Mushroom Aristocracy," an equivalent to your "Shoddy Aristocracy." Mrs. Mushroom is decidedly illiterate, and is fond of courting the favor of the "old families." At a gathering at her own house the other evening, a number of the literati being present, the conversation turned upon authors, when Mrs. M. remarked that "her favorite author is Ticknor Field! She believes she has all his works in her library!" It was painful to see the efforts of the company to keep their faces straight. One of the ladies, more composed than the rest, ventured to change the subject by making inquiries of Mrs. M. concerning her son, who has gone North to college. "Oh! L—— is so smart!" said she. "He has already entered the Refreshment Class!" She informed the company in the same breath that "L—— is also a musical progeny [prodigy]; he performed some beautiful ditties [duets] with his cousin Mary on the piano!" Just here a very awkward gentleman, becoming fidgety, attempted to tip his chair back and fell to the floor, affording an excellent opportunity for the company to relieve themselves by a hearty laugh. In the course of the evening Mrs. M. also remarked that "if the war had continued another year Mr. M. would have become a milliner [millionaire]!"

AN East Tennesseean furnishes the following hunting anecdote:

Several years ago old Judge J—— was familiarly known in this part of the country, both for his legal lore and utter ignorance of every thing else. He resided on the other side of the mountain, and used frequently to come over here to court. One Sunday afternoon, as he was leisurely riding across the mountain, bound for this place, to attend the July term of the Circuit Court, he saw a deer come into the road ahead of him, and lie down behind a log on the road-side. The Judge was a great lover of venison, but unfortunately had no arms wherewith to secure the fine buck that lay before him. Not to be outdone, however, he cautiously made a large circuit around the beast couchant, and came on to town. Court held five days, and on the morning of the sixth the Judge procured a gun, mounted his horse, and, with another member of the bar accompanying him, rode off toward the mountain. When within about a quarter of a mile of the aforesaid log the Judge ordered his companion to remain perfectly quiet while he, the Judge, gun in hand, crept slowly and stealthily toward the log behind which the deer had lain down a week before. After a long and tedious crawl he gained the log, and with the utmost silence and caution slowly raised up and looked over, drawling out, as he did so, in accents of mingled astonishment and disappointment, "By golly, he's gone!"

"A VETERAN" sends us a joke which occurred in that most doleful of places, Libby Prison:



In 1864 I was a prisoner in Libby, and was paroled in October of that year. While Ross, the chief clerk (who, by-the-by, was a fine little fellow, and always fond of a joke), was busy paroling the boys, a huge Michigander strolled up to have his name put down. Ross, looking up and seeing such a large specimen of humanity, asked him his height. "Six feet six," he replied. Ross then made the query, "How large do the boys grow in your country, old fellow?" "Wa'al, I don't know, boss; but our babies are a mighty sight bigger than you!" Ross subsided for that day.

A NEW YORKER writes: At the beginning of the war, when General M'Cormick was killed and brought to life again once a week, a boy came into our office from the next room requesting the loan of General M'Cormick for a few minutes. Subsequent inquiry proved that the Journal of Commerce was what was wanted, the similarity of sound having deceived the boy. The paper has not been since known in the office by any other name.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CCI.—FEBRUARY, 1867.—Vol. XXXIV.

WILD BILL.

SEVERAL months after the ending of the civil war I visited the city of Springfield in Southwest Missouri. Springfield is not a burgh of extensive dimensions, yet it is the largest in that part of the State, and all roads lead to it—which is one reason why it was the point d'ap-

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1867, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Digitized by Google

Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

pui, as well as the base of operations for all military movements during the war.

On a warm summer day I sat watching from the shadow of a broad awning the coming and going of the strange, half-civilized people who, from all the country round, make this a place for barter and trade. Men and women dressed in queer costumes; men with coats and trowsers made of skin, but so thickly covered with dirt and grease as to have defied the identity of the animal when walking in the flesh. Others wore homespun gear, which oftentimes appeared to have seen lengthy service. Many of those people were mounted on horse-back or mule-back, while others urged forward the unwilling cattle attached to creaking, heavily-laden wagons, their drivers snapping their long whips with a report like that of a pistol-shot.

In front of the shops which lined both sides of the main business street, and about the public square, were groups of men lolling against posts, lying upon the wooden sidewalks, or sitting in chairs. These men were temporary or permanent denizens of the city, and were lazily occupied in doing nothing. The most marked characteristic of the inhabitants seemed to be an indisposition to move, and their highest ambition to let their hair and beards grow.

Here and there upon the street the appearance of the army blue betokened the presence of a returned Union soldier, and the jaunty, confident air with which they carried themselves was all the more striking in its contrast with the indolence which appeared to belong to the place. The only indication of action was the inevitable revolver which every body, excepting, perhaps, the women, wore about their persons. When people moved in this lazy city they did so slowly and without method. No one seemed in haste. A huge hog wallowed in luxurious ease in a nice bed of mud on the other side of the way, giving vent to gentle grunts of satisfaction. On the platform at my feet lay a large wolf-dog literally asleep with one eye open. He, too, seemed contented to let the world wag idly on.

The loose, lazy spirit of the occasion finally took possession of me, and I sat and gazed and smoked, and it is possible that I might have fallen into a Rip Van Winkle sleep to have been aroused ten years hence by the cry, "Passengers for the flying machine to New York, all aboard!" when I and the drowsing city were roused into life by the clatter and crash of the hoofs of a horse which dashed furiously across the square and down the street. The rider sat perfectly erect, yet following with a grace of motion, seen only in the horsemen of the plains, the rise and fall of the galloping steed. There was only a moment to observe this, for they halted suddenly, while the rider springing to the ground approached the party which the noise had gathered near me.

"This yere is Wild Bill, Colonel," said Captain Honesty, an army officer addressing me. He continued:

"How are yer, Bill? This yere is Colonel N——, who wants ter know yer."

Let me at once describe the personal appearance of the famous Scout of the Plains, William Hitchcock, called "Wild Bill," who now advanced toward me, fixing his clear gray eyes on mine in a quick, interrogative way, as if to take "my measure."

The result seemed favorable, for he held forth a small, muscular hand in a frank, open manner. As I looked at him I thought his the handsomest physique I had ever seen. In its exquisite manly proportions it recalled the antique. It was a figure Ward would delight to model as a companion to his "Indian."

Bill stood six feet and an inch in his bright yellow moccasins. A deer-skin shirt, or frock it might be called, hung jauntily over his shoulders, and revealed a chest whose breadth and depth were remarkable. These lungs had had growth in some twenty years of the free air of the Rocky Mountains. His small, round waist was girthed by a belt which held two of Colt's navy revolvers. His legs sloped gradually from the compact thigh to the feet, which were small, and turned inward as he walked. There was a singular grace and dignity of carriage about that figure which would have called your attention meet it where you would. The head which crowned it was now covered by a large sombrero, underneath which there shone out a quiet, manly face; so gentle is its expression as he greets you as utterly to belie the history of its owner, yet it is not a face to be trifled with. The lips thin and sensitive, the jaw not too square, the cheek bones slightly prominent, a mass of fine dark hair falls below the neck to the shoulders. The eyes, now that you are in friendly intercourse, are as gentle as a woman's. In truth, the woman nature seems prominent throughout, and you would not believe that you were looking into eyes that have pointed the way to death to hundreds of men. Yes, Wild Bill with his own hands has killed hundreds of men. Of that I have not a doubt. "He shoots to kill," as they say on the border.

In vain did I examine the scout's face for some evidence of murderous propensity. It was a gentle face, and singular only in the sharp angle of the eye, and without any physiognomical reason for the opinion, I have thought his wonderful accuracy of aim was indicated by this peculiarity. He told me, however, to use his own words:

"I allers shot well; but I come ter be perfeck in the mountains by shootin at a dime for a mark, at bets of half a dollar a shot. And then until the war I never drank liquor nor smoked," he continued, with a melancholy expression; "war is demoralizing, it is."

Captain Honesty was right. I was very curious to see "Wild Bill, the Scout," who, a few days before my arrival in Springfield, in a duel at noonday in the public square, at fifty paces, had sent one of Colt's pistol-balls through the heart of a returned Confederate soldier.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Whenever I had met an officer or soldier who had served in the Southwest I heard of Wild Bill and his exploits, until these stories became so frequent and of such an extraordinary character as quite to outstrip personal knowledge of adventure by camp and field; and the hero of these strange tales took shape in my mind as did Jack the Giant Killer or Sinbad the Sailor in childhood's days. As then, I now had the most implicit faith in the existence of the individual; but how one man could accomplish such prodigies of strength and feats of daring was a continued wonder.

In order to give the reader a clearer understanding of the condition of this neighborhood, which could have permitted the duel mentioned above, and whose history will be given hereafter in detail, I will describe the situation at the time of which I am writing, which was late in the summer of 1865, premising that this section of country would not to-day be selected as a model example of modern civilization.

At that time peace and comparative quiet had succeeded the perils and tumult of war in all the more Southern States. The people of Georgia and the Carolinas were glad to enforce order in their midst; and it would have been safe for a Union officer to have ridden unattended through the land.

In Southwest Missouri there were old scores to be settled up. During the three days occupied by General Smith—who commanded the Department and was on a tour of inspection—in crossing the country between Rolla and Springfield, a distance of 120 miles, five men were killed or wounded on the public road. Two were murdered a short distance from Rolla—by whom we could not ascertain. Another was instantly killed and two were wounded at a meeting of a band of "Regulators," who were in the service of the State, but were paid by the United States Government. It should be said here that their method of "regulation" was slightly informal, their war-cry was, "A swift bullet and a short rope for returned rebels!"

I was informed by General Smith that during the six months preceding not less than 4000 returned Confederates had been summarily disposed of by shooting or hanging. This statement seems incredible; but there is the record, and I have no doubt of its truth. History shows few parallels to this relentless destruction of human life in time of peace. It can be explained only upon the ground that, before the war, this region was inhabited by lawless people. In the outset of the rebellion the merest suspicion of loyalty to the Union cost the patriot his life; and thus large numbers fled the land, giving up home and every material interest. As soon as the Federal armies occupied the country these refugees returned. Once securely fixed in their old homes they resolved that their former persecutors should not live in their midst. Revenge for the past and security for the future knotted many a nerve and sped many a deadly bullet.

Wild Bill did not belong to the Regulators. Indeed, he was one of the law and order party. He said:

"When the war closed I buried the hatchet, and I won't fight now unless I'm put upon."

Bill was born of Northern parents in the State of Illinois. He ran away from home when a boy, and wandered out upon the plains and into the mountains. For fifteen years he lived with the trappers, hunting and fishing. When the war broke out he returned to the States and entered the Union service. No man probably was ever better fitted for scouting than he. Joined to his tremendous strength he was an unequaled horseman; he was a perfect marksman; he had a keen sight, and a constitution which had no limit of endurance. He was cool to audacity, brave to rashness, always possessed of himself under the most critical circumstances; and, above all, was such a master in the knowledge of woodcraft that it might have been termed a science with him—a knowledge which, with the soldier, is priceless beyond description. Some of Bill's adventures during the war will be related hereafter.

The main features of the story of the duel was told me by Captain Honesty, who was unprejudiced, if it is possible to find an unbiased mind in a town of 3000 people after a fight has taken place. I will give the story in his words:

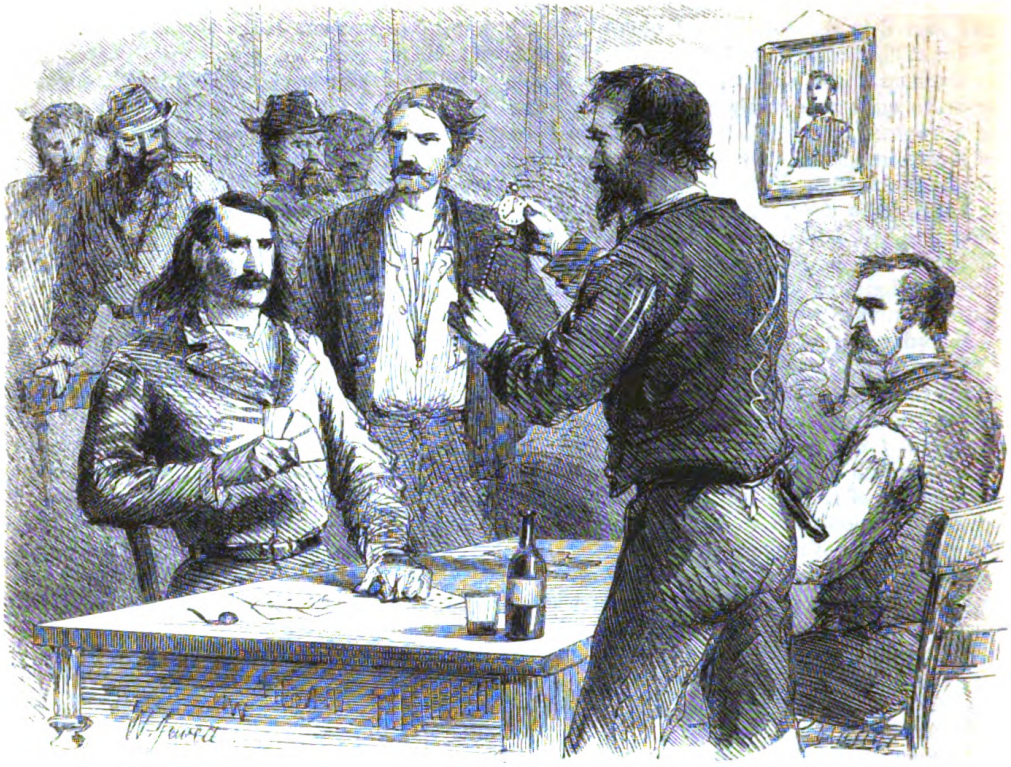
"They say Bill's wild. Now he isn't any sich thing. I've known him goin on ter ten year, and he's as civil a disposed person as you'll find he-e-arabouts. But he won't be put upon."

"I'll tell yer how it happened. But come inter the office; thar's a good many round hy'ar as sides with Tutt—the man that's shot. But I tell yer 'twas a far fight. Take some whisky? No! Well, I will, if yer'l excuse me.

"You see," continued the Captain, setting the empty glass on the table in an emphatic way, "Bill was up in his room a-playin seven-up, or four-hand, or some of them pesky games. Bill refused ter play with Tutt, who was a professional gambler. Yer see, Bill was a scout on our side durin the war, and Tutt was a reb scout. Bill had killed Dave Tutt's mate, and, atween one thing and another, there war an onusual hard feelin atwixt 'em.

"Ever sin Dave come back he had tried to pick a row with Bill; so Bill wouldn't play cards with him any more. But Dave stood over the man who was gambling with Bill and lent the feller money. Bill won bout two hundred dollars, which made Tutt spiteful mad. Bime-by, he says to Bill:

"'Bill, you've got plenty of money—pay me that forty dollars yer owe me in that horse trade.'



"And Bill paid him. Then he said:

"'Yer owe me thirty-five dollars more; yer lost it playing with me t'other night.'

"Dave's style was right provoking; but Bill answered him perfectly gentlemanly:

"'I think yer wrong, Dave. It's only twen-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PUTTING UPON HIM.

ty-five dollars. I have a memorandum of it in my pocket down stairs. Ef it's thirty-five dollars I'll give it yer.'

"Now Bill's watch was lying on the table. Dave took up the watch, put it in his pocket, and said: 'I'll keep this yere watch till yer pay me that thirty-five dollars.'

"This made Bill shooting mad; fur, don't yer see, Colonel, it was a-doubting his honor like, so he got up and looked Dave in the eyes, and said to him: 'I don't want ter make a row in this house. It's a decent house, and I don't want ter injure the keeper. You'd better put that watch back on the table.'

"But Dave grinned at Bill mighty ugly, and walked off with the watch, and kept it several days. All this time Dave's friends were spurring Bill on ter fight; there was no end ter the talk. They blackguarded him in an underhand sort of a way, and tried ter get up a scrimmage, and then they thought they could lay him out. Yer see Bill has enemies all about. He's settled the accounts of a heap of men who lived round here. This is about the only place in Missouri whar a reb can come back and live, and ter tell yer the truth, Colonel—" and the Captain, with an involuntary movement, hitched up his revolver-belt, as he said, with expressive significance, "they don't stay long round here!

"Well, as I was saying, these rebs don't like ter see a man walking round town who they knew in the reb army as one of their men, who they now know was on our side, all the time he was sending us information, sometimes from Pap Price's own head-quarters. But they couldn't provoke Bill inter a row, for he's afeard of hisself when he gits awful mad; and he allers left his shootin irons in his room when he went out. One day these cusses drew their pistols on him and dared him to fight, and then they told him that Tutt was a-goin ter pack that watch across the squar next day at noon.

"I heard of this, for every body was talking about it on the street, and so I went after Bill, and found him in his room cleaning and greasing and loading his revolvers.

"'Now, Bill,' says I, 'you're goin ter git inter a fight.'

"'Don't you bother yerself, Captain,' says he. 'It's not the first time I have been in a fight; and these d—d hounds have put on me long enough. You don't want me ter give up my honor, do yer?'

"'No, Bill,' says I, 'yer must keep yer honor.'

"Next day, about noon, Bill went down on the squar. He had said that Dave Tutt shouldn't pack that watch across the squar unless dead men could walk.

"When Bill got onter the squar he found a crowd stanin in the corner of the street by which he entered the squar, which is from the south. yer know. In this crowd he saw a lot of Tutt's friends; some were cousins of his'n, just back from the reb army; and they jeered him, and boasted that Dave was a-goin to pack that watch across the squar as he promised.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Then Bill saw Tutt stanin near the court-house, which yer remember is on the west side, so that the crowd war behind Bill.

"Just then Tutt, who war alone, started from the court-house and walked out into the squar, and Bill moved away from the crowd toward the west side of the squar. Bout fifteen paces brought them opposite to each other, and bout fifty yards apart. Tutt then showed his pistol. Bill had kept a sharp eye on him, and before Tutt could pint it Bill had his'n out.

"At that moment you could have heard a pin drop in that squar. Both Tutt and Bill fired, but one discharge followed the other so quick that it's hard to say which went off first. Tutt was a famous shot, but he missed this time; the ball from his pistol went over Bill's head. The instant Bill fired, without waitin ter see ef he had hit Tutt, he wheeled on his heels and pointed his pistol at Tutt's friends, who had already drawn their weepons.

"'Aren't yer satisfied, gentlemen?' cried Bill, as cool as an alligator. 'Put up your shootin-irons, or there'll be more dead men here.' And they put 'em up, and said it war a fair fight."

"What became of Tutt?" I asked of the Captain, who had stopped at this point of his story, and was very deliberately engaged in refilling his empty glass.

"Oh! Dave? He was as plucky a feller as ever drew trigger; but, Lord bless yer! it was no use. Bill never shoots twice at the same man, and his ball went through Dave's heart. He stood stock-still for a second or two, then raised his arm as if ter fire again, then he swayed a little, staggered three or four steps, and then fell dead.

"Bill and his friends wanted ter have the thing done regular, so we went up ter the Justice, and Bill delivered himself up. A jury was drawn; Bill was tried and cleared the next day. It was proved that it was a case of self-defense. Don't yer see, Colonel?"

I answered that I was afraid that I did not see that point very clearly.

"Well, well!" he replied, with an air of compassion, "you haven't drunk any whisky, that's what's the matter with yer." And then, putting his hand on my shoulder with a half-mysterious half-conscious look in his face, he muttered, in a whisper:

"The fact is, thar was an undercurrent of a woman in that fight!"

The story of the duel was yet fresh from the lips of the Captain when its hero appeared in the manner already described. After a few moments' conversation Bill excused himself, saying:

"I am going out on the prarer a piece to see the sick wife of my mate. I should be glad to meet yer at the hotel this afternoon, Kernel."

"I will go there to meet you," I replied.

"Good-day, gentlemen," said the scout, as he saluted the party; and mounting the black horse who had been standing quiet, unhitched, he waved his hand over the animal's head. Responsive to the signal, she shot forward as the arrow leaves the bow, and they both disappeared up the road in a cloud of dust.

"That man is the most remarkable charac-

"ARE YOU SATISFIED?"

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

FOR LIFE OR DEATH.

ter I have met in four years' active service," said a lieutenant of cavalry, as the party resumed their seats. "He and his mate—the man who scouted with him—attempted the most daring feat that I ever heard of."

As there appeared to be no business on hand at the moment the party urged the lieutenant to tell the story.

"I can't tell the thing as it was," said the young officer. "It was beyond description. One could only hold their breath and feel. It happened when our regiment was attached to Curtis's command, in the expedition down into Arkansas. One day we were in the advance, and began to feel the enemy, who appeared in greater strength than at any time before. We were all rather uneasy, for there were rumors that Kirby Smith had come up from Texas with all his force; and as we were only a strong reconnoitring party a fight just then might have been bad for us. We made a big noise with a light battery, and stretched our cavalry out in the open and opposite to the rebel cavalry, who were drawn up in line of battle on the slope of the prairie about a thousand yards away. There we sat for half an hour, now and then banging at each other, but both parties keeping pretty well their line of battle. They waited for us to pitch in. We were waiting until more of our infantry should come.

"It was getting to be stupid work, however, and we were all hoping something would turn up, when we noticed two men ride out from the centre of their line and move toward us. At the first instant we paid little heed to them, supposing it some act of rebel bravado, when we saw quite a commotion all along the enemy's front, and then they commenced firing at the two riders, and then their line was all enveloped with smoke, out of which horsemen dashed in pursuit. The two riders kept well together, coming straight for us. Then we knew they were trying to escape, and the Colonel deployed our company as skirmishers to assist them. There wasn't time to do much, although, as I watched the pursued and their pursuers, and found the two men had halted at what I could now see was a deep wide ditch, the moments seemed to be hours; and when they turned I thought they were going to give themselves up. But no; in the face of that awful fire they deliberately turned back to get space for a good run at the ditch. This gave time for two of their pursuers to get within a few yards of them, when they stopped, evidently in doubt as to the meaning of this retrograde movement. But they did not remain long in doubt, for the two men turned again, and, with a shout, rushed for the ditch, and then we were near enough to see that they were Wild Bill and his mate. Bill's companion never reached the ditch. He and his horse must have been shot at the same time, for they went down together and did not rise again.

"Bill did not get a scratch. He spoke to Black Nell, the mare we saw just now, who knew as well as her master that there was life and death in that twenty feet of ditch, and that

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

she must jump it; and at it she went with a big rush. I never saw a more magnificent sight. Bill gave the mare her head, and turning in his saddle fired twice, killing both of his pursuers, who were within a few lengths of him. They went out of their saddles like stones, just as Black Nell flew into the air and landed safely on our side of the ditch. In a moment both the daring scout and the brave mare were in our midst, while our men cheered and yelled like mad.

"We asked Bill why he ran such a risk, when he could have stolen into our lines during the night?

"'Oh,' said he, 'mate and I wanted to show them cussed rebs what a Union soldier could do. We've been with them now for more than a month, and heard nothing but brag. We thought we'd take it out of them. But'—and Bill looked across the green-sward to where his companion still lay motionless—'if they have killed my mate they shall pay a big price for it.'

"Bill must have brought valuable information," continued the lieutenant, "for he was at once sent to the General, and in an hour we had changed position, and foiled a flank movement of the rebels."

I went to the hotel during the afternoon to keep the scout's appointment. The large room of the hotel in Springfield is perhaps the central point of attraction in the city. It fronted on the street, and served in several capacities. It was a sort of exchange for those who had nothing better to do than to go there. It was reception-room, parlor, and office; but its distinguished and most fascinating characteristic was the bar, which occupied one entire end of the apartment. Technically, the "bar" is the counter upon which the polite official places his viands. Practically, the bar is represented in the long rows of bottles, and cut-glass decanters, and the glasses and goblets of all shapes and sizes suited to the various liquors to be imbibed. What a charming and artistic display it was of elongated transparent vessels containing every known drinkable fluid, from native Bourbon to imported Lacryma Christi!

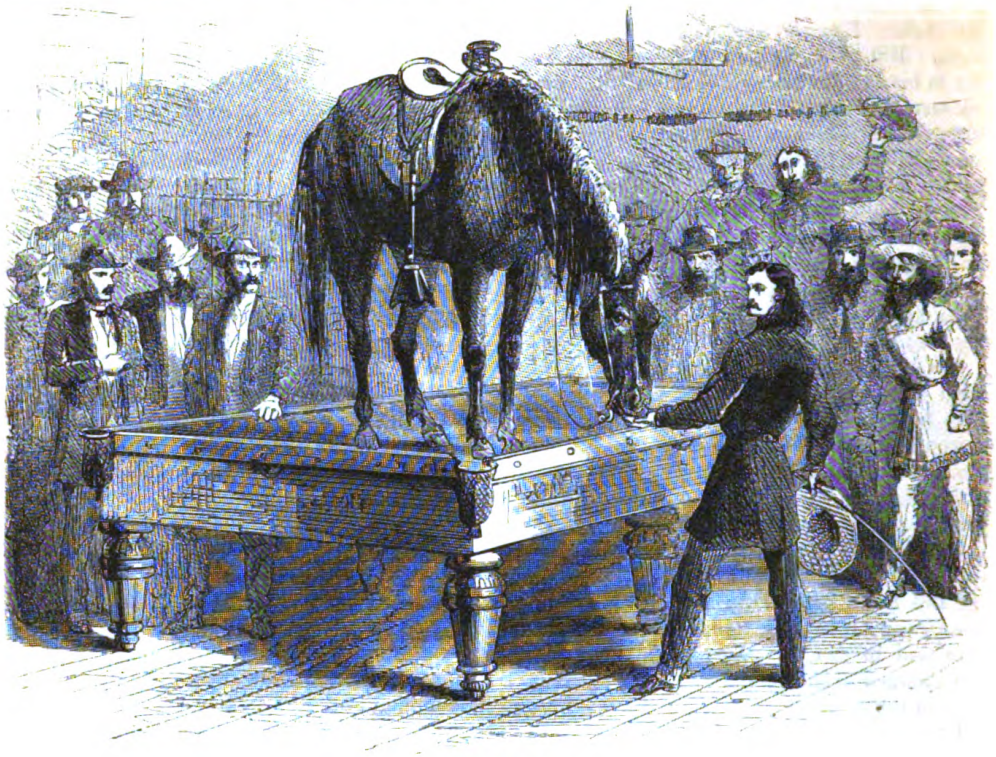
The room, in its way, was a temple of art. All sorts of pictures budded and blossomed and blushed from the walls. Sixpenny portraits of the Presidents encoffined in pine-wood frames; Mazeppa appeared in the four phases of his celebrated one-horse act; while a lithograph of "Mary Ann" smiled and simpered in spite of the stains of tobacco-juice which had been unsparingly bestowed upon her originally encarmined countenance. But the hanging committee of this undesigned academy seemed to have been prejudiced—as all hanging committees of good taste might well be—in favor of Harper's Weekly; for the walls of the room were well covered with wood-cuts cut from that journal. Portraits of noted generals and statesmen, knaves and politicians, with bounteous illustrations of battles and skirmishes, from Bull Run number one to Dinwiddie Court House. And the simple-hearted comers and goers of Springfield looked upon, wondered, and admired these pictorial descriptions fully as much as if they had been the master-pieces of a Yvon or Vernet.

A billiard-table, old and out of use, where caroms seemed to have been made quite as often with lead as ivory balls, stood in the centre of the room. A dozen chairs filled up the complement of the furniture. The appearance of the party of men assembled there, who sat with their slovenly shod feet dangling over the arms of the chairs or hung about the porch outside, was in perfect harmony with the time and place. All of them religiously obeyed the two before-mentioned characteristics of the people of the city—their hair was long and tangled, and each man fulfilled the most exalted requirement of laziness.

I was taking a mental inventory of all this when a cry and murmur drew my attention to the outside of the house, when I saw Wild Bill riding up the street at a swift gallop. Arrived opposite to the hotel, he swung his right arm around with a circular motion. Black Nell instantly stopped and dropped to the ground as if a cannon-ball had knocked life out of her. Bill left her there, stretched upon the ground, and joined the group of observers on the porch.

"Black Nell hasn't forgot her old tricks," said one of them.

"No," answered the scout. "God bless her! she is wiser and truer than most men I know. That mare will do any thing for me. Won't you, Nelly?"



The mare winked affirmatively the only eye we could see.

"Wise!" continued her master; "why, she knows more than a judge. I'll bet the drinks for the party that she'll walk up these steps and into the room and climb up on the billiard-table and lie down."

The bet was taken at once, not because any one doubted the capabilities of the mare, but there was excitement in the thing without exercise.

Bill whistled in a low tone. Nell instantly scrambled to her feet, walked toward him, put her nose affectionately under his arm, followed him into the room, and to my extreme wonderment climbed upon the billiard-table, to the extreme astonishment of the table no doubt, for it groaned under the weight of the four-legged animal and several of those who were simply bifurcated, and whom Nell permitted to sit upon her. When she got down from the table, which was as graceful a performance as might be expected under the circumstances, Bill sprang upon her back, dashed through the high wide doorway, and at a single bound cleared the flight of steps and landed in the middle of the street. The scout then dismounted, snapped his riding-whip, and the noble beast bounded off down the street, rearing and plunging to her own intense satisfaction. A kindly-disposed

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BLACK NELL.

individual, who must have been a stranger, supposing the mare was running away, tried to catch her, when she stopped, and as if she resented his impertinence, let fly her heels at him and then quietly trotted to her stable.

"Black Nell has carried me along through many a tight place," said the scout, as we walked toward my quarters. "She trains easier than any animal I ever saw. That trick of dropping quick which you saw has saved my life time and again. When I have been out scouting on the prarer or in the woods I have come across parties of rebels, and have dropped out of sight in the tall grass before they saw us. One day a gang of rebs who had been hunting for me, and thought they had my track, halted for half an hour within fifty yards of us. Nell laid as close as a rabbit, and didn't even whisk her tail to keep the flies off, until the rebs moved off, supposing they were on the wrong scent. The mare will come at my whistle and foller me about just like a dog. She won't mind any one else, nor allow them to mount her, and will kick a harness and wagon all ter pieces ef you try to hitch her in one. And she's right, Kernel," added Bill, with the enthusiasm of a true lover of a horse sparkling in his eyes. "A hoss is too noble a beast to be degraded by such toggery. Harness mules and oxen, but give a hoss a chance ter run."

I had a curiosity, which was not an idle one, to hear what this man had to say about his duel with Tutt, and I asked him:

"Do you not regret killing Tutt? You surely do not like to kill men?"

"As ter killing men," he replied, "I never thought much about it. The most of the men I have killed it was one or t'other of us, and at sich times you don't stop to think; and what's the use after it's all over? As for Tutt, I had rather not have killed him, for I want ter settle down quiet here now. But thar's been hard feeling between us a long while. I wanted ter keep out of that fight; but he tried to degrade me, and I couldn't stand that, you know, for I am a fighting man, you know."

A cloud passed over the speaker's face for a moment as he continued:

"And there was a cause of quarrel between us which people round here don't know about. One of us had to die; and the secret died with him."

"Why did you not wait to see if your ball had hit him? Why did you turn round so quickly?"

The scout fixed his gray eyes on mine, striking his leg with his riding-whip, as he answered,

"I knew he was a dead man. I never miss a shot. I turned on the crowd because I was sure they would shoot me if they saw him fall."

"The people about here tell me you are a quiet, civil man. How is it you get into these fights?"

"D—d if I can tell," he replied, with a puzzled look which at once gave place to a proud, defiant expression as he continued—"but you know a man must defend his honor."

"Yes," I admitted, with some hesitation, remembering that I was not in Boston but on the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google border, and that the code of honor and mode of redress differ slightly in the one place from those of the other.

One of the reasons for my desire to make the acquaintance of Wild Bill was to obtain from his own lips a true account of some of the adventures related of him. It was not an easy matter. It was hard to overcome the reticence which marks men who have lived the wild mountain life, and which was one of his valuable qualifications as a scout. Finally he said:

"I hardly know where to begin. Pretty near all these stories are true. I was at it all the war. That affair of my swimming the river took place on that long scout of mine when I was with the rebels five months, when I was sent by General Curtis to Price's army. Things had come pretty close at that time, and it wasn't safe to go straight inter their lines. Every body was suspected who came from these parts. So I started off and went way up to Kansas City. I bought a horse there and struck out onto the plains, and then went down through Southern Kansas into Arkansas. I knew a rebel named Barnes, who was killed at Pea Ridge. He was from near Austin in Texas. So I called myself his brother and enlisted in a regiment of mounted rangers.

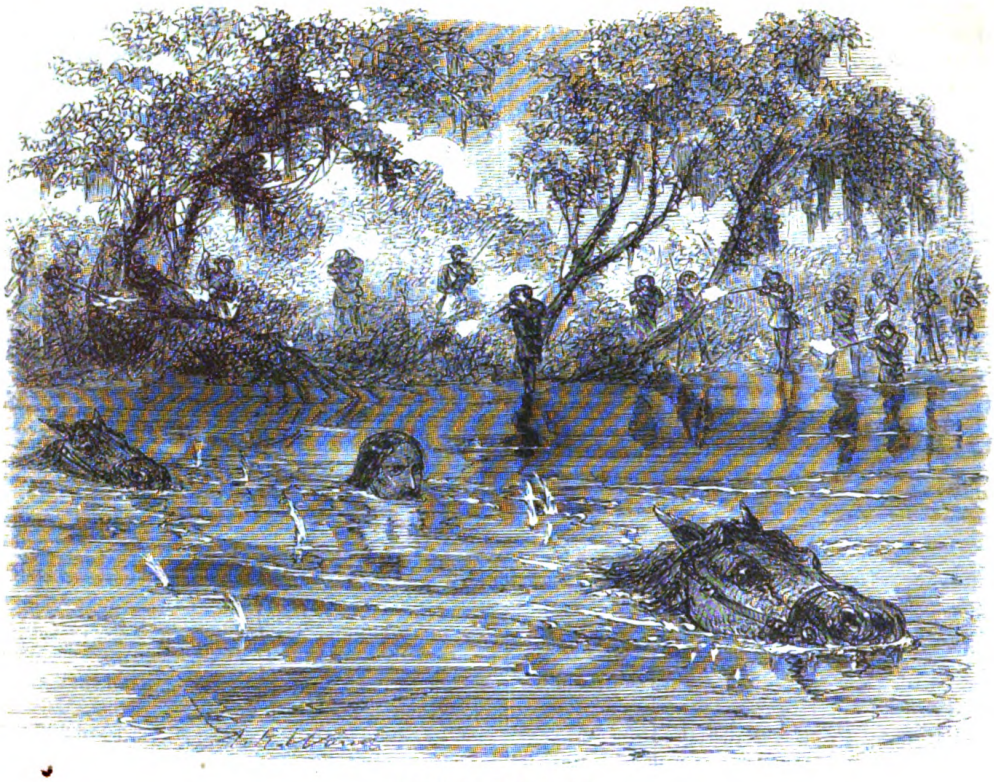
"General Price was just then getting ready for a raid into Missouri. It was sometime before we got into the campaign, and it was mighty hard work for me. The men of our regiment were awful. They didn't mind killing a man no more than a hog. The officers had no command over them. They were afraid of their own men, and let them do what they liked; so they would rob and sometimes murder their own people. It was right hard for me to keep up with them, and not do as they did. I never let on that I was a good shot. I kept that back for big occasions; but ef you'd heard me swear and cuss the blue-bellies, you'd a-thought me one of the wickedest of the whole crew. So it went on until we came near Curtis's army. Bime-by they were on one side Sandy River and we were on t'other. All the time I had been getting information until I knew every regiment and its strength; how much cavalry there was, and how many guns the artillery had.

"You see 'twas time for me to go, but it wasn't easy to git out, for the river was close picketed on both sides. One day when I was on picket our men and the rebels got talking and cussin each other, as you know they used to do. After a while one of the Union men offered to exchange some coffee for tobacco. So we went out onto a little island which was neutral ground like. The minute I saw the other party, who belonged to the Missouri cavalry, we recognized each other. I was awful afraid they'd let on. So I blurted out:

"'Now, Yanks, let's see yer coffee—no burnt beans, mind yer—but the genuine stuff. We know the real article if we is Texans.'

"The boys kept mum, and we separated. Half an hour afterward General Curtis knew I was with the rebs. But how to git across the river was what stumped me. After that, when I was on picket, I didn't trouble myself about being shot. I used to fire at our boys, and they'd bang away at me, each of us taking good care to shoot wide. But how to git over the river was the bother. At last, after thinking a heap about it, I came to the conclusion that I always did, that the boldest plan is the best and safest.

"We had a big sargent in our company who was allus a-braggin that he could stump any man in the regiment. He swore he had killed more Yanks than any man in the army, and that he could do more daring things than any others. So one day when he was talking loud I took him up, and offered to bet horse for horse that I would ride out into the open, and nearer to the Yankees than he. He tried to back out of this, but the men raised a row, calling him a funk, and a bragger, and all that; so he had to go. Well, we mounted our horses, but before we came within shootin distance of the Union soldiers I made my horse kick and rear so that they could see who I was. Then we rode slowly to the river bank, side by side.



"There must have been ten thousand men watching us; for, besides the rebs who wouldn't have cried about it if we had both been killed, our boys saw something was up, and without being seen thousands of them came down to the river. Their pickets kept firing at the sargent; but whether or not they were afraid of putting a ball through me I don't know, but nary a shot hit him. He was a plucky feller all the same, for the bullets zitted about in every direction.

"Bime-by we got right close ter the river, when one of the Yankee soldiers yelled out, 'Bully for Wild Bill!'

"Then the sargent suspicioned me, for he turned on me and growled out, 'By God, I believe yer a Yank!' And he at onst drew his revolver; but he was too late, for the minute he drew his pistol I put a ball through him. I mightn't have killed him if he hadn't suspicioned me. I had to do it then.

"As he rolled out of the saddle I took his horse by the bit, and dashed into the water as quick as I could. The minute I shot the sargent our boys set up a tremendous shout, and opened a smashing fire on the rebs who had commenced popping at me. But I had got into deep water, and had slipped off my horse over his back, and steered him for the opposite bank by holding onto his tail with one hand, while I held the bridle rein of the sargent's horse in the other hand. It was the hottest bath I ever took. Whew! For about two minutes how the bullets zitted and skipped on the water. I thought I was hit again and again, but the reb sharp-shooters were bothered by the splash we made, and in a little while our boys drove them to cover, and after some tumbling at the bank got into the brush with my two horses without a scratch.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TAKING TO THE WATER.

"It is a fact," said the scout, while he caressed his long hair, "I felt sort of proud when the boys took me into camp, and General Curtis thanked me before a heap of generals.

"But I never tried that thing over again; nor I didn't go a scouting openly in Price's army after that. They all knew me too well, and you see 'twouldn't a been healthy to have been caught."

The scout's story of swimming the river ought, perhaps, to have satisfied my curiosity; but I was especially desirous to hear him relate the history of a sanguinary fight which he had with a party of ruffians in the early part of the war, when, single-handed, he fought and killed ten men. I had heard the story as it came from an officer of the regular army who, an hour after the affair, saw Bill and the ten dead men—some killed with bullets, others hacked and slashed to death with a knife.

As I write out the details of this terrible tale from notes which I took as the words fell from the scout's lips, I am conscious of its extreme improbability; but while I listened to him I remembered the story in the Bible, where we are told that Samson "with the jawbone of an ass slew a thousand men," and as I looked upon this magnificent example of human strength and daring, he appeared to me to realize the powers of a Samson and Hercules combined, and I should not have been inclined to place any limit upon his achievements. Besides this, one who has lived for four years in the presence of such grand heroism and deeds of prowess as was seen during the war is in what might be called a "receptive" mood. Be the story true or not, in part, or in whole, I believed then every word Wild Bill uttered, and I believe it to-day.

"I don't like to talk about that M'Kandlas affair," said Bill, in answer to my question. "It gives me a queer shiver whenever I think of it, and sometimes I dream about it, and wake up in a cold sweat.

"You see this M'Kandlas was the Captain of a gang of desperadoes, horse-thieves, murderers, regular cut-throats, who were the terror of every body on the border, and who kept us in the mountains in hot water whenever they were around. I knew them all in the mountains, where they pretended to be trapping, but they were there hiding from the hangman. M'Kandlas was the biggest scoundrel and bully of them all, and was allers a-braggin of what he could do. One day I beat him shootin at a mark, and then threw him at the back-holt. And I didn't drop him as soft as you would a baby, you may be sure. Well, he got savage mad about it, and swore he would have his revenge on me some time.

"This was just before the war broke out, and we were already takin sides in the mountains either for the South or the Union. M'Kandlas and his gang were border-ruffians in the Kansas row, and of course they went with the rebs. Bime-by he clar'd out, and I shouldn't have thought of the feller agin ef he hadn't crossed my path. It 'pears he didn't forget me.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"It was in '61, when I guided a detachment of cavalry who were comin in from Camp Floyd. We had nearly reached the Kansas line, and were in South Nebraska, when one afternoon I went out of camp to go to the cabin of an old friend of mine, a Mrs. Waltman. I took only one of my revolvers with me, for although the war had broke out I didn't think it necessary to carry both my pistols, and, in all or'nary scrimmages, one is better than a dozen, of you shoot straight. I saw some wild turkeys on the road as I was goin down, and popped one of 'em over, thinking he'd be just the thing for supper.

"Well, I rode up to Mrs. Waltman's, jumped off my horse, and went into the cabin, which is like most of the cabins on the prarer, with only one room, and that had two doors, one opening in front and t'other on a yard, like.

"'How are you, Mrs. Waltman?' I said, feeling as jolly as you please.

"The minute she saw me she turned as white as a sheet and screamed: 'Is that you, Bill? Oh, my God! they will kill you! Run! run! They will kill you!'

THE WARNING.

"'Who's a-goin to kill me?' said I. 'There s two can play at that game.'

"'It's M'Kandlas and his gang. There's ten of them, and you've no chance. They've jes gone down the road to the corn-rack. They came up here only five minutes ago. M'Kandlas was draggin poor Parson Shipley on the ground with a lariat round his neck. The preacher was most dead with choking and the horses stamping on him. M'Kandlas knows yer bringin in that party of Yankee cavalry, and he swears he'll cut yer heart out. Run, Bill, run!—But it's too late; they're comin up the lane.'

"While she was a-talkin I remembered I had but one revolver, and a load gone out of that. On the table there was a horn of powder and some little bars of lead. I poured some powder into the empty chamber and rammed the lead after it by hammering the barrel on the table, and had just capped the pistol when I heard M'Kandlas shout:

"'There's that d—d Yank Wild Bill's horse; he's here; and we'll skin him alive!'

"If I had thought of runnin before it war too late now, and the house was my best holt —a sort of fortress, like. I never thought I should leave that room alive."

The scout stopped in his story, rose from his seat, and strode back and forward in a state of great excitement.

"I tell you what it is, Kernel," he resumed, after a while, "I don't mind a scrimmage with these fellers round here. Shoot one or two of them and the rest run away. But all of M'Kandlas's gang were reckless, blood-thirsty devils, who would fight as long as they had strength to pull a trigger. I have been in tight places, but that's one of the few times I said my prayers.

"'Surround the house and give him no quarter!' yelled M'Kandlas. When I heard that I felt as quiet and cool as if I was a-goin to church. I looked round the room and saw a Hawkins rifle hangin over the bed.

"'Is that loaded?' said I to Mrs. Waltman.

"'Yes,' the poor thing whispered. She was so frightened she couldn't speak out loud.

"'Are you sure?' said I, as I jumped to the bed and caught it from its hooks. Although my eye did not leave the door, yet I could see she nodded 'Yes' again. I put the revolver on the bed, and just then M'Kandlas poked his head inside the doorway, but jumped back when he saw me with the rifle in my hand.

"'Come in here, you cowardly dog!' I shouted. 'Come in here, and fight me!'

"M'Kandlas was no coward, if he was a bully. He jumped inside the room with his gun leveled to shoot; but he was not quick enough. My rifle-ball went through his heart. He fell back outside the house, where he was found afterward holding tight to his rifle, which had fallen over his head.

"His disappearance was followed by a yell from his gang, and then there was a dead silence. I put down the rifle and took the revolver, and I said to myself: 'Only six shots and nine men to kill. Save your powder, Bill, for the death-hug's a-comin!' I don't know why it was, Kernel," continued Bill, looking at me inquiringly, "but at that moment things seemed clear and sharp. I could think strong.

"There was a few seconds of that awful stillness, and then the ruffians came rushing in at both doors. How wild they looked with their

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE STRUGGLE FOR LIFE.

red, drunken faces and inflamed eyes, shouting and cussing! But I never aimed more deliberately in my life.

"One—two—three—four; and four men fell dead.

"That didn't stop the rest. Two of them fired their bird-guns at me. And then I felt a sting run all over me. The room was full of smoke. Two got in close to me, their eyes glaring out of the clouds. One I knocked down with my fist. 'You are out of the way for a while,' I thought. The second I shot dead. The other three clutched me and crowded me onto the bed. I fought hard. I broke with my hand one man's arm. He had his fingers round my throat. Before I could get to my feet I was struck across the breast with the stock of a rifle, and I felt the blood rushing out of my nose and mouth. Then I got ugly, and I remember that I got hold of a knife, and then it was all cloudy like, and I was wild, and I struck savage blows, following the devils up from one side to the other of the room and into the corners, striking and slashing until I knew that every one was dead.

"All of a sudden it seemed as if my heart was on fire. I was bleeding every where. I rushed out to the well and drank from the bucket, and then tumbled down in a faint."

Breathless with the intense interest with which I had followed this strange story, all the more thrilling and weird when its hero, seeming to live over again the bloody events of that day, gave way to its terrible spirit with wild, savage gestures. I saw then—what my scrutiny of the morning had failed to discover—the tiger which lay concealed beneath that gentle exterior.

"You must have been hurt almost to death," I said.

"There were eleven buck-shot in me. I carry some of them now. I was cut in thirteen places. All of them bad enough to have let out the life of a man. But that blessed old Dr. Mills pulled me safe through it, after a bed siege of many a long week."

"That prayer of yours, Bill, may have been more potent for your safety than you think. You should thank God for your deliverance."

"To tell you the truth, Kernel," responded the scout with a certain solemnity in his grave face, "I don't talk about sich things ter the people round here, but I allers feel sort of thankful when I get out of a bad scrape."

"In all your wild, perilous adventures," I asked him, "have you ever been afraid? Do you know what the sensation is? I am sure you will not misunderstand the question, for I take it we soldiers comprehend justly that there is no higher courage than that which shows itself when the consciousness of danger is keen but where moral strength overcomes the weakness of the body."

"I think I know what you mean, Sir, and I'm not ashamed to say that I have been so frightened that it 'peared as if all the strength and blood had gone out of my body, and my face was as white as chalk. It was at the Wilme

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Creek fight. I had fired more than fifty cartridges, and I think fetched my man every time. I was on the skirmish line, and was working up closer to the rebs, when all of a sudden a battery opened fire right in front of me, and it sounded as if forty thousand guns were firing, and every shot and shell screeched within six inches of my head. It was the first time I was ever under artillery fire, and I was so frightened that I couldn't move for a minute or so, and when I did go back the boys asked me if I had seen a ghost? They may shoot bullets at me by the dozen, and it's rather exciting if I can shoot back, but I am always sort of nervous when the big guns go off."

"I would like to see you shoot."

"Would yer?" replied the scout, drawing his revolver; and approaching the window, he pointed to a letter O in a sign-board which was fixed to the stone-wall of a building on the other side of the way.

"That sign is more than fifty yards away. I will put these six balls into the inside of the circle, which isn't bigger than a man's heart."

In an off-hand way, and without sighting the pistol with his eye, he discharged the six shots of his revolver. I afterward saw that all the bullets had entered the circle.

As Bill proceeded to reload his pistol, he said to me with a naïveté of manner which was meant to be assuring:

"Whenever you get into a row be sure and not shoot too quick. Take time. I've known many a feller slip up for shootin' in a hurry."

It would be easy to fill a volume with the adventures of that remarkable man. My object here has been to make a slight record of one who is one of the best—perhaps the very best—example of a class who more than any other encountered perils and privations in defense of our nationality.

One afternoon as General Smith and I mounted our horses to start upon our journey toward the East, Wild Bill came to shake hands good-by, and I said to him:

"If you have no objection I will write out for publication an account of a few of your adventures."

"Certainly you may," he replied. "I'm sort of public property. But, Kernel," he continued, leaning upon my saddle-bow, while there was a tremulous softness in his voice and a strange moisture in his averted eyes, "I have a mother back there in Illinois who is old and feeble. I haven't seen her this many a year, and haven't been a good son to her, yet I love her better than any thing in this life. It don't matter much what they say about me here. But I'm not a cut-throat and vagabond, and I'd like the old woman to know what'll make her proud. I'd like her to hear that her runaway boy has fought through the war for the Union like a true man."

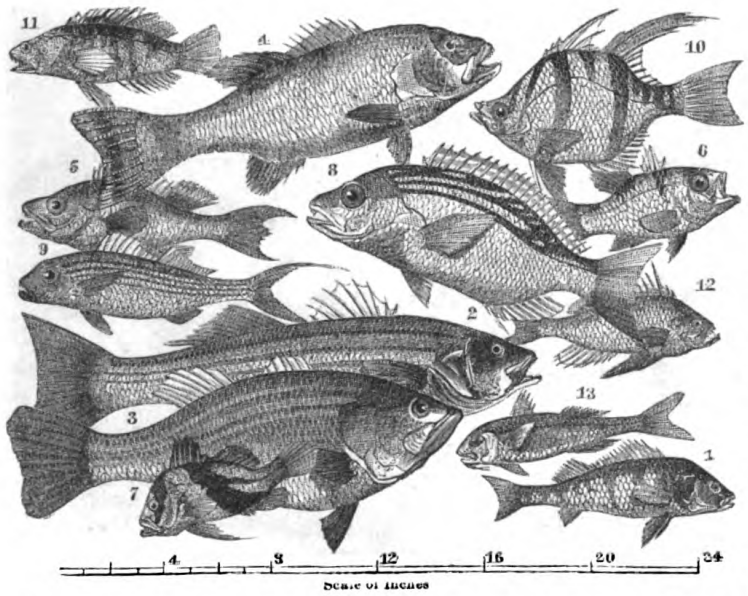
[William Hitchcock — called Wild Bill, the Scout of the Plains—shall have his wish. I have told his story precisely as it was told to me, confirmed in all important points by many witnesses; and I have no doubt of its truth.—G. W. N.]

THE FAREWELL.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SOMETHING ABOUT FISHES.

[The illustrations accompanying this paper have been selected from the chapters on Ichthyology in WILLSON'S Fifth Reader. They are here introduced as furnishing types of some of the most notable species of fishes. The chapters in the Reader form an admirable introduction to the science of Ichthyology.]

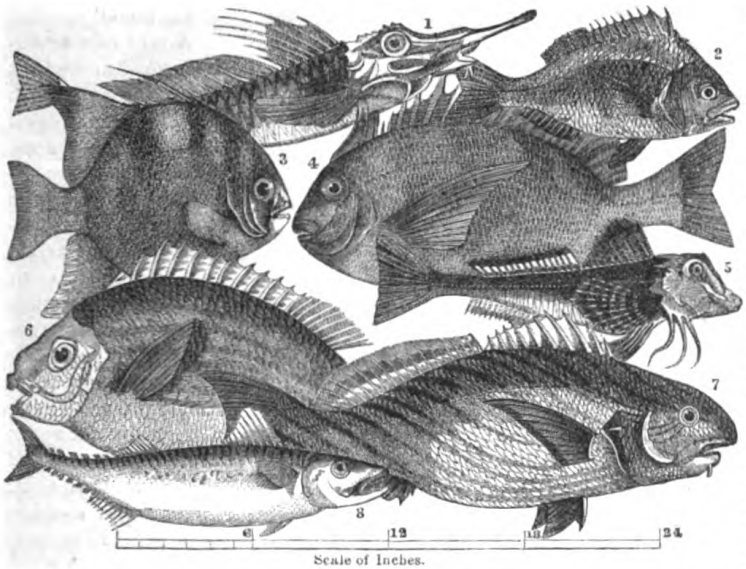


WRITERS on Natural History have been remarkably industrious in collecting facts illustrative of the structure, habits, and economy of animals. Their success in treating of those on land, even to very minute particulars, meets the approval of all intelligent minds; but the races inhabiting the water are more difficult to study. All the very large aquatic animals are less within the control of philosophers than those of a portable size, which are captured more easily. Much, therefore, gathered respecting the first has been through the instrumentality of seamen, who, from the character of their profession, have an opportunity to observe and collect facts which otherwise would have been lost.

Comparative anatomy opens a vast field for contemplation; and, taken in connection with the everyday life of animals in their unrestrained liberty, can not fail of being exceedingly instructive. The more we know of them the more we wish to know, because there is an adaptation of means to ends which demonstrates the existence of a First Cause. They could not have fashioned themselves to meet so many conditions on which the perpetuity of a race depends. Divine wisdom alone could have created and sustained by unalterable laws such diversified animal organizations. Speculations and assumptions are very commonly interwoven with facts in treating of subjects where knowledge is uncertain; hence, if all the flying, crawling, running, and swimming things of air, earth, and water knew what has been said of them, some would be elated with pride, while others could not conceal their disgust at the misrepresentations of their biographers.

Ichthyology is a difficult branch of Natural History to popularize. It is exceedingly embarrassed with technical terms, and therefore the more difficult to simplify and yet retain the essential points. For example, Malecopterygii and Malecopterygii subbrachiati are expressive in a scientific view, but unless the reader is familiar with the Greek language they rather perplex than aid him in his inquiries.

There are fewer evidences of intelligence in fishes than in air-breathing animals. Their instinctive acts, however, are none the less curious. If they do not border upon reason, they accomplish precisely what results in whatever best conduces to the protection and preservation of the individual. And while the perpetuity of innumerable orders of beings in the sea at first view appears like a matter of chance, it is morally certain that every thing in the mighty deep is regulated by a system of laws as harmonious as those which govern the heavenly spheres!

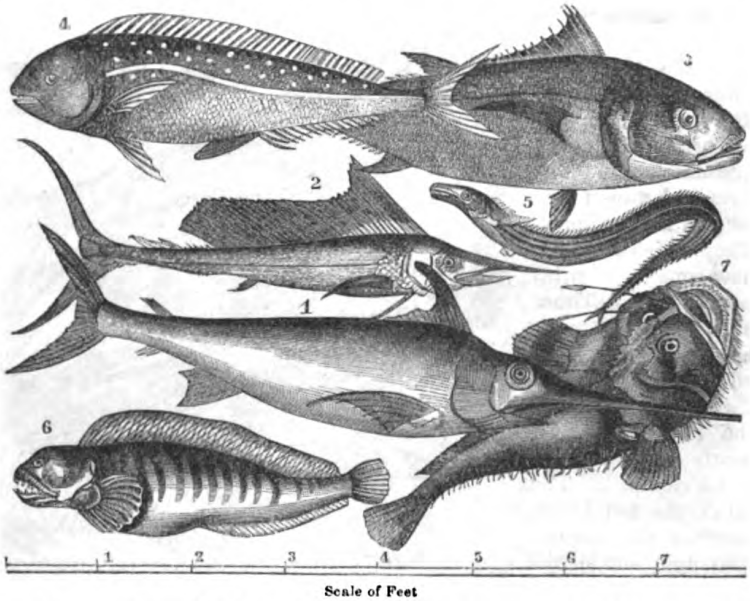


Fishes have singularly constructed bodies. Though apparently all bones, they have none too many; nor are they thrown together without order. Every bone, straight or crooked, is so artistically placed as to offer the greatest amount of resistance to outward pressure, besides affording attachments for muscular threads by thousands, of different lengths, by which every motion in swimming, sculling, curving, rising, plunging, or lying still, solely and exclusively depends. A very slight contraction of one fibre after another must take place in rapid succession, and relax just as quickly, or it would be impossible for them to glide so gracefully through the water. The skeleton of any fish, when closely examined, exhibits a system of osseous architecture that quite puts into the background the most complicated frame-work constructed by man.

1. Yellow Perch.—2. Striped Sea-Bass.—3. Black Lake Bass.—4. Growling Salmon.—5. Black Sea-Bass.—6. Mediterranean Apogon.—7. Two-banded Diploprion.—8. One-spotted Mesoprion.—9. Ruby-colored Etelis.—10. Armed Enoplosus.—11. Lettered Serranus.—12. Spined Serranus.—13. Red Surmullet.—These all belong to the Perch Family.

All fishes are divid-

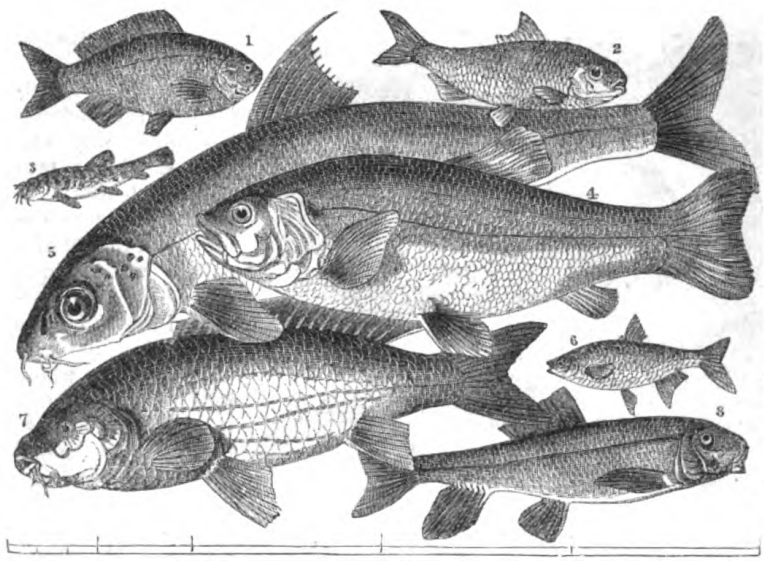
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



1. Mailed Gurnard.—2. Big Porgee.—3. Three-tailed Porgee.—4. Sheepshead.—5. Rock Gurnard.—6. Sea Bream.—7. Bearded Umbrina.—8. Mackerel.—These, as well as the Perch Family, are all Spine-rayed Fishes.

ed into two families, viz., the bony and the cartilaginous. One has a skeleton tolerably hard and well-developed, particularly the spine, ribs, and cranial bones; while the other, as the sharks, for example, are provided with slender, semi-flexible, or cartilaginous bones. Social fishes, such as are found in shoals, or schools, like cod, mackerel, and herring are comparatively peaceably inclined and fond of company. The other family are solitary in their habits, ferocious in character, and dreaded by those without much means of defense. Flight from a pursuer is their only hope, if hope they have. Thus, in the ocean there are two races of purely aquatic animals corresponding with two distinct families of animals on the land, viz., the herbivorous and carnivorous. Sharks range through every sea slaughtering as they go, preventing the too great multiplication of social fishes, just upon the plan discoverable in the economy of nature of doing the same thing on terra firma.

Here, then, we have an illustration of the balancing power which prevents either race or family from living too long. Ample security for the perpetuation of races has been arranged, so that a physical harmony is maintained, that the best results may be brought about in the water and on the dry land.



It might be as difficult to satisfactorily determine why one class should be provided with sharp canine teeth, formidable claws, armed with curved nails almost like sickles, and permitted to pounce on harmless, inoffensive quadrupeds whose food is grass, and tear them in pieces, as to explain how moral evil was introduced into the world and still is allowed to interfere with human happiness.

Although one order of fishes are social, living as it were in communities, that is, moving from one feeding ground to another in numbers beyond all computation; the other, their born antagonists, are unsocial in their habits, foraging perpetually in quest of prey. With but few exceptions both are carnivorous. As the population of the waters very much exceeds that on land, were it not for the unceasing slaughter going on throughout all aquatic regions the Atlantic, the Mediterranean, and all other marine basins on the globe could not contain the beings constantly coming into existence there. Not only so, were it not that the dead are generally swallowed by the living the de-

1. Common Sword-Fish.—2. Indian Sword-Fish.—3. Tunny.—4. Dolphin.—5. Scabbard-Fish.—6. Wolf-Fish.—7. Fishing Frog.—All Spine-rayed Fishes.

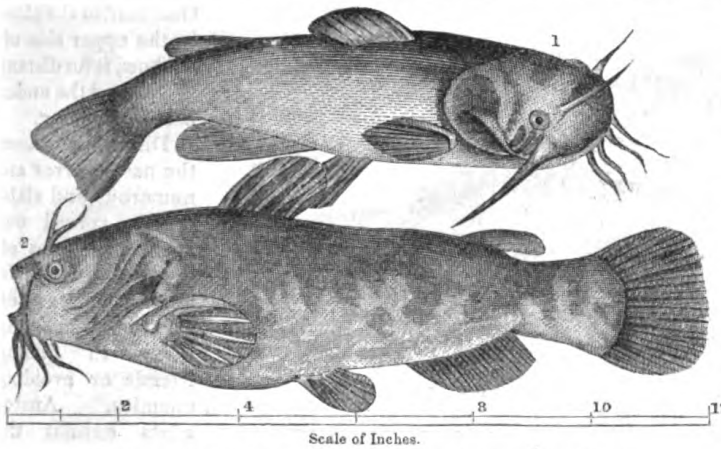
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1. Gold-Fish.—2. Roach.—3. Loach.—4. Tench.—5. Barbel.—6. Shiner.—7. Carp.—8. Sucker.—These belong to the Carp Family.

composition of their carcasses would poison the element which they all inhabit, and the atmosphere above it, to the destruction of those breathing air.

Complicated as the structure of fishes seems to be, it is less so than land or air-breathing animals. The first have a single heart, which throws the blood into the gills, but no further. After being re-vitalized in the delicate fringes of those organs it runs to a large artery lying on the underside of the back-bone, which contracts upon the contents, driving it all over and through the body. As it passes along through the arterial vessels there is left on the way carbonate of lime for the bones, gelatin for gluing parts together, and, in short, all those elementary substances which add to the growth or keep the vital machinery in repair are thus deposited.

This constitutes the internal organic difference between water and land animals. Those which have gills have one heart with cold blood. Those breathing air by lungs have two hearts joined together. One of them sends blood into the lungs, where it meets atmospheric air to be vitalized. The other, the left heart, receives the revitalized fluid and drives it in all directions to fertilize the body, as it were, and keep it alive. They have warm blood.



A race of singularly-formed animals reside in the water which breathe air without having legs or arms. Their flippers are elementary limbs, though used simply as paddles. Seals, porpoises, and whales are common representatives of those intermediate classes. Those are commonly called amphibious. That is a mistake, however, as they are not. If they were, then either air or water could be breathed. Even many of the reptiles which remain most of the time submerged are not amphibious, but are entirely dependent on the air, which they are obliged to come to the surface to inhale. Frogs are a familiar illustration of this proposition. Whales and seals nurse their young with milk. On this ground it was decided some years ago in a court of law that whales were not fishes.

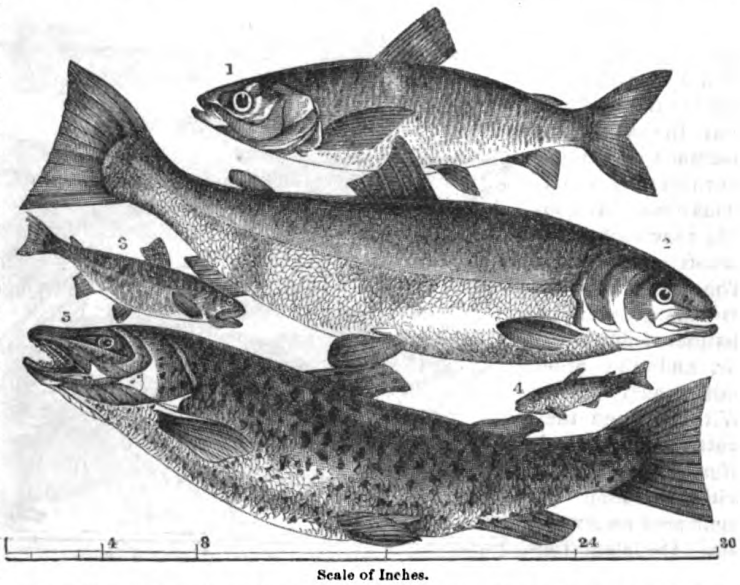
Their teeth are not only always sound, sharp, and exactly fitted for the purpose, according to the instinctive habits of the fish, but they are renewed very quickly when either injured or broken. They are for holding morsels, but not for grinding. Not only the margins of the jaws, but even the tongue and gullet are paved with dental spikes, graduated in size as they recede from the alveolar sockets. Whatever

1. Saury Pike.—2. Common Pike.—3. Common Gar-Fish.—4. Guiana Gar-Fish.—5. Flying-Fish.—These belong to the Pike Family.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1. Brown Cat-Fish.—2. Common Cat-Fish, or Horned Pout.

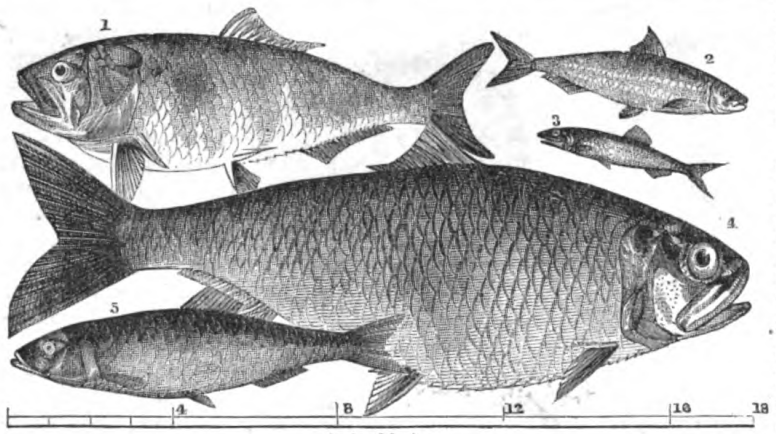
enters must go down. It is almost impossible to disgorge on account of the resistance of the teeth, which are hooks for holding on. By successive muscular contractions about the neck the struggling little fish is finally swallowed whole. Digestion is so exceedingly active that in a few hours even the bones of the victim are dissolved.



Sharks have teeth somewhat like the point of lancets, serrated on their edges rows behind rows, always pushing forward, the new ones displacing the old. They have such important functions to perform in the economy of the sea that sharp tools and a plenty of them are indispensable. Being carnivorous, their stomachs are simply receiving-sacs, in which a fluid is secreted very remarkable for its solvent properties. It melts down almost every thing. Sharks have been caught and opened a few hours after seizing a sailor—scarcely a portion of whom could be identified. Even a pair of thick boots were liquefied very quickly.

The intestinal tube is comparatively short, while the liver, gall-bladder, and those glands which assist in digestion, are large and active. The basking-shark, on the contrary —a monster thirty feet long by some three or four in diameter, feeds only occasionally, and then mainly on drifting sea-weed — is provided with an intestinal tube several times the length of its body, which has a winding staircase, or thin membrane from one end to the other, inside, preventing the too rapid passage of the food. It is obliged to wind its way on an inclined surface of perhaps over one hundred feet before yielding up all its nutritive properties to the absorbents. Monster as he is, in size, the basking-shark has small teeth, is quite harmless, and celebrated for stupidity —sleeping with its back above water, and thus guiding the fishermen to successful enterprise.

Aquatic animals have exceedingly distinct visual organs. Probably they can all see as perfectly well at night as by day. One half of the retina, the immediate point on which images are impinged, is for day use; while the other has a metallic-colored reflecting surface for nocturnal vision.



Some have telescopic eyes, enabling them to perceive objects at great distances through quite turbid water. Others, as the huge white or man-eating shark, has an eye microscopic as well as telescopic. The axis of vision is elongated or shortened according to the hydrostatic pressure. Thus, on rising, the weight of water being less, the eyes become more protuberant; but in diving and following a fear-stricken fish, the deeper the shark descends the more the eyes sink into their sockets; while the humors recede out of the sclerotic coat into a kind of membranous sac — returning back into place again as the shark rises. Distinct visual perception is the same all the while.

A parallel to this beautiful mechanical contrivance to meet the preditory habits of the shark is found in fish-hawks. Resting quietly

1. White Fish of the Lakes.—2. Salmon.—3. Brook Trout.—4. Troutlet.—5. Great Lake Trout of Europe.—These belong to the Salmon Family.

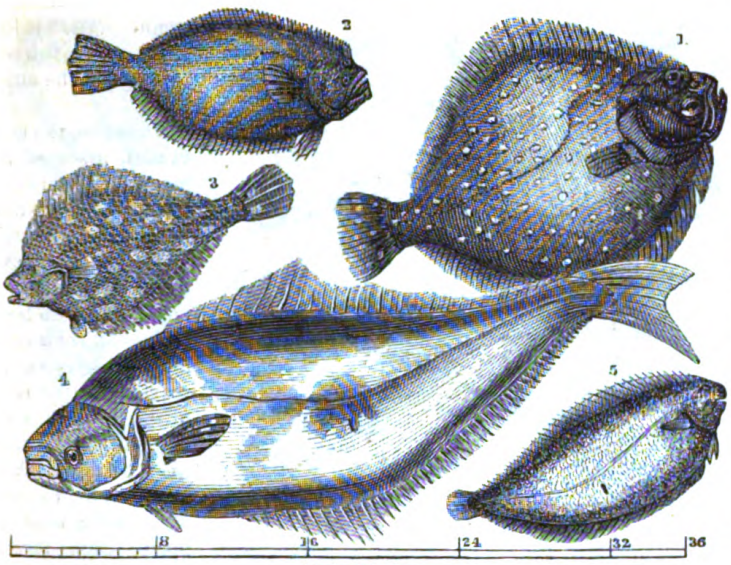
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1. Mossbonker.—2. Pilchard.—3. Anchovy.—4. Shad.—5. Herring.—These belong to the Herring Family.

on their expanded wings a thousand feet above a pond they drop a little oil, sucked from a small nipple at the point where the tail-feathers start, to the water. Probably it gives off an odor which attracts the fish. The hawk watches the movements below with a telescopic eye. As they begin to swim toward the radiating oil the bird begins to descend—calculating exactly so as to secure a marked one with its talons. By a change in the axis of vision, it sees just as distinctly when within an inch of its prey as when floating in the air ten hundred feet above it.

A fish called anableps is quite common in Surinam, which has eyes unlike those of any animal known to naturalists. Usually the cornea, or anterior transparent front of the eye, is convex, being the small segment of a circle of nearly three-quarters of an inch in diameter. The cornea of the anableps resemble two sides of a prism or a three-sided file. Looking down upon the ridge-pole of a house the two sides of the roof present the same appearance as looking down on those anomalous eyes. At ebb-tide they root about in soft mud for food. The upper half of the cornea gives them distinct vision in the air, and the other half under water. With the one they watch the approach of enemies from land; with the other see their prey under water. Opticians furnish glasses for elderly people nearly on the same principle. One-half, or the glass in the upper side of the bow, is for distant vision, and the under half for reading.

Dissections show the nasal nerves are numerous and elaborately spread out over the tissues of those cavities. No doubt the sense of smell is an unerring guide in finding friends or avoiding enemies. Anatomists exhibit the chords that were designed to convey a sense of odors; but naturalists have not studied sufficiently in what particular manner the fish is influenced by them.



Taste appears to be less perfect than any of the special senses; and that inference is drawn from the consideration of the fact that bitter, sweet, sour, or putrid, are indifferently swallowed.

A simple perception of sound must be complete in fishes: They have neither those essential parts of an acoustic apparatus for distributing vibrations extensively, or a brain to analyze them if they had. Hence they can never take pleasure in musical notes. They hear a bell, and may be taught by ringing it to come and be fed. Beyond that nothing more could be accomplished, because they are in a dense medium. Had they more acoustic nervous surface, noises or concussions under water would distract them by their intensity. Let any one

1. Three-Bearded Rockling.—2. Torsk.—3. Haddock.—4. Coal-Fish.—5. Ling.—6. Five-Bearded Rockling.—7. Whiting.—8. Hake.—9. Cod.—These belong to the Cod Family.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

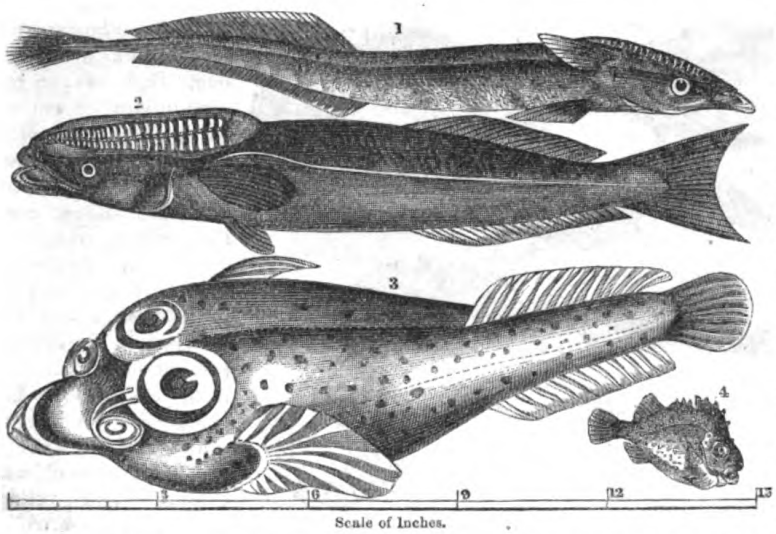
1. Turbot.—2. Flounder.—3. Plaice.—4. Halibut.—5. Sole.—These belong to the Flat-Fish Family.

put his head under water while a companion strikes two stones together, even a mile distant, and it feels like a blow on the head.

The sense of feeling is imperfectly developed. The nose and margin of the lips, in the social fishes, are what they feel with most. Scales, thick and slimy skins, forbid the termination of nervous fibrillæ in them. An impression on any part of their bodies conveys a sensation analogous to feeling, yet it is not distinctly defined. Large numbers of the flat-fishes, suckers, etc., have fleshy tendrils hanging from the tip of the under lip, and sometimes all round the mouth, which subserve the purpose of fingers to touch with, giving a definite sensation.

For gliding with the least degree of friction through water their bodies are admirably constructed. Both extremities of a fish are much smaller than the body, being a vessel in form and in purpose too, as the viscera are within, packed like a cargo. A slimy secretion is constantly oozing out upon the surface to facilitate onward progress. It is the same as being oiled. Eels are proverbial for being slippery; it is almost impossible to hold one by the strongest grip of the hand.

Fishes, then, are living vessels, the keel being on deck instead of underside of the hull; were it below it would often touch ground and be injured in swimming over rocks. The front fins are elementary hands, and the posterior imperfectly developed feet; all the other fins are regarded as cuticular appendages and not always present, but confined to certain species. Sculling with the caudal fluke, precisely as a boat is forced along by one oar at the stern, is the action of the tail. All the others assist merely in turning, rising, falling, backing, or lying quiescently at rest.



Unquestionably fishes sleep. Small as their brains are, nervous influence may be expended as well as in a large one. Before it can reaccumulate or generate more of that power sleep must suspend consciousness. Most of them are without eyelids, sleeping with their eyes open. Although in that condition any impression made on the retina, as by the passing of another fish, instantaneously awakens the sleeper in season to avoid an enemy or a dangerous object. Children and young mammalia grow while they are asleep and quiet. The artisans are then at work in building them up to a full stature. That is a reason why they require so much sleep. Observations on those imprisoned in aquaria, or gold fish in a globe, demonstrate the phenomenon of sleep very unmistakably, if remaining in one exact position for hours is to be taken as one evidence.

With the exception of a little fish called the Stickle-back, which builds a nest for the protection of its young, in the preparation of which the male concurs, no such feeling or sentiment as affection for its young is thought to exist in fishes. Some of them extrude a million of eggs in a single season. They are prolific beyond even the reptiles or insects. No affectionate recognitions are presumed to obtain between the sexes. By an inscrutable instinct salmon and some others find the mouths of rivers once a year, and ascend them great distances to deposit their spawn. Nature requires that law to be obeyed, which has the appearance of a kind of reasoning with reference to the security of the young when they are hatched by the sun's warmth. The male follows the female on those long journeys, fertilizing the eggs by passing over them. Both parents then retire to their ocean home, to return another season, perhaps, to precisely the same locality, as birds do, from the South to the North.

Left, as it were, to chance, their incubation principally depends on solar heat. A few are incubated within the oviduct, and come into the water not only fully able to provide for their immediate wants, but they also exhibit powers that others appear to be a considerable time in acquiring.

The egg of the skate is peculiar in all respects. In the first place, it resembles a hand-barrow. The body is an inch long, half an inch wide, and nearly a quarter of an inch thick in the middle. It is a complete boat, decked

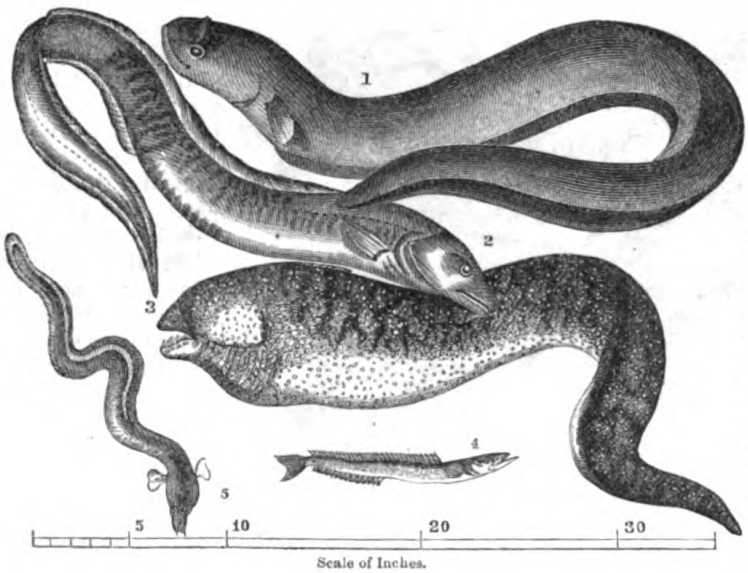
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1. White-Tailed Remora, or Shark Sucker.—2. Common Remora, or Sucking-Fish.—3. Cornish Sucker.—4. Lump Sucker.—These are all Salt-Water Suckers.

over, but slightly convex on the upper side. Not being quite full of albumen, the germ floats on the top. If one of them is capsized, as they are likely to be, floating at random by the waves, the sun's rays roll up two of the projecting handles snug to the end of the boat, which shifts the cargo to that end, changing the centre of gravity, and it very soon rights itself again. The arms then unroll and become straight as before. The four long arms resist the tendency to upset—still, wind and wave united occasionally turn it over. Nature's plan is obvious. The deck is thin and diaphanous, through which the rays of the sun, acting perpendicularly upon it through the middle of the day, quicken the embryotic skate into existence. On this curious property of the shell depends the race of skates.

Others are provided with long, elastic tendrils which cling to weeds, stones, etc., as they float by; and there hold on till the young fish leaves the shell. The egg of the dog-fish is largely supplied with sensitive cordage for keeping the egg securely in one position for the sun's influence till incubation is completed.

Reasoning, or drawing conclusions from any circumstances within the range of experience, fish, like reptiles, insects, and birds, regularly, from one generation to another, without instruction, perform certain acts with precision, which is termed instinct. No advances are made upon the original plan for constructing a nest, for example: it is always a repetition of the same old method. Fish that never ascended a river find a suitable place for the purpose of breeding. Young birds fly to a tropical climate, unerringly, before the winter overtakes them in northern latitudes; and return back again to their old familiar haunts the following spring. Without being taught, or ever having made the journey, if there were but one such bird in New England it would start off alone and find its way, spring and autumn. That is instinct. The fish accomplishes the same feat.



Audubon, the naturalist, asserted, as matter of personal knowledge, that turtles, three hundred miles out at sea from the Florida coast, came to land to deposit their eggs above high-water-mark. After covering them up with their flippers, always in the night, they strike off to sea again for a week or more, then return in the dark and put in another batch, and sometimes return three times. How do they find the place? Finally, as though it were a distinct subject of recollection, the day on which these young turtles begin to break from the shell the mother appears and digs away the sand to liberate them. Her mission terminates by leading them down to the water! Their bodies are formed from the albumen or white of the egg, which is absorbed by the germ, while the yolk remains, either drawn inside their bodies or suspended in a sac outside. In either case, when it is necessary for them to have food, the sachel contracts and forces some of the yolk into the stomach. Thus from time to time are they nourished till the supply is wholly exhausted. That very day their jaws and teeth are sufficiently developed to hunt for their daily food. Young sharks carry the yolk a considerable while in a membranous sac of the shape of a chemical retort, which drops off when their teeth are cut and are strong enough to hold their prey.

There are so many extraordinary mechanical arrangements in different varieties of fish for protecting themselves and for securing food, that but a partial account can be given of them here. The limited acquaintance naturalists have of aquatic life furnish but few materials of a reliable character in reference to their peculiar habits; but enough, however, has been

HORNED RAY, OR SEA-DEVIL

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1. Electric Eel.—2. Conger Eel.—3. Muræna.—4. American Sand-Launce.—5. Sharp-nosed Eel.—These belong to the Eel Family. discovered to convince them that no organic being has been left unprovided without all the positive means of supplying its individual physical necessities, and reproducing an exact type of itself with precisely the same proclivities, the same instincts, the same course of life from infancy to age, from epoch to epoch, while the earth remains in its present form.

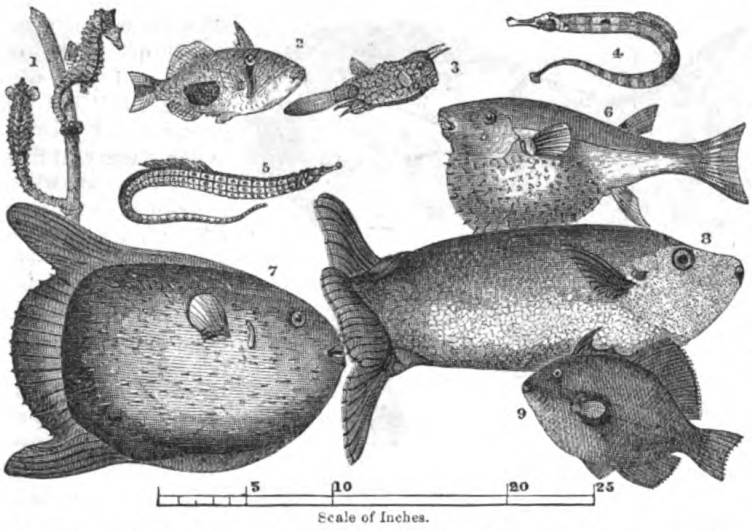
A disgusting-looking fish, popularly called the sea-devil or devil-fish, inhabits the northern Atlantic coast within shallow bays which have soft muddy bottoms. It commonly operates near the channel adjacent to deep water. Perhaps, when fully grown, it may measure two to two and a half feet long. Its body is small and rather slender. But the head is monstrous—all out of proportion to the parts below. So capacious is the mouth the jaws can be opened far enough to take in a man's head. They are thickly studded with long and short teeth, keen as needles, extending all through the throat, yet coming together without having one tooth strike another opposite. Pendulous fleshy tendrils, resembling earth-worms, surround the margin of the mouth, exteriorly, which can be contracted or elongated. Two wicked-looking eyes are set so singularly near the snout that it can have a perfect view of what is transpiring under circumstances which excites our astonishment.

This devil-fish, so diabolical in aspect, is a gourmand, besides consuming enormous quantities of food; and yet, with such a small body, it hardly seems possible. When hungry, it fixes upon a soft spot, where it works down, tail first, till the eyes are just about level with the surface. Then those horrible jaws are thrown wide open, as one would open a porte-monnaie. To all intents and purposes it is a trap, acting precisely on the principle of a large steel trap, but concealed, lying, as each jaw does, either way, level. Instinct teaches the devil-fish the track of the fishes he is fond of. With eyes peering up, every creature passing is critically watched. Next, the tendrils begin to elongate and contract; and it is probable some odor is given off which entices wayfarers to search about for it. Cod, haddock, wolf-fish, and even small sharks, with all their cunning, may occasionally be deceived. On discovering the tendrils, slowly and leisurely, a cod, for example, settles down; and just as his snout comes within the circumference of the jaws up snap both, pinning the gills and holding the entrapped prisoner with a grip which neither floundering nor struggling can relieve.



As soon as the captured fish is dead the devil-fish commences sucking off the flesh. A large cod is thus consumed very speedily, and after the fripon has had sufficient rest from fatigue, and fairly digested his dinner, he comes out of the mud and seeks for another favorable position for game again.

A fish is found in the Atlantic and Mediterranean bearing the name of remora, which has

1. Glutinous Hag.—2. Mud Lamprey.—3. Common Lamprey.—4. Lancelot.—These belong to the Lamprey Family.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

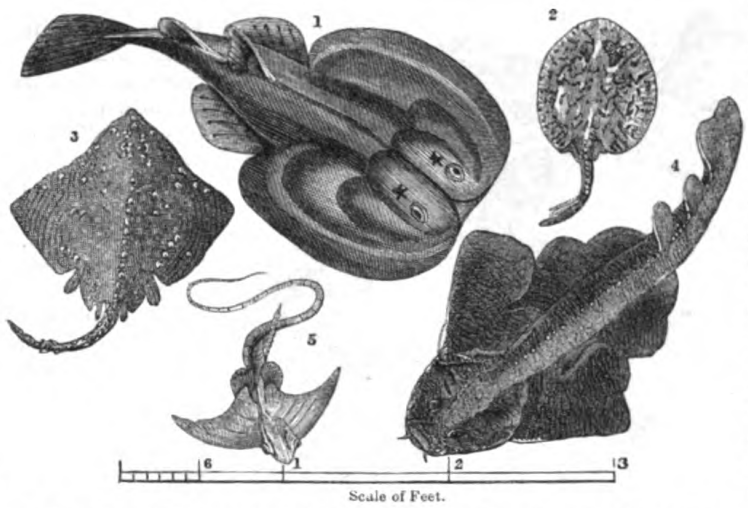
1. Hudson River Sea-Horse.—2. Indian File-Fish.—3. Horned Ostracion.—4. Great Pipe-Fish.—5. Needle-Fish.—6. Globe Fish.—7. Short Sun-Fish.—8. Oblong Sun-Fish.—9. File-Fish.—These are all Soft-Rayed Fishes.

an oval disk on the top of the head, perhaps four inches long by one and a half to two inches wide, where the body is one foot and a half long. Externally it resembles the slats of a Venetian window-blind. It is an air-pump. Very frequently fine specimens of the remora are found adhering to the bottoms of vessels, having been thus drawn along through the water for hundreds of miles. They fasten upon whales, or indeed any passing fish they happen to see, when the whim for a ride overtakes them. They do not appear to injure those they impose themselves upon, beyond frightening them into a rapid movement, which may perhaps be an agreeable pastime to the rider.

At the battle of Actium, from some unknown cause, Mark Antony's ship could not be rowed out of its position. Probably some part of the bottom dragged in the mud. But the cause was imputed to the remora—holding the vessel motionless against the combined efforts of several hundred sailors. It is related that a remora fastened his air-pump on the rudder of a trireme, the great war-boat of the ancients, when Caligula, the Roman emperor, was on board, holding it so tenaciously that four hundred seamen could not propel the vessel forward against the resistance of a single fish of this extraordinary family. However powerfully its head may adhere it would be impossible that its fins could present much resistance, and therefore the foregoing relations are to be regarded as entirely fabulous although recorded by a grave historian.

Another, the lumpfish, Cyclopterus lumpus, occasionally weighing seven pounds, has an air-pump formed by the ventral fins, oval shape, of considerable size, by which it holds on a rock, or indeed on whatever it chooses, with such strength that when put into a pail of water the whole—water, pail, and all—may be lifted up by the tail without breaking the hold. Seals are fond of them, but invariably reject the skin.

In the East Indies there is a perch, Anabas scandens, which leaves the water for hours together for the pleasure of climbing trees! For a long while this assertion was questioned by naturalists; but statements are so well authenticated that the existence of the climbing perch is now a settled fact. They wander from the water through the grass, and can live six days in the open air. Jugglers make use of them in the performance of some of their curious exhibitions, which appeared to be beyond the hope of a reasonable explanation, till science demonstrated, what they have known from immemorial time, that the anabas has a provision in its structure for carrying water enough to meet the demands of the circulation, several days in succession, while out of the water.



In the Chinese seas a small fish is very common, which is caught and kept in aquaria for the amusement of seeing how admirably it will bring down flies by spirting a little stream of water. Its aim is so accurate that as a fly is passing over it, a few inches above the surface, the aquatic arrow wets the wings and down it falls. The little sportsman instantly swallows the game. It is the Chelmon rostratus. The beak or nose is eked out into the form of a tube, through which a drop is forced by the compression of the mouth. One species of the Chætodon rostratus, called the "archer" (Toxotes jaculator), will throw water through its snout three and four feet at insects resting on leaves, grass, and plants bending over the bank, rarely missing the mark.

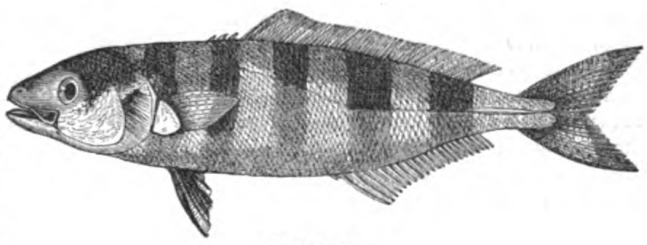
LONG-BEAKED CHELMON.

Electrical eels and rays, on the whole, have engaged more attention than almost any other fish. The shocks they can give at pleasure equal some of the best modern apparatus. Their stored-up electricity is emitted with a force that will decompose chemical compounds

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1. Torpedo.—2. Many-spined Trygon.—3. Thornback Ray.—4. Angel-Fish.—5. Whip-Ray.—All belonging to the Ray Family.

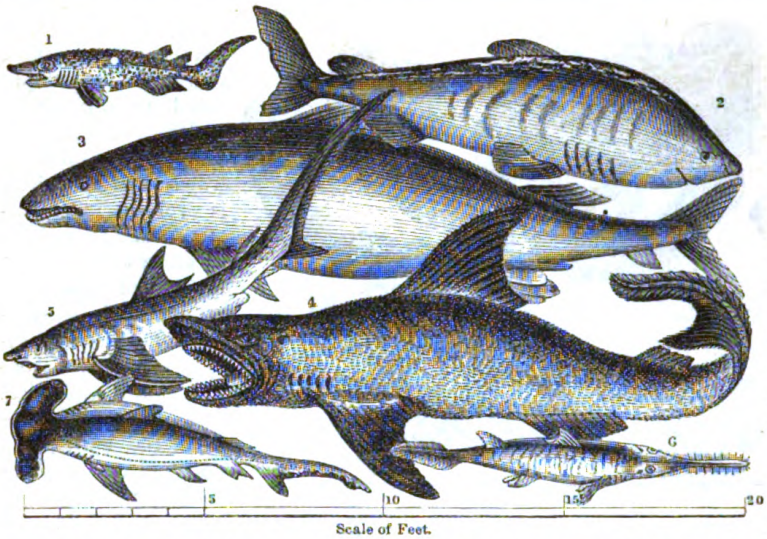
and magnetize steel needles. Specimens of the largest size (Gymnotus electricus) are taken in Surinam. One four feet long, placed in a watering trough temporarily while a tub was preparing for its reception, knocked down three stout mules, which just touched the water where they were accustomed to drink, upon their knees. Under precisely the same circumstances they have killed a horse. Usually they attain a length of about four feet in South America. Specimens are frequently brought alive to the United States, but their electrical powers are rarely excited so far at the north as New York. A large one, apparently in excellent condition, was brought to Boston a few years since, which could not be teased into gratifying his learned spectators with a show of its characteristic force.



Indians drive horses into marshy places inhabited by electrical eels, in order to bring the fish into position for capturing them. Generally the gymnotus flies to the belly of the horse, and gives freedom to its whole electrical power. The poor benumbed horses fall as quickly as though they were shot. Often the horses are killed. At the instant of discharging the battery the Indians—knowing from observation a little time is required to charge for another shock—with harpoons and poles and other contrivances, throw cords round them, and then by a sudden jerk haul them out of the water. If the cord gets wet they are apt to receive severe admonitions.

This electrical property is doubtless given them for the twofold purpose of security against enemies and for securing food.

Another singularly-looking fish, thin, broad, and with a long tail more like a quadruped's than ordinary caudal terminations of fishes, is the Thornback (Raja clavata), which also benumbs by an electrical shock. Nothing can be more complicated or difficult to understand than the organic apparatus by which their electricity is evolved. Comparative anatomists have carefully dissected the brain, and shown the symmetrical distribution of nerves on either side which conducts the electrical fluid—if it is fluid—from the brain; yet no one can demonstrate what action takes place in the ganglia of the brain to give a discharge of electricity, nor is it probable they ever will. Nature conducts many of her vital operations so secretly that physiologists have not been able to solve many problems of the highest interest in natural philosophy.



Sea porcupines, belonging to the families of the Diodon and Tetraodon, are covered extensively with sharp thorns, which can be laid down flat or made erect. They have a singular air-tank capable of prodigious distension, so that at will they can puff themselves up like a bladder, which throws the spine out at right angles. When the bladder is empty they are not very thick; but when alarmed, or preparing for capturing a fish for food, they suddenly become an almost perfect ball of needles. In that condition sometimes several of them are, in company, thrown upon their backs, floating leisurely near the surface, and occasionally by the waves thrown out a little way, resembling a mass of froth as seen at a distance.

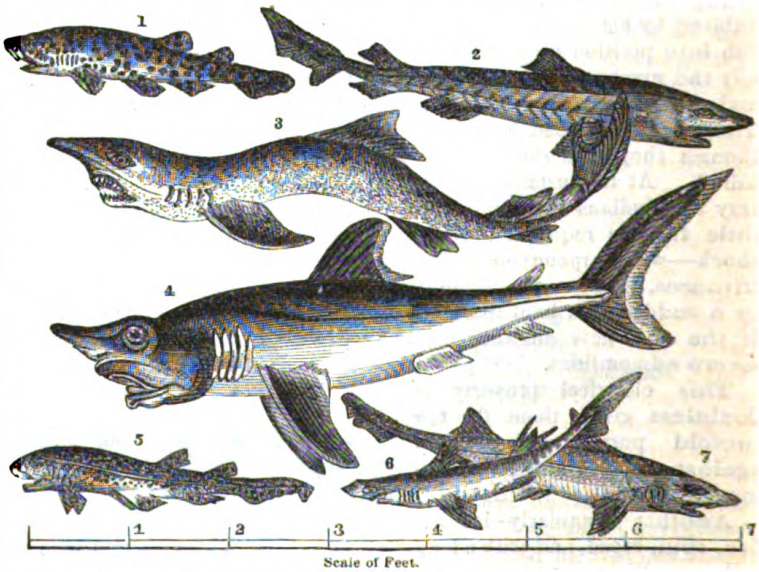
It seems they put themselves thus on purpose to entice large, voracious wanderers to open their wide jaws to take in the mass. As they feel the jaws coming together each one prepares for the occasion, bracing so as to have their thorns forced into the soft parts of the mouth. It is impossible to swallow them or eject them. Intense pain and irritation follow, of course. In the mean time the voluntary prisoners gnaw away into the inflamed flesh. Death soon relieves the unfortunate

PILOT-FISH.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1. Spinous Shark.—2. Greenland Shark.—3. Basking Shark.—4. White Shark.—5. Fox Shark, or Thresher.—6. Saw-Fish.—7. Hammer-headed Shark.—Shark Family.

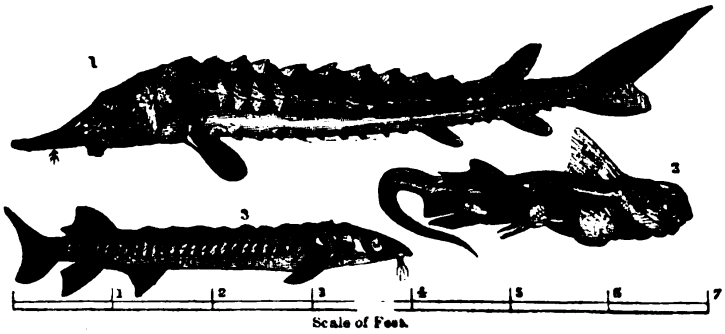
fish which has been thus deceived. By the time the wicked porcupines have feasted sufficiently decomposition is far enough advanced to allow them to escape from their dining-room, blow themselves up anew, and prepare for another entertainment.



Some of the predaceous inhabitants of the sea are provided with formidable instruments for slaughter. Conscious of their ability for carrying on destructive warfare against those which can only protect themselves by outswimming their terrific enemies, or resisting their attacks by the hardness of their scales, plates, or other exterior covering, their hostility is notorious.

A sword-fish is a familiar example of a fighting-fish, abounding extensively on our coast from Norfolk, Virginia, to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, but most numerous in the neighborhood of Nantucket and the waters of Narraganset Bay. Some of them attain a length of twenty feet. They have no mercy upon whales, and it seems to afford them peculiar pleasure to swim under the monster's belly and thrust their swords into the soft parts their entire length. No efforts are wanting on the part of the whale to get beyond the foe by rapid voltings, but the sword-fish watches for a chance to repeat the stab, and thus finally kill him.

The sword of Xyphius gladius is a prolongation of the upper jaw, terminating in a point. Its edges are thin, and, with the force given to it when the fish stabs, is sufficient to cut its way through very hard bones. They can drive clear through a shark. When roused to madness, as they doubtless are by the sight of particular individuals of the sea, they never relax till they conquer. Marine assassin is an appropriate name. They are excellent food, so much so that a regular system of sword-fish fishing is pursued in this country, and barrels of their salted flesh are sent to market.



In a calm day in the summer of 1832, on the coast of Massachusetts, a pilot was rowing his little skiff leisurely along, when he was suddenly roused from his seat by a thrust from below by a sword-fish, who drove his sharp instrument more than three feet up through the bottom. With rare presence of mind, with the butt of an oar, he broke it off level with the floor before the fish had time to withdraw it. Fortunately the plunge was not directly upward. Had it been so the frail boat would have been destroyed.

A Boston ship hauled up on the ways for repair, a few years since, presented the shank

1. Large-spotted Dog-Fish.—2. Tope, or Penny-Dog.—3. Blue Shark.—4. Porbeagle.—5. Small-spotted Dog-Fish.—6. Piked Dog-Fish.—7. Smooth Hound.—Shark Family.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1. Common Sturgeon.—2. Northern Chimæra.—3. American Lake Sturgeon. —These are representatives of the Sturgeon and Chimæra Families.

of a sword-fish's dagger, which had been driven considerably far into the solid oak plank. A more curious affair was brought to light in 1725, in overhauling his Majesty's ship Leopard, from the coast of Africa. The sword of this marine spearsman had pierced the sheathing one inch; next it went through a three-inch plank, and, beyond that, three inches and a half into the firm timber. It was the opinion of the mechanics that it would have required nine strokes of a hammer weighing twenty-five pounds to drive an iron bolt of the same dimensions to the same depth in the hull. Yet the fish drove it in at a single thrust. Their force in making an attack must be tremendous.

On the return of the whale-ship Fortune to Plymouth, Massachusetts, in 1827, the stump of a sword-blade of this fish was noticed projecting like a cog outside, which, on being traced, had been driven through the copper sheathing; an inch-board under-sheathing; a three-inch plank of hard wood; the solid white oak timber, twelve inches thick; then through another two-and-a-half inch hard oak ceiling; and, lastly, penetrated the head of an oil-cask, where it stuck, not a drop of the oil having escaped.

The saw-fish, which attains the length of ten and twelve feet, has great muscular strength, which it appears to exert capriciously, very much like the sword-fish. It seldom approaches very near the land, but confines its movements far at sea and in deep water, where the largest of the marine inhabitants also are to be found.

Instead of being a dagger-shaped nasal spear the bones of the two sides of the upper jaw, called by comparative anatomists maxillary, are continued forward beyond the curve of the under jaw, but uniting so as to be one thin blade, sometimes over four feet in length, five inches wide at the butt and tapering toward the distal extremity to two inches, two and a half, and sometimes a little more. An ivory paper-folder, thick at the shank and gradually becoming thinner and narrower at the further end, gives a very good idea of the shape. On the thin edge, all round, there are sharp, enameled teeth, about an inch long, set in sockets, standing out at right angles. They are regarded as the proper teeth of the upper jaw carried off from the mouth—a very extraordinary departure from the type of the dental apparatus in general. But thus arranged it is calculated to produce fearful wounds, sawing its way, as it were, though rather tearing through the flesh of those into which it is driven.

As the mouth is comparatively small, beset with small teeth which are holders for retaining morsels and not for mastication, writers are not well enough acquainted with the habits of the Pristis antiquorum to determine whether it slaughters with its saw-knife for the sake of leisurely feeding upon its victim, or whether it drinks the flowing blood as it runs from the terrible wounds it inflicts.

Seamen have furnished naturalists with some interesting facts, which show that they attack whales, ripping them open and pursuing them as they flee in terror, repeat the stabs till they die from exhaustion and the loss of blood. Reasoning from analogy, it is probable that their function is to keep down the too great multiplication of the various species of whales and other marine monsters, as the sharks do the smaller varieties of marine animals; and in doing so they furnish immense quantities of food both for fish and birds, which are thus provided for from the floating carcasses of the gigantic monarchs of the sea. Beyond question there are such provisions in nature, or, in the process of time, the ocean would be in the exclusive possession of a few species, to the destruction of all the inferior orders that now tenant it so universally. Occasionally specimens of the saw-fish may be seen in museums and cabinets of learned societies. The saws, sawn off at the jaw, are very common in barbers' shops, curiosity shops, etc., brought home by sailors, principally from Brazil, yet they are taken all over the globe.

A remarkable fish is found in Lake Pepin, on the Upper Mississippi River, called the paddle-nosed shark. Some of the largest specimens are about three feet long. The color is a palish slate. Instead of the superior maxillary bones being elongated into a spear, as in the sword-fish, or a saw, as exhibited in the saw-fish, the upper jaw is carried onward beyond the mouth in a thin sheet of reticulated bone, and terminates in the shape of a paddle. When the skin is taken off the frame of the paddle is an object of peculiar interest, from the extraordinary interlacing of the bone-web, by which lightness and strength are secured. How the paddle is used, whether for defense or for aggression, is not known. Why it is called a shark is also a question. If it is voracious, and exhibits the characteristics of marine sharks,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

there may be some reason for its name. Fresh-water sharks would be an anomaly, even in the great rivers or lakes of the United States.

When the lake is smooth, in the middle of the day, through the summer months, those strangely formed fishes are seen from the steamboats, leaping and vaulting out of the water, precisely as porpoises play at sea, as though they were sporting. Their curves and plunges are very graceful, and a source of pleasant amusement to travelers. A few specimens have been caught in the Ohio River, where they bear the name of spoon-bills.

In the anatomy of some of the fishes the swimming-bladder is both large and strong, and located close to the spine. One-fourth of all the various tribes, according to recent authorities, are without it, very many have it completely closed at both extremities, so that it is always full of confined air. But a large proportion of those in which it exists can distend or empty it at pleasure. To do so the air escapes through a pipe communicating with the gullet. In the herring a tube connects it with the stomach. Nitrogen is generally found in the sac. In those which descend to very great depths the distending gas is chiefly oxygen. By compressing the swimming-bladder, for which there are appropriate muscles, the fish is able to rise or sink quickly. All the small variety of eels, as well as flat-fish, such as flounders, soles, etc., are without the bladder. In the cod it is large and strong, and an important article of food, sold under the name of sounds. In commerce immense quantities are packed in barrels and shipped extensively. When fish leave deep cold water suddenly, and rise near the surface in extremely warm weather, the confined air of the bladder expands to such an extent as to force a portion of it out at the mouth, there being the least resistance in that direction. It being impossible for them to descend in that condition, they are easily caught with a balloon floating on the water which they can not drag under.

No reference has thus far been made to the fisheries as an important branch of national industry. It is a subject that should command the attention of merchants. We have confined ourselves in the foregoing article to some of the prominent points in the structure and characteristics of the representatives of a few families only. And not so much with an expectation of adding to the amount already accumulated by men of science on ichthyology, as for the purpose of showing that this field is an inviting one for investigation, and by no means yet exhausted.

AQUARIUM.

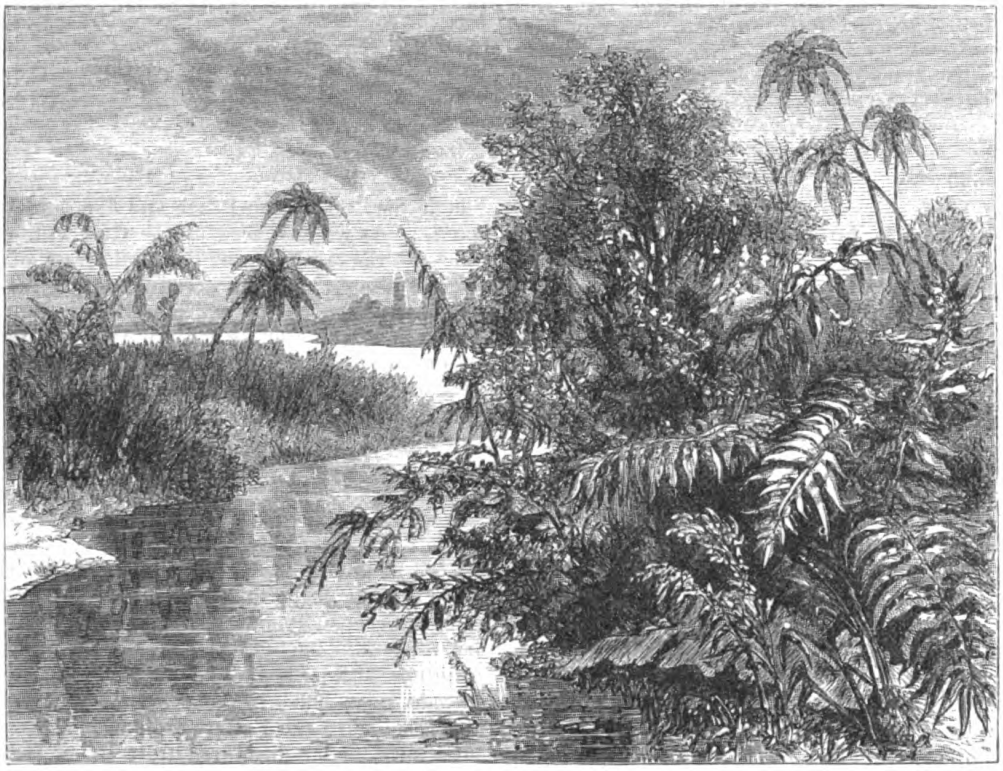
Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CALCUTTA, THE CITY OF PALACES.

CALCUTTA.—THE LANDING-PLACE.

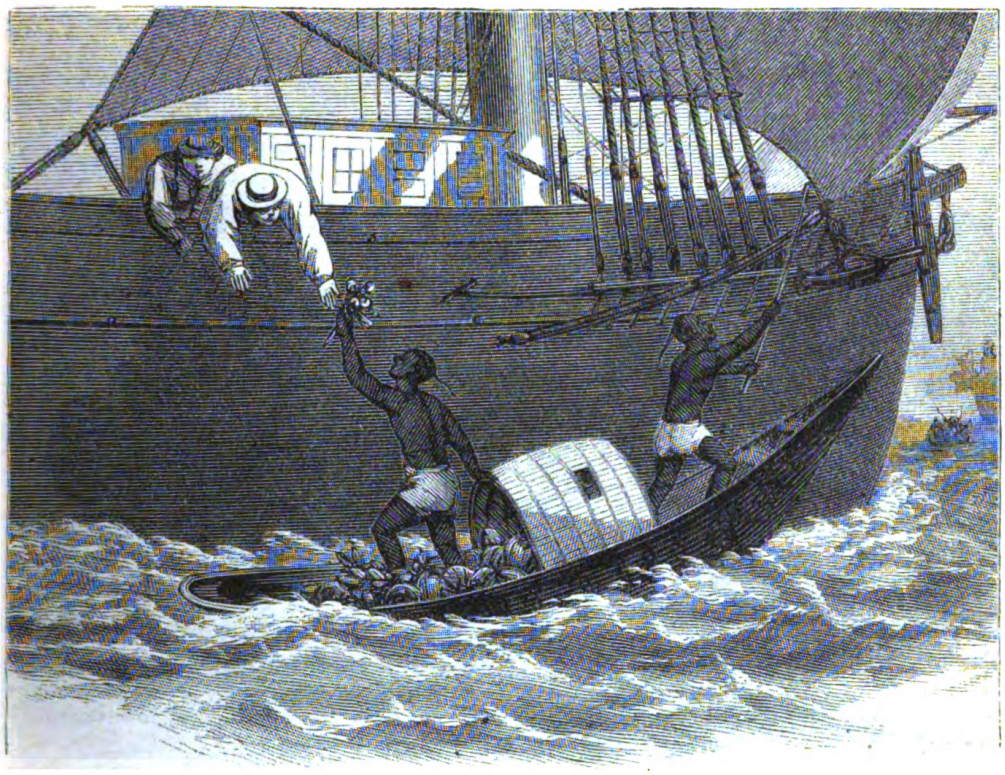
ONE of the most remarkable peculiarities that strike the traveler approaching the shores of Bengal is the extreme depression of the coast. It is indeed so low and flat that the fringe of surf along the shore prevents the land from being seen at all at any distance, and one might imagine himself in the middle of the ocean until the vessel is sailing up the mouth of the Hoogly, and the uniform growth of bamboo that marks the limit of the land can be distinguished from the deck. This is the far-famed jungle of India. At the mast-head it can be seen stretching inland as far as the eye can reach, intersected by the numerous mouths of the Ganges.

The Hoogly reminded me of some of our Southern rivers—its broad, turbid current and low marshy shores being almost identical in appearance with the Lower Mississippi. But the cocoa-nut trees and tropical foliage that occasionally rise from a bed of closely-matted reeds and cane weaken the illusion, which is completely dispelled by the unmistakably East Indian scenery of Garden Reach and James and Mary's. As we advanced up the river with a fair wind, the tide running out at the rate of several miles an hour, we were set upon by the bum-boats, numbers of which were hovering about the mouth waiting for the vessel. As but one boat is allowed for each ship there is great competition among the crews of the different craft, and their dexterity in securing their huge prizes is something truly wonderful: shooting down upon the vessel, to strike which would insure swift and inevitable destruction, they yet manage so close a shave that the native in the boat contrives to hook his painter into the fore or main chains of the ship. The end of the rope being thus secured, and the remainder wrapped about his body, the bum-boat man clings for dear life to his dingywallah until he succeeds in arresting its progress. For a few anas I succeeded in procuring a supply of fruit peculiar to the Eastern tropics, immense pine-apples, and a little red fruit called the Jack-fruit, which somehow reminded me of our



Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ENTRANCE TO THE HOOGLY.



tomatoes, but which, unlike the tomato, is one of the sweetest and most cloying fruits to be found in the world.

The approach to Calcutta, after coming to Garden Reach, is very fine and picturesque—a broad expanse of glittering water surrounded

SCENE ON THE HOOGLY.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BUM-BOAT.

by beautiful masses of verdure, among which gleam stately buildings. The river is filled with the quaintest of craft, covered with white awnings. The natives are dark, almost to blackness, and present every variety of Indian costume and feature.

In one of them I thought I had certainly discovered a descendant of a worthy, whose history possessed a thrilling interest for one to whom as yet Alexander the Great and Napoleon Bonaparte were unknown names. I mean no less an individual than the renowned Bluebeard himself. His present representative was compressed into the person of an old fellow stretched like a frog on a wooden shoe on the bow of his queerly-shaped craft, gravely smoking a cocoa-nut shell. His long beard of sky-blue was brushed backward toward his ears; but he was as bald as an egg, and his bare head was unsheltered by hat or turban. Whether the natives affect these outre colors in respect to their beards—I have seen them of green and purple besides blue—or whether the dye they use to blacken and rejuvenate their locks, is uncertain; though it is possible, in view of the peculiar modes that now obtain in Paris with respect to coloring the hair of ladies and lap-dogs, that we have here a confirmation of the old saying that there is nothing new under the sun. Be that as it may, the practice is not very common here, though an instance of the kind may be met sufficiently often to elicit remark.

A custom much more prevalent among the natives is that of painting their faces, which they do in red and white stripes, something after the pattern of the American flag, as a sign that they have been making poojah; which, being interpreted, signifies worshiping one of their gods. I saw some women, also, in the boats; one had a small ring in her nose, and another a large bit of glass glued to her forehead in the way of ornament.

The usual landing-place—Champaul Ghaut—consists of a handsome stone esplanade with a flight of spacious steps leading to the water, which is reached through a gateway consisting of an arch supported by pillars. Immediately in front of this edifice spreads a wide plain consisting of grass-plots intersected by broad Macadamized drives, bordered and shaded by trees. This is called indifferently the "Esplanade" or the "Maidan." It comprises a plain of about a hundred and fifty acres in extent, and lies between the city proper and "Garden Reach," so called because of its beautiful country seats surrounded by gardens. Around this superb quadrangle the European portion of Calcutta east of the fort is built in what is called the Chowringhee Quarter. The streets in this portion of the city are wide and handsome. The buildings being for the most part low, detached from one another, abounding in pillared colonnades, verandas, and porches, with Venetian blinds, and clustering together, seated, so to speak, on banks of shrubbery and flowers, under the shade of forest trees, seem like their inmates to have donned their summer attire, which, in this

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BLACK TOWN, CALCUTTA.

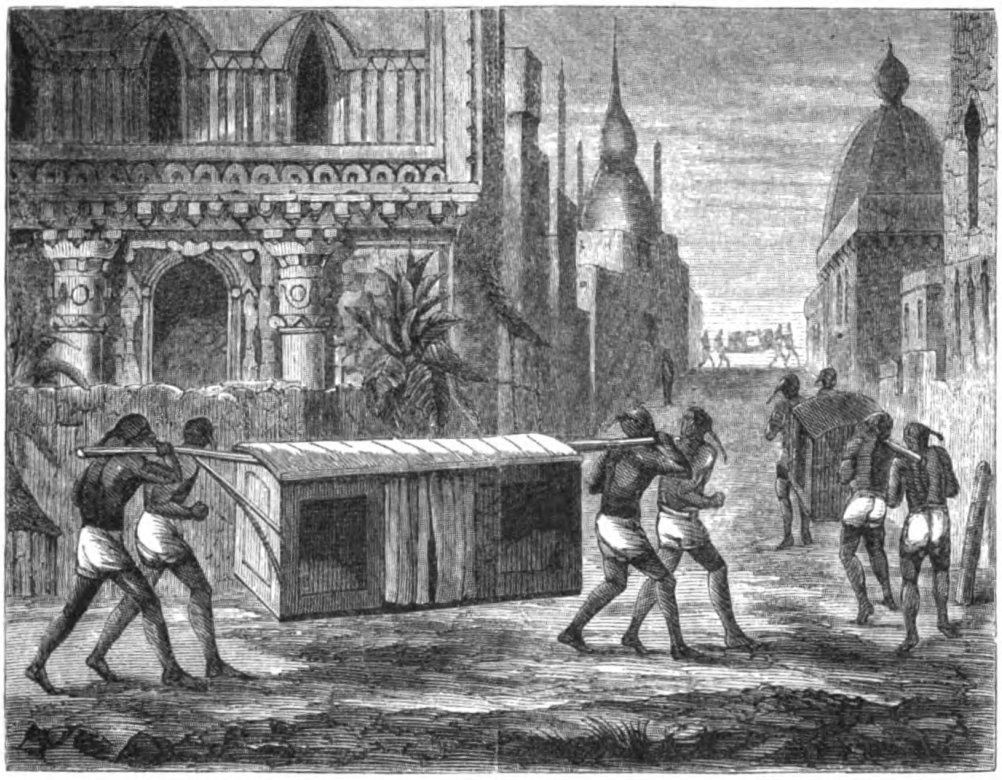
"land of the sun," is seldom put off for any other. Surrounded and nestling in their beds of foliage they look like summer-houses in some vast park; and together with the princely country houses of the merchants give to Calcutta its name, "The City of Palaces."

The Maidan contains Fort William, the principal defense of Calcutta, and the strongest in India. It was begun by Lord Clive, that strange, impetuous, and unfortunate man of genius, to whom England, more than to any other one man, owes her empire in India. It is now something more than a century since its foundation after the battle of Plassey, before which time Calcutta itself was called Fort William—a name still retained in Parliamentary documents. It requires for defense six hundred pieces of cannon and an army of some ten thousand troops.

The residence of the Governor-General fronts upon the Maidan, and is an imposing structure, consisting of semicircular galleries two in number, placed back to back, and meeting in a central hall. The structure is supported by stately rows of columns, and crowned by a dome. It is considered the finest building in Calcutta. There is the usual contrast to be met here, as in other Eastern cities, of squalor and magnificence, intensified, however, by the European element, which here predominates. In other cities in India beggary, filth, disease, and wretchedness have every thing pretty much their own way; but in Calcutta the opulence and display of the wealthier portions of the city bring the contrasting elements of poverty and dirt into stronger relief.

Black Town, as it is called—the native portion of the city—though anxiously thrust away from sight by the aristocratic and splendid metropolis, like a dirty garment under a gaudy silk robe, lies closely by this architectural display, and insists on asserting itself beneath the very shadow and in the august presence of English Calcutta. A mud hut, or clusters of native hovels, are plastered like wasps' nests against the sides of palaces, and there are back slums and perspectives of indescribable squalor and filth opening out from the principal avenues.

This background of every thing that is repulsive and horrible is peculiar to India. It crops out every where, and seems to breathe in the very atmosphere. The earth reeks with pollution, and the heavens are offended by the smoke of abominable sacrifices. Imagination is tortured to conceive of new enormities, and the perfection of evil to which a vast people have attained seems rather to be the teaching of some fiend than the mere result of mankind's natural evil propensities. Crime in India is a most refined and exquisite art. Perfect evil is the summit of religious aspiration, and successful fraud of earthly ambition. The structure of society is most ingeniously arranged to oppose the entrance of any good or truth into the system which Paganism and superstition have erected in India; and, in short, we have in this vast peninsula the most perfect instance on record of the complete inversion of all natural and



Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A DEVOTEE.

moral laws. Intellect has not been wanting in the development of Hindoo philosophy, but there has been no moral, no divinely revealed force to restrain and direct its efforts, and the result is, in one word, "India." It is a consciousness of this that haunts the traveler at every step of his journey in this Eastern land, and makes him turn from the luxuriance of splendid tropical life about him with pious thankfulness to the comparative barren hills of New England, where civilization, taught and chastened by the spirit of Christianity, leads the intellect to greater heights and more sublime views than was ever dreamed of by all the boasted learning of the East.

Landing at Calcutta, the stranger is at once surrounded by a brawling multitude of natives, whose strange and unfamiliar appearance, and still more strange and unintelligible language and gestures, tend not a little to a condition of bewilderment and helplessness. This, unless they are stoutly resisted, is taken advantage of by the naked black rascal porters and pickpockets by profession, who crowd, jostle, and take possession of the unfortunate traveler's person and effects, thrusting the former unceremoniously into a

A PALKEE.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ZIG-ZAG LANE.

"palkee," or Eastern substitute for the now obsolete sedan-chair, while the latter are distributed among a multitude of the natives, and the whole procession takes up its march for the hotel.

The palkee or palanquin is a black japanned box about six or seven feet long by three feet high. It has a sliding door at the side. The inside contains cushions. Altogether there is an uncomfortable similarity to a coffin in it, to one lying at full length borne along the streets inclosed on all sides by the box-like structure. The bearers have a peculiar swinging gait which prevents any jolting from being perceptible.

Servants in Calcutta are, generally, Mussulmans. They speak nothing but Hindoostanee, and a new arrival is often reduced to dumb show with his servant in order to make his wants understood. Notwithstanding the constant and long-continued intercourse between the Hindoos and Europeans very few of the former can speak any language but their own; and it is a notorious fact that those who do—in the greater majority of cases descendants of a mixture of English or Portuguese and native races—are the most untrustworthy rogues to be found among this most unreliable of peoples.

While I was at the hotel near the Town-hall, I received a visit from the captain of the vessel upon which I had come to Calcutta. He was something of a character:—a Bengalee, who had been brought up and educated in the "Land of Cakes," and consequently, to all intents and purposes, a Scotchman, though he was as black as a crow. The effect of education was never more apparent to me than when I compared this canny, broad-spoken Scotch Presbyterian with his native heathen brethren, against whom he himself seemed to entertain the most inveterate dislike and undying prejudice. Totally blind to the inconsistency of his expressions, he constantly spoke of them with horror as "puir offscouring of fiends and black niggers, worshipers of the warst devils in Tophet." He used to contend that they had no souls, and were "a' just born, like ilka ither beast, for the use of Christian men." Whether he considered that he had made the acquisition of the article in question by virtue of his identification with the white race, or whether he sup-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

posed that, in common with his ancestors, he possessed none at all, I never ventured to inquire; for any reference to his peculiarity of race or complexion I have always considered would have been received by him as a mortal offense.

I had become acquainted with him at the gold-diggings of Australia, where we were engaged in mutual speculations, and finally in a venture of a ship-load of horses to be shipped at Port Jackson for Bengal. It turned out rather a poor speculation, but I have never regretted it, as being the occasion of my visiting this great Eastern metropolis.

Sandy Musjeed, the gentleman in question—suggesting in his name the odd anomaly of his character and origin—wished to find some friends of his; in fact, no less persons than the surviving members of the family which had been instrumental in sending him, while yet little more than an infant, taken from the arms of his dead mother, a servant in the house, to Aberdeen, to be made a Scotchman of. I had before leaving Sydney possessed myself, through a mutual acquaintance, with letters to the family in question, from whom I received a cordial welcome. The Captain, however, was evidently considered a protégé by the genial colonists, and was made much of accordingly. It was his first visit to what was in reality his native land, though every thing about him must have appeared as unfamiliar as it did to myself. Through these people, without having recourse to my packet of letters, I formed quite an extensive acquaintance among the "old settlers" and families of Calcutta, and can cheerfully and honestly give in my verdict of their being the most genial and attractive people I ever met. I was surprised to encounter in this society natives who had adopted European customs and costumes, at least externally, and engaged in analogous pursuits to those about them. Indeed native capital is quite extensively invested in English houses, and, at least for the rather questionable qualities of shrewdness in overreaching a customer, the Hindoo yields to none.

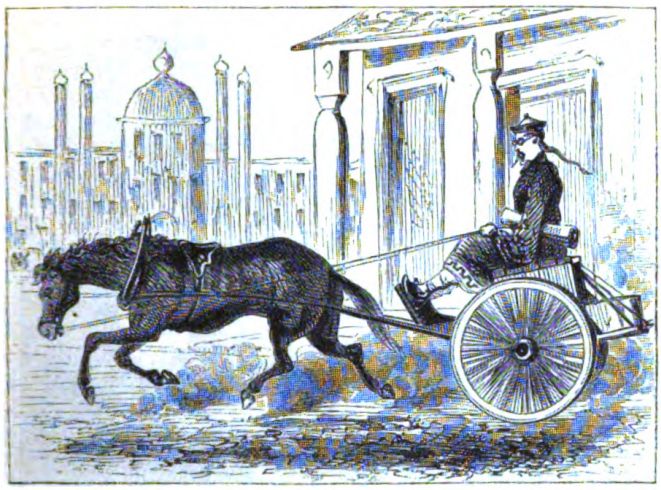
Nothing is more remarked by a stranger in Calcutta than the early hours kept by its citizens. "Early to bed and early to rise" becomes here a rule, as much enforced by necessity as recommended by general precept and example. There is no theatre or evening amusement of any kind. The shops are all closed, the streets deserted, the servants gone home; and by nine or ten o'clock every one has retired and most are asleep. At earliest dawn, on the other hand, and even before, the Maidan and the Circular Road that surrounds the city are thronged with vehicles of every description, and ladies and gentlemen on horseback taking their morning ride before breakfast, presenting a scene something like that of our own Central Park on a Saturday afternoon.

Accepting an invitation to accompany some friends, among whom was Captain Sandy, to an early drive on the Esplanade, I arose at what to me was the rather unseasonable hour of half past four o'clock, and joined the Captain at his Chota Hazree, or refection before breakfast, consisting generally of a cup of cof-

SAILORS ASHORE.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A COLLISION.



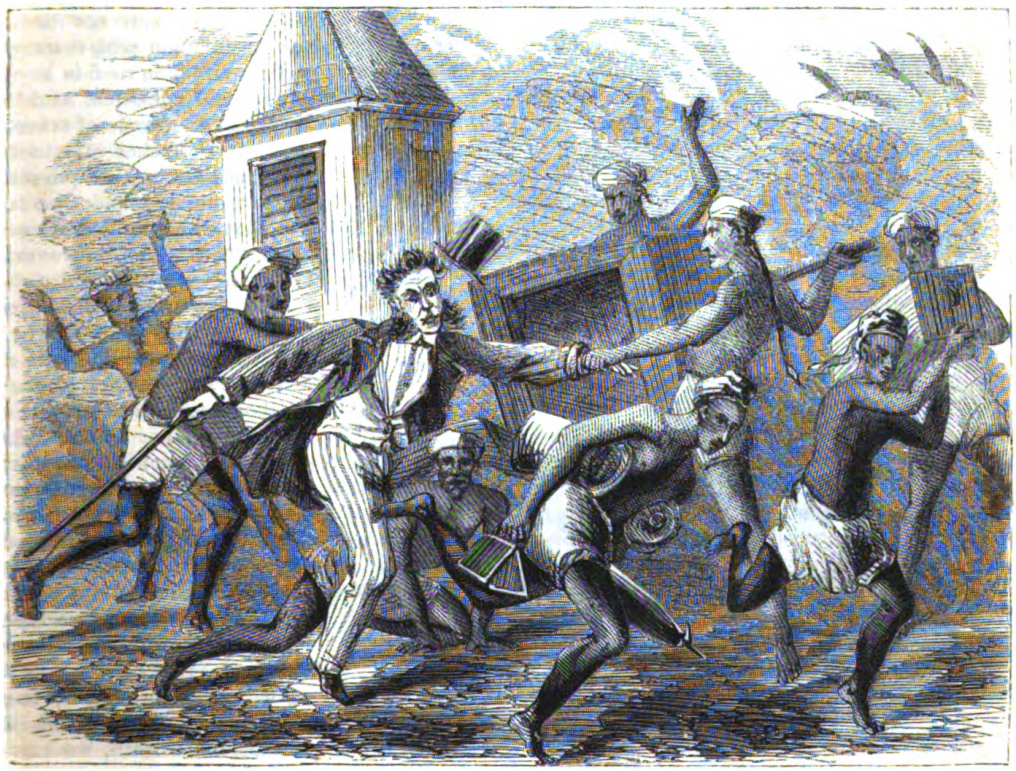
fee and a bit of toast. "Big breakfast," as the native Circars call it, takes place at about nine o'clock, and is quite a substantial meal. The drive merits a separate description in itself, and is a feature in Calcutta life. The equipages present a variety and magnificence that may well challenge comparison with any other in the civilized world. The cool, dewy freshness of early morning—a luxury not often indulged in or appreciated in other cities—has here a peculiarly invigorating and freshening effect that braces the system for the long and otherwise unendurably hot day that is to follow.

Entering the Strand, the largest of the Maidan roads, it is scarcely possible to exaggerate the animation and variety of the scene presented to our eyes. Every inhabitant of the city, rich or poor, seemed to have rigged up some kind of a turn-out and taken his place with his fellows. Some of the groups we passed on the road were very picturesque, and sometimes irresistibly comic: the coachmen in their native dress, their long beards streaming in the wind; the ladies in their gay dresses, only outshone by the picturesque attire of some native prince dashing along at full speed, accompanied by fleet-footed syces. These syces, or Mussulmans grooms, accompany every carriage, and, it is said, will often surpass the horses they follow in bottom and endurance. They are a fine, swarthy, muscular set of men, dressed in short jackets and a lightly-wound middle-cloth, which leaves their limbs at liberty. They wear a fez, or flat turban, with a long tassel of horsehair, and carry in their hands a goat's tail fitted in a handle, with which they keep the flies from troubling the horses. The natives vie with and even outstrip the Europeans in the display of neat turn-outs, some of the baboos, or native merchants, expending fortunes upon their stable appointments and equipages.

In contrast with these there were a great many native attempts at a coach upon immense springs, swaying like a boat in a high wind, drawn by wild-looking native horses, and filled with drunken sailors, while the naked driver, perched between his horses' tails at the apparent peril of his life, plies his whip and shakes his hempen bridles. A bailee will sometimes cross the square, drawn by bullocks—a native contrivance consisting of a rude cart covered with a rich scarlet canopy. Arabian horse-dealers take the opportunity afforded them to display the "points" of their steeds.

A recent traveler, speaking of the horses of India, very truly says: "English horses will not stand the climate of India, and the native animal is a coarse, heavy-boned, big-headed beast, with an ugly temper. Many horses are consequently brought from Arabia, but their price is very high. The best and cheapest breed is that raised at the Company's stables, from which officers are mounted. The stud horses combine the good qualities of the Arab and native breeds of which they come, being larger and more bony than the pure Arab, but possessing all his suppleness, speed, and good temper."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



ON A DRIVE.

The term "Jockey" has become a by-word for a hard bargain, but the European members of the fraternity might learn a great many tricks from their Asiatic compeers. One instance was related to me where a gentleman bought a black horse, and by the merest accident foiled an attempt to steal him the night after. The next morning he discovered that his horse was dyed with some fugitive preparation that came off with a liberal application of soap and water, leaving an iron-gray as the result. The rascals, who had sold a good horse for a fair price, doubtless intended stealing him back in the night and rendering identification impossible by restoring him to his original condition. It was afterward ascertained that the same horse had passed through the hands of at least half a dozen persons in the immediate neighborhood.

The dexterity with which an Indian jockey will show off the paces of his animal, and the extraordinary amount of training and doctoring which horse-flesh undergoes, deceive the inexperienced and presumptuous youth who thinks he may rely on the evidence of his senses. An incorrigibly vicious beast, which nothing but a native of Bengal could ride, is drugged with opium until he appears a lamb for gentleness, while stimulants are administered to the weak and sluggish, which give them a momentary show of vigor and activity.

Returning through the city we passed through a portion of Black Town, passing on our way three large elephants, led by their native keepers. The great, wrinkled, gray animals blocked up the path, and as we wished to turn back after driving a little distance down the street, we found them stopping the way in front of a fuller's shop. Here our entertainer proposed an elephant ride, and, nothing loth, we prepared to mount the back of one of the huge creatures, who, at the word baith, knelt to receive us.

AN UPSET.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CADERPOOR, BELOW CALCUTTA.

Clambering into the howdah, or seat upon his back, we were hoisted into the air with a sensation of being in a large box-swing.

AN ELEPHANT RIDE.

Our imposing array attracted more attention and elicited more marks of profound respect from the natives than I should have thought possible, considering that elephant-riding can not be a very uncommon achievement in Bengal. The road is kept in excellent condition, and is shaded by an avenue of trees, the lower branches of which swept our faces as we passed under them, and had like to have made an Absalom of one of our party, who, however, fortunately for himself (although he never before so considered it), wore a wig, which he left dangling like a last year's birds-nest among the boughs. I am sure the reader will not refuse his sympathy when he learns that this unlucky member of the party was their humble servant. The wig recovered and reassumed, as greatly to the surprise of the mahout as to the Indian who found a white man's scalp set so loosely on his head as to be wrenched off with a single pull, having a smooth, polished, hairless surface underneath, we proceeded on our way rejoicing.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A JUVENILE JUGGLER.

The day had become excessively sultry by the time we had arrived at our destination, and we were all very glad to accept the proffered shelter of a roof.

The first thing noticeable in entering a European house in India is the comparative scantiness and scarceness of the furniture—every thing being of the lightest pattern and most indispensable character. The floors are covered with a fine quality of matting, and the walls are adorned with sconces, having glass shades to them, containing a number of lights. The apartments are generally very lofty. This renders a strong light necessary to illuminate them at night, and the light, streaming from every window as the evening advances, makes it look as if a general illumination was taking place.

During the evening we were regaled with native jugglers and the nautch, or dancing girls, for which India is famous, or infamous. Many descriptions have been given of the magicians of Hindoostan; but none, I think, have done the subject justice, or can do it justice. In fact, marvels that seem tame on paper have a much greater effect when performed before your very face and eyes, unaided by apparatus, unclothed except in "nature's suit of black" and the unvarying middle-cloth. The present performer was a mere child, and yet he performed feats of skill whose adroitness and inexplicability certainly excelled those of any European expert I ever saw. The dancers' performance commenced with a sort of squeal, so shrill and high in tone that it was with some difficulty I recognized it as a human voice. This sustained cry was caught up and prolonged by a second, a third joined in, and presently a chorus began, to which rusty hinges, nocturnal cat concerts, or "the man with a cracked clarionet" were mere trifles, and the nautch girls came slowly sailing into the centre of the room from behind a small Venetian screen. They were beautifully-formed women, and one or two among them were quite pretty. They were all dressed in long, flowing, classic draperies, and reminded me a great deal of the figures we see copied from the walls of Pompeii and Herculaneum. Like the old woman at Charing Cross, in Mother Goose's Melodies, who had "rings on her fingers and rings on her toes, and makes fine music wherever she goes," to which may be added, with "rhyme and reason" in the present instance, rings in the nose, these young ladies tinkled and jingled all over whenever they stepped, like a horse in sleigh-bells. Their gestures were of more than one sort; most of them very graceful, and others that admit of no further description than that of "startling in the extreme," and a very mild description of the matter it is too. There were no ladies with us, and the gentlemen of the party, I am bound to confess, made a night of it. The East Indian is a very convivial animal, and bottled stout and Champagne are shipped in large quantities from the mother country. Long after I had retired to my virtuous couch I could hear our host vociferating, "We won't go home till morning!" which was rather absurd on his part, consider-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ing that he was home already. I dropped asleep at last, however, and have a confused recollection of dreaming that I was invited to a feast where hosts and guests were one and all white elephants, who wore wigs and had extended an invitation to me in consideration of my having adopted the same distinguishing badge.

In the morning I drove out alone, my host having placed his buggy at my disposal, and I made the tour of the place. We returned to Calcutta on the following day.

On our return we saw a phenomenon equaling or excelling that of our friend with a blue beard—this was a lot of horses with scarlet tails and manes. They were ridden by natives who seemed to take considerable pride in those adornments of their steeds, and called our servants to bid the Sahibs take notice of them.

To a European the streets of Calcutta afford an unfailing source of interest and amusement. The shop-keepers, fat, sleek, and well-dressed men, clad in white muslin and having the mark of their cast painted in gold upon the forehead and down the nose, stand at their doors inviting customers to enter. The population thronging the streets dressed in white muslin—a costume which produces a singular effect upon a large multitude—are interspersed with strolling musicians, Chinese itinerants, nautch-girls, and Europeans. A few streets, such as Park Street and Free School Street, facing the great plain, are laid out in accordance with something like a regular plan; but the greater part of the city is a more complicated labyrinth than old Boston.

A notice of the street-singers and nautch-girls would be incomplete without mention of the female contortionists. A woman of this kind comes before you sedately enough, but with a sudden spring throws herself into the most apparently impossible shapes, quitting altogether the appearance of a human being and taking alternately that of a frog, a crocodile, and some of the distortions only seen elsewhere in the hideous sculptures of the Indian idols. Standing upright she will suddenly turn, and, bending, look out at you between her feet, and finish the performance by picking up the coin you throw her with her eyelids. She will, if you will place a steel pen in its holder, point upright, in an inkstand on the table, whirl swiftly around, and, without intermitting the motion, take the ink from off the nibs of the pen upon her eyelids.

Before leaving the city, among other points of interest I visited the native place for the incremation of the dead. It is called the "Burning Ghât," and is shut off from the land side by high brick walls. To enter their horrid inclosure is to enter at once a slaughter-pen, where the victims are human beings—a sepulchre that can not retain its dead, but casts them, half-digested, upon the loathing river; and a dissecting-room, where the horrible dissectors are loathsome carrion-birds.

From this pit of abominations issues a fetid, deadly fume and stench, and a greasy soot-depositing smoke hangs over it. A row of black bamboo sheds, built against the damp and reeking walls, contain living beings in the extremities of disease and pain; and their cries and groans, feebly uttered, are more dreadful

CONTORTIONIST AND SWORD-PLAYER.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

than all other sights and sounds in this horrible place. For it is one of the humane and elevating practices of the Hindoo religion, so much praised by such fastidious persons as have no stomach for Christianity, that, when a friend is sick to death, it becomes the duty of his friends and relatives to take him to this living hell, and, after pouring the loathsome water of the river in his face and stuffing his mouth with the greasy mud, to abandon him forever. When the poor wretch is dead he is burned or half-burned, and his remains cast into the river. Should he be so unreasonable as not to die, as it sometimes happens that he even recovers completely, he is henceforth and forever an outcast. He has no property, being legally dead, and his effects divided among his heirs, and he has no friends. His nearest relatives will not recognize him, and the best thing he can do is to return to the Ghât and give his body, by the shortest possible process, to the hurgilas birds and the sacred river.

Never before visiting other lands have I known how to value the principles which, to a certain extent, govern us in our own country in our intercourse with each other. Intellect has not been wanting in the formation of Indian philosophy — intellect the most refined and acute, aided by all the ancient learning of the East, yet the result is India and China—Chinese ethics being moulded on pretty much the same originals as those of Hindoostan. As China and India now are so the whole world once was; and measuring progress by the contrast between these old kingdoms and the Western World, we may judge of the effect which pure and true religious principles can effect when grafted on human civilization.

THE BURNING GHAT.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

OLD AUNT MATILDA.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART II.

AS before stated, Matilda was for a time the object of much prying curiosity, and to this may be added a good deal of ungenerous criticism. But with the decay of curiosity interest died out. What was Matilda Hastings that more fortunate people should be mindful of her? She went little abroad except to church, and was so quiet and gentle and kindly in her life that the little that was said gradually took a tone of pity and commiseration.

It may be remarked, by-the-way, that she was thrown into the shade of obscurity, in the first place, by the splendors of the beautiful bride, all of whose appointments were discussed and exaggerated, as though in some way their rich profusion took something from the poverty of those who discussed them.

"They are going to foreign parts for a year or two," said Mrs. Armstrong when she came to visit Mrs. Hastings and Matilda, "though not all for pleasure. The fact is, Nat's spirits are dreadfully down, and his health is failing, and Brother Tom thinks it's the best thing for them—no help being expected from Eunice, you see." And then she says she shall not be surprised if Nat settles in New York for good and all on his return, if he lives to come back—adding, with a little sneer, that Cincinnati is getting to be rather too small a field for the operations of Nat's genius. She didn't like Eunice (she would not call her Lamsie, and nobody could make her) any better since she became her daughter-in-law than before; she was sure Nat was welcome to all the joy he could get of the beauty; but as for giving her the fine table and bed linen she had locked away in the press—things designed for another, and marked with another's name—that was out of the question; they might stay in press and rot first, as she had said before.

She didn't care how soon they went off to foreign parts, for when a man married a simple wife it was sure to turn him to a simpleton first or last, and she didn't wish to see it done; she had seen quite enough already. And then she kissed Matilda, while the tears dropped down her faded cheeks, and told her that she had taken her to her heart as her own daughter, and nobody could displace her so long as she should live. "Come what will," she said, "I shall always feel toward you like a mother, and hope you will allow me to do a mother's part by you, and that nothing may ever stand between us, or be dearer to you, except your own mother." And then she added, trying to smile, "unless it be that you get the best husband in all the world, and I am sure you deserve him."

Before a year was gone by there was no mother to stand between Matilda and this second mother, and they became knit together with bonds of a still stronger affection.

"You must come and live with me now, my dear Tilly," says Mrs. Armstrong; "the old house is too lonesome; and, besides, I require you for my own comfort—I am lonesome too!" And she broke quite down, and they wept in each other's arms.

But Matilda had a proud spirit in her quiet bosom, and though she accepted the proffered love, she would accept nothing that she could not return in kind. "There will be some way," she said, "there always is, for those who strive to help themselves." She must work and wait, she said; her Heavenly Father had some use for her, else he would take her and give her a green bed beside her good mother's in the village grave-yard.

And so she set up a decent head-stone, the best she could afford, and made it her sadly pleasant pastime to tend the burial-place, and plant flowers about it. Then she gathered a few of the poor children about her and taught them; and so exemplary was the life she led, and so sweet and serviceable was she in all her ways, that she became in time the mistress of the village school, and had more children of the rich, as well as the poor, than she could teach. Still the place she occupied in society and in the neighborhood was a subordinary one; she was "Aunt Matilda," and looked upon with a sort of compassion at the best.

At twenty-five she had come to be regarded as an old maid, past all hope, and she accepted her fate with that tender consciousness which we sometimes see in women who accept their unhonored fortunes and weary work-day lives as matters of course.

"She is neither company for young nor old," said the towns-folks, never dreaming that it might be because neither young nor old sought to make her company, and so they had their fairs and frolics without her. "Why didn't you come, Aunt Matilda?" the young children said to her sometimes after a merry-making. "Oh, we had such fun!" But she always shook her head and smiled, as though, in some way, it was a thing not to be thought of.

Nor rainy days, nor rough winds, nor snow-storms kept her from her school. Of course none of these things could harm "old Aunt Matilda;" she was used to them! So there she was, winter and summer, first of all.

And the years went by, one after another, dull and monotonous, but for the cheer she got of working and waiting, until twenty years had passed, and the bloom was gone from her cheek, and the soft plumpness from her hand, but not the brightness from her eye, nor the elasticity from her step, though she was now forty years old.

"I wonder if she ever thinks of Nathan Armstrong?" the smiling matrons said sometimes, as they got their heads together over a quilt or a cradle; and then the old story was told over, for when, indeed, are such stories forgotten? And there were sly winks and nods and low whispers, as though her love were in some sort a disgraceful as well as laughable affair.

And from Matilda the talk would naturally

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google run to Nathan, who had been living in New York these many years, and was become now a man of independent fortune, and his wife the mistress of an elegant establishment and the leader of a fashionable circle.

And Mrs. Armstrong, the mother of Nathan, was a widow now, with gray hair and spectacles, but with much of that energy still which characterized her youthful days, and vigorous and strong for her years; keeping her house, and managing the farm into the bargain—more advantageously than it ever had been managed before, so people said.

And once or twice every summer she opened the press in the south chamber, which had once been Nathan's room, and took out all the things that were marked with the initials M. H. A., sunned them, sighed over them, and folded them carefully away.

One day a letter came to Mrs. Armstrong with a black seal and a border of black. Nathan had lost his wife six months ago, and would his mother consent to take charge of his little Lamsie for a while; the only child he had left, and motherless now. "Though for that matter," said Mrs. Armstrong, "she is just as well off as she ever was, from what I have heard, one way and another." And then she said to Matilda, who always listened with silent, rapt attention to every thing concerning Nathan, that, although she did not want to say any thing against the dead, it was true that Eunice had never been a faithful wife or a devoted mother, and that she never could like her, over and above, and the truth, she supposed, was as true now as it ever was!

She had put on her bonnet and gone straight with the news to her daughter, as she called Matilda nowadays. "And what do you say, my dear?" she asked, when she had read the letter, word for word, by dint of spelling and going over again and again—"shall we take the little thing? though the dear knows, if we do, I for one shall never call her Lamsie—there is no sense to the name any how—and I shall always call her plain Eunice, which was her mother's name before her."

"You must do just as you like, mother," says Matilda; "of course you know it can be nothing to me."

"Ah, but it is something to you, my dear! You understand that I shall have to look to you a great deal—more especially about her education; and are you sure you shall be quite willing to take her in your school?"

"And why not?" Matilda answered. "The innocent child has never harmed me, and her father never meant to harm me either."

And this was the first time she had herself spoken his name for twenty years, and now she avoided calling him Nathan. And Mrs. Armstrong kissed the cheek that was burning with that faint, low red that is not rose-like, but like the ashes of roses, and called her thrice over her daughter, and her dear daughter, and then her own dear daughter. And directly she went home with a lighter heart than she had carried with her on setting out.

The next day she wrote to Nathan that she would receive the little Eunice, and bring her up in her own old-fashioned way the best she could; and she added, quite incidentally, "I am the more willing to take the child on account of the excellent school here in which I can place her immediately." And then she said: "You will remember your old friend, and my friend always, Matilda Hastings; she it is who teaches the school I have reference to. I hope you will be satisfied."

And when the letter was posted she went straight to Nathan's room and threw open the blinds, and with her own hand cleared it of dust and spider-webs; and then she unlocked the press, and hung the long-cherished linen, piece by piece, in the sun, lingering with tender fondness on the faded marking wrought in so long ago. So long ago, and yet it seemed but as yesterday.

"This room must not be given up to the little Eunice; maybe Nat"—she began to call him Nat again—"would come home sometime, and she would have it all ready for him." So she lived in her dreams; for at what age do women not live in dreams? She lived in dreams, not very clearly defined even to her own heart, but all about the coming home of Natty, to live with her, and be the prop of her declining years, with some shadowy flittings here and there of Matilda, she knew not where nor how.

In due course of time the child came—a bright brunette, with serious wondering eyes, and straight hair as black as the midnight.

"I declare she looks more like you this minute than like her mother!" says Mrs. Armstrong, as she led her one day into the quiet little parlor where Matilda sat sewing. The ashes of roses in her cheeks colored almost to roses as she took the little girl on her knee and kissed her.

"You will know me after a while," she said, "and then I hope you will come to like me a little—a very little."

"No, but I love you now," the child replied. "I don't want to wait, for you are the lady papa told me I must love, aren't you?"

And she put her soft arms about the neck that was bending toward her, and drew the face close to hers. And perhaps Matilda was not sorry to have her face hidden at that moment, and if she had had a struggle to take her on her knee she had a harder one to put her down. She loved the child from the very first, as indeed who could have helped doing? She was not one of those ordinary children that make you necessary to them—she made herself necessary to you; and when she went out of the room it was like the perfume of fine flowers vanishing, or the sunshine going out.

"Should you like to go in the garden now?" Matilda said, after a little pause, during which her face had been hidden.

"Yes, if you please;" and the child slid soft-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ly from the arms of Matilda. But at her knees she stopped and hung clinging, with her cheek resting there, as though she disliked to go away.

"Shall we go now?" says Matilda again.

"No, I must not trouble you, papa said; I will go alone, or grandma will go with me; won't you, dear grandma?"

And she shied away toward the door, looking wistfully back, but not teasing and pulling, or making any noise whatever. Directly she came back, while yet the two women were saying what a dear little thing she was, holding up her tiny white apron, which she had filled with all the flowers she could find. Then glancing shyly up, as if to ask permission, she seated herself on the floor and began to twine and twist them into long fantastic wreaths. When they were completed she divided them very fairly between the grandmother and the school-mistress, balancing and weighing the matter a good while in her own mind before she came to a final decision. After this she set herself to work and picked up every smallest leaf from the floor, holding them close in her apron, and making all as tidy as it was before. She slipped about like a shadow, though not as one who would be sly, now standing on tip-toe to look out of the window, and now lying with her face close against the hearth to watch some cricket perhaps. She was naturally quiet in all her ways, but toward Matilda she seemed to feel a sort of tender reverence, and, as she moved about, followed her with her eyes, as asking leave to be with her and to love her.

"I guess you will take to her for all," says the delighted grandmother, catching her to her bosom, and kissing her eyes, her hands, and her hair. And the words "for all" included all the allusion that was made that day to Nathan.

It was a month after this, perhaps, that little Eunice said to her mistress one evening after school was dismissed, pulling timidly at her skirt and lifting such beseeching eyes, "May I go home with you and stay a little while to-night —just a little while—I want to go so much?"

"What for, my pet?" And Matilda, well pleased, took the soft little hand in hers.

When they were come into the simple parlor she must put away Matilda's shawl and bonnet, and then she must, all with her own hands, drag the big chair close to the window and have Matilda sit down in it. Then she said, climbing up by the arm of the chair and slipping down into her lap:

"You asked me why I wished to come with you, Aunt Tilly." She had never called her Aunt Tilly till then, and she looked up into her face with that tender beseeching of hers for leave. "I don't want to call you mistress," she said; "I want to call you something sweet." And then playing in bashful confusion with the ribbon Matilda wore round her neck, to which a slender finger-ring and a silver pencil-case—the latter given her by her pupils—was attached, she went on: "I want to call you mamma. Would you be angry if I called you mamma?"

"No, darling, I should not be angry," says Matilda, hugging her close; "but it would not be true, and so you had better call me Aunt Matilda as the rest do." And as she said this she blushed, though no eye was upon her save the child's.

"What makes every body call you Aunt Matilda?" the inquisitive prattler asks next, slipping the slender ring on her own finger. And then she says, "This finger-ring isn't like my mamma's used to be."

"No," says Matilda, "it isn't like your mamma's; it is a poor little ring, of no worth to any body but me; and because I haven't a finer one the people are sorry for me, and they call me Aunt Matilda in a sort of pitying kindness."

The child opens her eyes wide with serious wonder, and then she says:

"Did you buy the ring, Aunt Tilly?"

"Yes, darling, I bought it with a great price." And the tears that had come to her eyes by this time dropped silently on the upturned face of the wondering little one.

Matilda found a certain sort of pleasure in this talk with the child, though she did not expect nor desire that she should understand a single word of it. She understood more, however, than had been reckoned upon—she understood that in some way Matilda was unhappy because of the ring; but whether it was because she had paid so much for it, or for the reason of its being so slender, or for what other cause, she did not at all understand. In her soft, quiet way she kissed Matilda's hands and hugged her arm close under her chin, and told her she would tell her papa, and he would give her a beautiful ring like her own mamma's!

"Oh no, darling, you must never tell him that as long as you live—not for the world!" cried Matilda.

The earnestness of her manner tended doubtless to deepen the impression already made on the child's mind. "I don't mean to tell him for the world," she said, understanding the words literally, "but just for the new ring!"

She had got the central fact, and there was no dislodging it just then, and, trusting to time, Matilda smoothed the dark hair in silence as the young head leaned against her bosom, and the child went on directly; "but I haven't told you why I wanted to come home with you yet?"

"No, my darling; why was it?"

"Because I had something I wanted you to see, and somehow I couldn't show it you in school!"

"And what is it, my dear?"

"Well, then, shut your eyes close and I'll tell you."

Matilda shut her eyes to humor the playful humor of the child and leaned her head low.

"There now, I've told you!"

And slipping from her knees and clapping her hands for delight the child hid behind the chair of the mistress. She had dropped something in her bosom.

The next moment Matilda had a small en-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google ameled case in her hand, fastened with golden clasps.

"Unclasp it!" says the child, peeping slyly from behind the chair, and, unclasping the clasps, Matilda beheld the face of her lover—not as she knew him in the days that were gone, but as he was now, a gray, earnest-faced, serious man, past middle life—seeming weighed with memories, and burdened with cares.

"Isn't he nice and pretty?" says the child, stealing round and climbing to the lap once more; "but then he looks so solemn—what makes him look that way? But you don't know him; he is my papa!"

Then she took the picture and kissed it; "but see," she says, "he looks solemn all the same, just as if he would cry;" and then she asked Matilda to kiss him and see if he would not smile.

"It is only a picture, my child, and can't smile," Matilda answered, turning her face aside; but the child would not be pacified—"kiss him and see! just once," she pleaded, clinging to Matilda's neck, and holding the pictured mouth quite against hers, so that she was at length almost forced to kiss it.

Then the child said he was smiling now, and she was satisfied; "but what," she asked, "makes your cheek so bright? did he kiss you back again?"

And then she said, "Oh, how I wish he could see you, he would love you just as I do! And he is so sad now, he never smiles any more." And then she leaned her face against Matilda's bosom and closed her eyes as though she would like to be rocked asleep—she was so tired, she said. Matilda had the picture open now, resting partly on her bosom, partly on the child's head; and as she slowly rocked to and fro the tears fell upon it one by one till the face of the picture was all covered, and they lay there in a glistening shower.

Twenty years had made no difference with the woman's heart, though she was "old Aunt Matilda!" One day there came a letter to her, perfumed, sealed with wax, and superscribed in a hand that she did not recognize; she broke the seal with trepidation, for it was not often that a letter came to her. "My dear Miss Hastings," it was addressed; she did not know the hand, and curiously turned the page. "Ever and always your affectionate friend," were the closing words, and then it was signed Nathan Armstrong.

There was nothing in the letter of special moment—it did not speak of the past nor of the future—made no allusion to private misfortunes nor poisoned hopes or fears, except so far as they referred to his child. His mother had informed him that his little Eunice (he did not say Lamsie) had been placed in the care of Miss Hastings, and he could not deny himself the pleasure of expressing to her his very earnest thanks for her goodness in receiving the child, in the first place, and for the care and pains she was bestowing on her education. As the twig is bent, you know, Miss Hastings, he said; and then he said, with the only attempt at playfulness and familiarity in the whole letter, that in his own case he feared the twig had been sadly warped from its first righteous bending; "but this, perhaps, my dear Miss Hastings, makes me all the more solicitous for my child—all the more grateful for your generous painstaking. I have not the shallow vanity to suppose such services"—here services had been erased and benefits inserted—"can be adequately returned, and I beg you will not attribute to me a notion that would so misrepresent me."

This was the only allusion to the bank-check the letter contained—a check for five times the amount which, at her usual terms, would have been due Matilda in five years. Look at it how she would, she felt outraged, grieved, and offended. She would send the check directly back, and with such biting and bitter words as should make him repent his cold charity. She was not exactly an object of outdoor relief, and if she were, there were hands from which she would prefer to receive it. In her first proud indignation, and with all her patience and quietude she was quite capable of being proudly indignant, she wrote something very like what we have set down for her; but on second thought she saw that such a course betrayed a heart quite too sensitive to the past—she must word her refusal of the donation, for she still considered it a donation, more cautiously. So she threw her first note in the fire, and after some careful consideration wrote another:

Miss Hastings was greatly obliged to Mr. Armstrong; but her terms of tuition were not so exorbitant as he seemed to suppose, and she begged, therefore, leave to return the superfluous check, and would venture to suggest a preference for adjusting her accounts thereafter with her friend and neighbor, Mrs. Armstrong. She went so far as to inclose this note, together with the obnoxious check, and to superscribe the envelope; but after all she was not satisfied—was this really any better than her first angry dispatch? She was forced to admit that it was no better at all; a little more deliberate, a little more attempt at concealment, perhaps, but in reality no concealment whatever. She had told all that she was most anxious not to tell; had she kept it all these years to blurt it out at last in this way? So the second note was sent to the flames after the first. She would simply inclose the check in a sheet of blank note paper—that was what she would do! and that was what she did, sleeping upon the resolve; but when the morning came and she thought it over once more, she was as far from being satisfied with herself as ever—as far from being satisfied with herself, almost, as from being satisfied with Nathan. She would not betray to him any feeling or emotion of any sort; and what could she do that would not betray both feeling and emotion, and both, too, of a peculiar nature? She was betrayed by what she had

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google written and by what she had not written alike! So at last, with Nathan's letter in her bosom, and bitter tears ready to start, she went to Nathan's mother.

"Foolish child!" says Mrs. Armstrong, "you had better just keep the money and say nothing about it. Natty never meant nothing but kindness, and he didn't know how to do no better than he has done. The truth is, Tilly, men are just what they are, and we've got to take 'em at that; and no man ever understood a woman, and no one ever will; and no great wonder, after all, for no woman ever understood herself! We're curious creters, Tilly, the best of us; we stand in our own light a good deal, and what is worse, we won't get out of it when we come to see our fault—no, not though we make pitch darkness all round us! I don't want to find fault, Tilly, and I don't mean to say you hadn't strong provocation; but you got into your own light twenty years ago, and you have been walking in the shaders ever since; and now that they are just beginning to lift a little, don't draw them down onto your own head, not till you have thought a bit, any how!" The dear woman had never even hinted till now that she thought Matilda had been the least at fault; and for my part, I think she was entitled to say thus much after so long a silence. And it would seem that Matilda thought so too, for she wiped her eyes, kissed her adopted mother, and, with little Eunice in her hand, went away wonderfully comforted.

That night the child would stay and sleep with her. "I am so tired," she said, "and want to lay my head on the pillow close to yours." Matilda had carried her the last bit of the way, and when she undressed her she saw that her arms and head were burning hot.

"I wish papa were here! don't you, Aunt Tilly?" says the child; and then she would have the picture on the pillow between them.

"Oh no," says Matilda, blushing though it was dark, "your papa won't like that, he'd be smothered; we must put him in the drawer of the bureau where he is used to be."

But Eunice insisted that she knew better, and that pictures could sleep in bed as well as any where else. "I know it," she says, "because papa sleeps with one under his pillow every night!"

Matilda felt her brow contract a little at that; and then she said, forcing herself to speak the words, "It is your mamma's picture, of course?"

"No; not my old mamma's. And it is so pretty, with long dark hair all braided to a crown, like yours!" And then she says, laughing, and paddling the fair neck bent toward her, that she saw her papa kiss it once!

"Oh, you dreamed that!" says Matilda, with almost girlish delight.

"No, I didn't; but papa thought I was dreaming, may be. It was once when I slept with him; and he took it from beneath his pillow and looked at it a long time, and then he sighed and turned his face from me; but I peeped over his shoulder and saw him kissing it! And that is just as true as can be, Aunt Tilly, every word of it!"

"Oh, you sly little darling!" cries Matilda, hugging the child close to her bosom, picture and all, and so passing directly into the land of dreams, but not through the gates of sleep.

In the morning Eunice still complained of being tired, and Matilda carried her half-way to the school. But when she called her, half an hour afterward, to say her lesson, she did not answer; her head was drooping on her arm, and she was fast asleep. It was a heavy, unnatural sleep, and when at last she was gotten out of it she seemed confused and as one still in a dream.

"You need not say your lessons to-day, my dear," says the mistress, and she spread her cloak and shawl, and made her a bed on the school-bench.

In the evening her face was like scarlet and her arms hot as fire. And Matilda carried her all the way this time—her head drooping like a flower that lacks the dew.

"We will rest here a little while," she said, when she reached her own gate, "and then I will carry you home to your grandma." But the child, contrary to her wont, began to moan and fret. "No, Aunt Tilly," she said, "I want to stay with you, just to-night!"

So she laid her on the bed, and when she was quieted went herself to fetch the grandmother, but the grandmother was not at home. She had been suddenly called to see a sick woman who was poor, having but few friends to visit her, and who lived ten miles away.

"Please take care of little Eunice for a day or two," she said, in the note she left for Matilda; "it will be a delight to her, I am sure, and I hope not very troublesome to you. When I come home I will let you know of it at once, but I may be gone a day or two." And then she said, with one of those premonitions, perhaps, that seem to come sometimes: "If any thing happen to Eunice let her father know at once."

Here was a quandary, and one that became shortly more difficult of solution. The child tossed restlessly on her pillow all night, and in the morning, when the doctor was fetched, he pronounced her case to be fever of the most malignant character, and advised that her father should be made aware of her condition at once.

"Oh, Aunt Tilly! dear, dear Aunt Tilly!" the child lay moaning all the while, her eyes following Matilda with such pleading, helpless looks. What could she do? What she did was to put herself aside, and send by dispatch a message to the father—a message that was answered in person at the earliest possible moment. But little Eunice, in the mean time, had passed where there was almost no hope. She had not recognized her grandmother when she came, and she did not know Matilda now, nor know any thing.

The doctor had shaken his head and said it

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was not worth while to annoy the poor thing with medicines any longer, and the grandmother at this had fallen to weeping and lamentation, swaying herself to and fro by the bedside, and talking of dear ones dead and gone, and of the other dear one that would so soon have left her too. Then Matilda dried her eyes and staid up her soul with courage, and comforted all about her, taking the child in her arms, and soothing and nursing her with the tenderest care. Who knows, she said, what our good Father will grant to us?"

She was sitting thus, her eyes soft with the dew of tenderness, and her cheek flushed with the anxious beating of her heart, when Nathan came.

Life and death were making their last struggle for the child, and there was no room for any thought but for her. They watched together that night, and the next, and the next, hushed almost to breathlessness by the awful shadow; but in Heaven's own time it broke and parted, and the light came in.

"She will live! my darling will live!" cried the father, his voice shaken with emotion; "and, under God, Matilda, it is all owing to you."

He had called her Miss Hastings till then, but his heart had spoken without his knowledge or consent, and hers responded all against her will, by filling her eyes with tears. Then he repeated the words—"Yes, it is all owing to you, Matilda;" and he spoke her name this time in a whisper, and with his face very close to hers.

When the child is quite out of danger, thought she to herself, I will give him back that bank-check that he had the audacity to send me; and she studied over in her mind a very grand little speech that she would make on the occasion. "He shall see that I can do without him," she said, "and his money too, into the bargain."

But one while the child was asleep, and another time she was fretful, and another the grandmother was about. So there seemed no favorable time for the placing of herself in her true position.

Then, too, Nathan looked so old and seemed so weary that she could not bear to add a feather's weight to the burdens he already bore. Still she was fully resolved that when the fortunate hour really struck, why then she would relieve her mind once for all. And in due course of time the hour struck. Eunice was out of all danger, and, with a heap of expensive toys about her, was sitting on the snow-white quilt, prattling of a thousand things with that half-insane delight that comes to us with returning health.

Nathan had been away all the afternoon, and Matilda had taken the opportunity to set her house in order, for she desired that things should shine at their best. The dimity curtains were hung afresh; the frilled pillow-cases were in use; and flowers—just enough, and not too many—were placed here and there. Little Eunice was like a daisy in her pretty night-gown, and with the soft wool socks on her feet which she herself had knitted.

And when the house was set in order and the child dressed she arrayed herself and braided her long dark locks with unusual care. And when she sat down by the window, with the check in her pocket, to wait for Nathan, she felt calm, collected, and equal to her task.

There was a little flutter of the heart, just a little, as his step rung on the door-stone, and, looking up, she saw his face so much brighter and younger than she had seen it till now. The gladness in her own answered that brightness before she was aware, and then she lowered her eyes with what she meant to be very quiet coldness. But Nathan had caught the first look, and before the second was got ready for him he was by her side and had her hand in his.

"Matilda," he said, with tender gravity, "where do you suppose I have been these three hours?"

Matilda was sure she did not know, and her manner and tone were designed to convey the idea that she did not care. He did not heed this, but kept her hand though she made an effort to withdraw it.

"I have been sitting under the peach-tree by the bee-hives, where we sat so long ago, and saw the sun go down—do you remember it, Matilda? That sun has never risen for me—shall it rise now?"

Still she was silent, her hand fumbling with the check.

"It has been a long night, Matilda, twenty years; is not that long enough?"

Still she said nothing; her grand speech was all gone from her, and she could not recall one word of it.

"There is something for you," she stammered at last, endeavoring to get the obnoxious paper in his hand.

"And here is something for you," he answered, unlocking a small gold case and producing a withered flower. You refused it when I offered it last, will you have it now? It was fresh and young then like my life; and it is like my life now—faded, faint, not worth your acceptance I know."

She did not lift her hand to take it. "Let us adjust this matter first," she said at length, really making him see this time what it was she offered.

"On one condition, Matilda," still speaking in the same tone of tender gravity.

"What is that?"

"That you give me the hand as well."

"And can you think you deserve it, Sir?"

"No, Matilda, I make no pretense of that sort. I deserve nothing—nothing at your hands, God knows! But whatever my fault has been, whatever my faults are now, look at my gray hairs, look through my eyes down to my soul that is empty of all delight, and tell me if you do not think I have suffered enough. If

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google not, it is in your power, Matilda, to add what more you will!"

There was a deep silence—the twilight was gone, and the gray evening settling down with clouds and sighing winds.

"And so you refuse my flower?" he said, at last. "Then there will be no more morning, no more light for me."

"Oh, papa, papa! did you say there would never be any more light?" called little Eunice from where she sat among her heap of toys on the snow-white counterpane. "And will it always be night then, dear papa?" And she began to cry.

"I don't know, my darling. Perhaps you can yet make a little light for me in the world, but it is very, very dark now."

He had gone to the bedside in answer to her crying, and he had her in his arms now, caressing and trying to soothe, though his voice as he did so was faltering and choked with tears. She had her two little hands in her eyes, and kept moaning and making piteous ado; all at once she looked up and said, with eager gladness,

"It will be light by-and-by, won't it be, Aunt Tilly? Come and tell papa it will be light, and make him glad, won't you, dear Aunt Tilly?"

But Matilda only turned away her face, and drew a long, long sigh.

"She is crying, papa," whispered the child, "and I know what it is about: it is all about her finger-ring, because it is such a little slender one. Oh, papa, it cost so much! she told me so, and she said I mustn't tell you. But I will tell you; and you will give her a beautiful new one—won't you, papa?—and then she won't cry."

Matilda had hidden her face in her hands, and was crying in earnest now. Then the child would be carried to her, and placed on her knees. "Don't cry, Aunt Tilly," she pleaded, twining her arms about her neck and kissing her. "Papa will give you a new ring, and then he will stay here, and we will all live together, and be so happy. Tell her you will, papa—tell her yourself, and then she won't cry."

And keeping one arm around Matilda's neck, she drew his face down quite against hers with the other, and so clasping the two, waited.

"Shall it be as our child says?" whispered Nathan.

"I can not answer," she said—"I can not speak now." But somehow the hand with the dreadful paper in it had got into his hand, and was being held there with a close and tender pressure. There was no need that she should speak—he was answered.

And Nathan came back to live on the old place, and a fine new house was built in the maple grove at the end of the lane, and Mr. and Mrs. Armstrong were the great people of the neighborhood, be sure.

And from the day of her marriage nobody ever thought of saying Aunt Matilda, much less Old Aunt Matilda; and when the good mother unlocked the press, and brought forth the long-preserved linen for the wedding present, there was not a happier woman in the whole county than she, unless indeed we must except the daughter, now a daughter in law as well as in fact.

A TALK ABOUT TALKING.

AN English writer of some little note has laid it as an accusation against the American people that they are a nation of talkers. In the social circle, in the hotel, in the market-place, on the steamboat, in the rail-car, every where, the irrepressible American shows an irrepressible tongue-ism. Taking this writer's idea without his precise language, we may regard it as a back-handed censure, implying that Americans can only talk — they can not converse, or talk intelligently with a direct purpose. But that this is so in the United States is no more true than of any other people. To the Englishman's sneer, however, I would oppose a pungent and truthful sentence written by one of his own countrymen. "There is nothing," says Sydney Smith, in his own inimitable manner, which an Englishman enjoys more than the pleasure of sulkiness — of not being forced to hear a word from any body which may occasion to him the necessity of replying. It is not so much that Mr. Bull disdains to talk, as that Mr. Bull has nothing to say. His forefathers have been out of spirits for six or seven hundred years, and seeing nothing but fog and vapor, he is out of spirits too; and when there is no selling or buying, or no business to settle, he prefers being alone and looking at the fire."

That there is a difference between mere talk and conversation I propose to show, and to add some practical observations adapted to these practical times. To talk is natural. "Wherefore," asks Quintilian, "the tongue but for speech?" This faculty of speech is a special endowment of man, and therefore none has a right to take it from him. The birds of the air and the beasts of the field have means of communication with each other; but to man alone, of all created beings, so far as we know, is given the power of speech and the use of language. With him "honor or shame is in talk." Hence we see the necessity of the proper government of the tongue which, as St. James has told us, is "a little member" that may "be set on fire of hell." It may, however, be a most useful member of society, as it has already been. But still, confining our remarks to "talk" in private society, I would maintain that the "little member" needs guidance and control—therefore, education.

The majority of the human race are adepts at talking, still but few are able to sustain conversation. And the object now is to show that while we, as a people, do acknowledge ourselves to be every way adequate to the former, we are exceedingly defective in our knowledge of the true mode of conversing; and further, to in-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

dicate, rather than to establish, some rules whereby we may improve as conversationalists.

In what to-day is styled conversation, we have—1*st*. Fashionable talk, which comprehends the smaller matters of everyday life; 2*d*. Vulgar slang, which descends to the use of such terms as need not be quoted in a respectable Magazine; 3*d*. Flatulent comments upon the moving incidents of the time gathered from the morning journal; 4*th*. The dictionary talk of sophomores and aspiring young maidens; and, 5*th*. The stuff occasioned by the flirtation of the ball-room or the fashionable watering-place, where thin gauze covering empty gaud carries the sway. One man pours out a perpetual stream of anecdote, while another chops logic; one's discourse is full of puns, while that of another is a perpetual prayer; one talks poetry, another prose; one is full of quotations, another of egotism; one talks with all his might, another is slow of speech; one screams, another whispers; one's language is a perpetual jumble, that of another is forcible and well-chosen; one "talks like a book," another altogether without any book. Without descanting upon the minutiæ of these several classes, we would assert that each one alone is unproductive of that intellectual improvement which should be the aim and end of all conversation, whether in the domestic circle or in general society.

The power or the gift of conversation, be it remarked, has decayed even in this country, young as it is. Although the character of the times demands that we should think more sturdily and communicate even more sincerely than did our fathers, we neglect one of our chief duties by failing to remember that "speech lies between thought and action." Therefore has Emerson wisely said that "the problem of the talkers is the same with that of the orator, the art of managing minds. The orator's task is to warm a poor, thin, down-looking audience, and make them rich and happy in the thought that they are in the right, and the absent majority in the wrong. The business of a talker in a parlor is to move and persuade his smaller audience." Yet, few are fitted for this either by nature or education, while a multitude might be by the latter. Some modern English journalist has attributed this almost entirely to the fact that the whole people is given to reading, and stupidly asserts that "not only do persons live in such a hurry that there is only leisure for just comparing ideas as to the weather, but they have each and all a gross quantity of reading to do, which puts talking out of the question. If persons remain at home they read; we have met misguided individuals out in the open fields with books in hand; young folks have been seen stretched underneath trees, and upon the banks of rivers, poring over the open page; on the tops of mountains, in the desert, or within forests — every where now men pull printed sheets from their pockets, and in the earliest, latest, highest occupation of this life, they read. The fact is incontestably true that modern men and women are reading themselves into a comparatively silent race; reading is the great delusion of the present time; it has become a sort of lay piety, according to which the perusal of volumes reckons as good works; it is, in a word, the superstition of the nineteenth century."

Far from this, I believe that no man has a right to read for himself alone; if one does read much he has no right to hoard up the results of his reading: he must think when he reads, he must make some deductions, and is in duty bound to communicate those results for the benefit of others. In conversation there is not only an interchange of thought but with it a mingling of intellectual emotion, whereby is formed a union of mind. Thus we become, as it were, possessors of each other for the time being. Furthermore, there is a reactive benefit in imparting our thoughts to others. For, as truly intimated by a reviewer several years ago, "a man never knows what he has read until he has either talked about it or read about it. Talking and writing are digesting processes which are absolutely essential to the mental constitution of the man who devours many books. But it is not every man who can talk. Talking implies, first of all, a readiness on the part of the speaker, and next a sympathetic listener. It is, therefore, as a digestive process, the most difficult, if not the most rapid in its operation. Writing is a different affair; a man may take his time to it and not require a reader; he can be his own reader. It is an easier, although more formal, process of digestion than talking. It is in every body's power; and every body who reads much makes more or less use of it, because, as Bacon says, if he does not write, then he ought to have extraordinary faculties to compensate for such neglect. It is in this view that we are to understand the complaint of a well-known author, that he was ignorant of a certain subject; and the means by which he was to dispel his ignorance—namely, by writing on it.....A man never knows any thing, Sir William Hamilton used to say, until he has taught it in some way or other—it may be orally, it may be by writing a book. It is a grand truth, and points a fine moral. Knowledge is knowledge, say the philosophers; it is precious for its own sake, it is an end to itself. But nature says the opposite. Knowledge is not knowledge until we have brought it under the command of the great social faculty—speech; we exist for society, and knowledge is null until we give it expression, and in so doing make it over to the social instinct."

It might, however, be fairly presumed that all authors and other such like men of note were good conversationalists, being able not only to communicate their thinkings fully and freely by speech, but also to sway a social circle in event of meeting with contending views. We may find, however, a great difference in men known to fame. Some have been free of speech; others have been either taciturn in

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google disposition or naturally devoid of the possible redundancy of language which would apparently flow in their writings; while every thing, in either case, might depend purely and solely upon certain circumstances. Bulwer said, in a late publication, that Garrick had remarked of Goldsmith that he "wrote like an angel and talked like poor Poll." Doubtless there have been many great men who in private society were very dull men. Some of these have been often named as indifferent conversationalists, talking either as parrots or talking not at all. In conversation Dante, for instance, was taciturn, but when he did speak, was satirical; Descartes, La Fontaine, Buffon, and even Milton were unsocial; Butler appeared to be almost stupid, and so, it is said, was Marmontel, the novelist. Addison, on the other hand, was shy and modest, always appearing indisposed to enter upon conversation even with a single visitor.

But let us take a look at cases of a different character.

Dr. Johnson has been considered almost universally as the great exemplar of conversational powers. But then, be it said, at the very best, when he deigned to speak at all, his talk was mainly a grandiloquent discourse, characteristic of a man better fitted to compile a dictionary than to write an essay on politeness. But we know full well that he could brook no opposing word, and that it was easy and common for him to say, even without cause, "You lie, Sir." The fact is, that but for his genius he would be noted as the great bull-dog of his day, and the best representative of the whole character of John Bull, that ever walked within the sound of Bow bells. And like John, he could be good-natured; but when so, was uproarious in his mirth, and laughed, as Tom Davies drolly enough said, "like a rhinoceros."

Madame de Staël has been represented as the most distinguished converser of her time. She was brilliant and ambitious. She valued nothing but conversation. But her skill in it was such that on one occasion those who listened to her were unconscious of a thunderstorm. For all this she has been spoken of as a "pitiless talker;" as one illustration in proof of which it has been said that, upon a certain occasion, some gentlemen introduced a person to her who, they declared, was a very learned man. Madame received him graciously, but eager to produce an impression, began to talk, and asked a thousand questions; but so engrossed was she with herself that she did not notice that her visitor made no reply. When the visit was over the gentlemen asked Corinne how she liked their friend? "A most delightful man! What wit and learning!" was the reply. Here the laugh came in—the visitor was deaf and dumb.

Sheridan, who excelled in all things, was "a fellow of infinite jest." His resources were manifold. He was as ready with proverb as with repartee. Especially would he never allow himself to be outdone by a verbal prodigy; whenever a monstrous story was told in his presence, he would outdo it by one of his own coinage, and put the narrator to the blush by a falsehood more glaring than his own. Here is given the rarest and perhaps most audacious instance. A gentleman related a sporting adventure in his hearing. "I was fishing one day in a certain cold spring full of delicious trout, and soon caught a large mess. But what was really surprising, within a foot of the cold spring there was one of boiling water, so that when you wanted to cook your fish, all you had to do, after hooking them from the cold spring, was to pop them directly into the boiling one." The company all expressed astonishment and incredulity at this monstrous assertion, with the exception of Sheridan. "I know," said he, "of a phenomenon yet more surprising. I was fishing one day, when I came to a place where there were three springs. The first was a cold one stocked with fish, the second a boiling spring, and the third a natural fountain of melted butter and parsley." "Melted butter and parsley!" exclaimed the first story-teller; "impossible!" "I beg your pardon," said Sheridan, coolly; "I believed your story, Sir—you are bound to believe mine." "Another incident occurred to me," said the gentleman. "I was out shooting once, and spied a brace of birds; I was out of shot, but threw the ramrod into the barrel of my gun, fired, and brought down both birds." "A still more singular occurrence happened to me," continued Sheridan. "I had promised a friend of mine in London half a dozen partridges for dinner on a particular day. I had forgotten my agreement, when I heard the distant horn of the stage-coach which was to take my game to London. I rushed into my preserve, and in the hurry of the moment forgot my shot, and left my iron ramrod in my gun-barrel. I fired at a covey of partridges, killed six, threw them into a hamper, and gave it to the coachman. There was the game not only killed, but actually spitted." It is needless to say that the story-teller was silenced.

Turn to yet very different cases. Washington Irving, in the account he has given of his visit to Abbotsford, says of Sir Walter Scott, that his conversation was frank, hearty, picturesque, and dramatic. He never talked for effect or display, but from the flow of his spirits, the stores of his memory, and the vigor of his imagination. He made himself so thoroughly the companion of those with whom he happened to be that they forgot for a time his vast superiority, and only recollected and wondered when all was over that it was Scott with whom they had been on such familiar terms, in whose society they had felt so perfectly at ease.

Macaulay seemed to be possessed by a talking spirit, which no spell, human or divine, could exorcise. He was like a machine which, wound up, must go on until it stops from sheer exhaustion of power. His talk was brilliant,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google though diffuse. Its almost endless continuity was its only drawback. Therefore keen was the satire of Sydney Smith when, writing to a friend about Macaulay's return from India, he said: "He has come back much improved, and, last night, surprised as well as delighted us with several brilliant flashes of silence!"

And this reminds one of Sydney himself, the "primate" in the English hierarchy of wits. He was always ready, always jovial, always pungent, and would cause his friends "to reel each his own way home in a fit."

Turning from him to a clergyman of another denomination, mention should be made of Robert Hall, the Baptist man of eloquence. Notwithstanding his peculiar affliction, and sometimes because of it, his conversational powers were often considered as among the evidences of his genius. Although a most genial companion and a warm-hearted friend, he was frequently decidedly and even offensively brusque. On one occasion, for instance, while in a lunatic asylum, being accosted by a friend who met him by surprise, "Why! Mr. Hall, what brings you here?" he replied, "What will never bring you here, Sir—brains, brains!" On another occasion, in a certain social gathering at Bristol, his eyes were noticed to be intently fixed upon a lady whose personal appearance was not, certainly, prepossessing. His gaze continued so long as to discomfit her, and she at length inquired, "Why, Mr. Hall, what is the matter that you should look at me so strangely?" "I was thinking, Madam, how much you will appear improved on the morning of the resurrection, when you will arise in a different likeness."

Of Coleridge, it has been said that he was in the habit of pouring forth brilliant, unbroken monologues of two or three hours' duration, to listeners so enchanted, that, like Adam whose ears were filled with the eloquence of an archangel, they forgot "all place, all seasons and their change." As an eloquent talker, it may be doubted whether his superior ever lived. But his was not conversation. There was no interchange. It was preaching. He once asked of Charles Lamb, "Did you ever hear me preach?" "I never heard you do any thing else," was the reply. Read this beautiful testimony of the inimitable Elia: "Come back into memory, like as thou wast in the day-spring of thy fancies, with hope, like a fiery column before thee, the dark pillar not yet turned—Samuel Taylor Coleridge—Logician, Metaphysician, Bard! How have I seen the casual passer through the cloister stand still, entranced with admiration (while he weighed the disproportion between the speech and the garb of the young Mirandula), to hear thee unfold, in thy deep and sweet intonations, the mysteries of Iamblichus or Plotinus (for even in those years thou waxedst not pale at such philosophic draughts), or reciting Homer in his Greek, or Pindar—while the walls of the old Grey Friars re-echoed to the accents of the inspired charity boy." For all this, when we think of his life, we repeat, "Poor S. T. C."

And then as to dear "Elia" himself. Lamb's conversation was marked with perpetual eddies of verbal felicities. "Such wit, such humor, such imagination, such intelligence, such sentiment, such kindness, such heroism, all so quaintly mixed and mingled, and stuttering out in so freakish a fashion, and all blending so finely in that exquisite eccentric something which we call the character of Charles Lamb, made him the most lovable of writers and men."

Wordsworth was fond of hearing himself talk, and hardly knew when to stop, having once started. After reading lengthened reviews of his own poems, he would in the presence of company orally deliver still longer reviews of the reading, thus monopolizing all time and attention.

Remembrances of a London conversazione (quite an English institution, by-the-way) recall the bearing of Mark Lemon, Tom Hood, and Charles Dickens. The three were somewhat similar in talk, yet very dissimilar in temperament. Lemon was as obtrusive as his Punch, Hood naturally retiring, while Dickens seemed to stand between the two. Of the three, Dickens was the most vivacious, and his talk as full of the milk of human kindness as his own Brother Cherryble; Hood the most witty; and Mark Lemon the most commonplace, but pompous. Hood was quick at repartee, Dickens at illustration, each talking much as he wrote. Yet of the number Dickens was decidedly the best conversationalist. His great experience of London life, his keen appreciation of every phase of character, and his wonderful readiness, made him one of the most genial of companions.

Of statesmen, in this relation, space permits but the mention of two. It has been frequently stated of Dr. Franklin that his features were an index of the good temper, amenity, cheerfulness, and affability, which were his characteristics. John Adams represents him as taciturn on committees and in Congress. In society he was far from being loquacious; but no one possessed a more entertaining fund of conversation, or used it more happily on fitting occasions. Childhood, that "best detector of a gentle heart," was ever welcome to his knee. For the young, his manners and words of sage advice and pleasantry had an indescribable charm. Sir Francis Romilly, when a young man, called on him at Passy, in 1782, with a friend. "Dr. Franklin," he writes, "was indulgent enough to converse a good deal with us, whom he observed to be young men very desirous of improving by his conversation. Of all the celebrated persons whom in my life I have chanced to see, Dr. F., both from his appearance and his conversation, seemed to me the most remarkable."

I hold that the best conversationalist among statesmen of our own day was Abraham Lincoln. This opinion may possibly be contro-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

verted by those who would think only of an apparent awkwardness of manner, and an occasional violation of the rules of polite society. But if our conversation should have for its object the promotion of the welfare of those with whom we talk; if it should be filled with truth, with kindness, with encouragement, with consolation; if a true man should sway by the influence of speech—why, then, tried by this simple standard, the late President Lincoln was an excellent conversationalist. His total abstinence from a display of egotism, his sterling sense, his varied information, his terseness of expression, his truthfulness, his "honesty," his vast good-nature, his "mother-wit," his immense fund of anecdote for illustration, his adaptation of himself to all companies—these made him one of the best social talkers of our times. Thus has Emerson the Great quaintly, but justly, said of him, after speaking of his manner: "He is the author of a multitude of good sayings, so disguised as pleasantries, that it is certain they had no reputation at first but as jests; and only later, by the very acceptance and adoption they find in the mouths of millions, turn out to be the wisdom of the hour. I am sure if this man had ruled in a period of less facility of printing he would have become mythological in a very few years, like Æsop or Pilpay, or one of the Seven Wise Masters, by his fables and proverbs." Lincoln was thus one of the few men who swayed by the influence of speech in common conversation.

The style of these talkers is different in some peculiar shade from each of the others. Therefore no one can be taken as a model. Nor is a model, per se, required. Neither can set rules be made or enforced. While, however, there must be a catholicism of opinion here, there are yet some general principles which should be held concerning what in the majority of cases should be considered to constitute good talk.

As general rules, more or less applicable to all, the following are suggested:

1. Dispense with gasconade, to the use of which, we, as a nation, are too prone. The spread-eagle style is nauseating. The modern abbreviation "gas" is often too appropriate a term when referring to the talk of some individuals.

2. Away with egotism, which is only another form of gasconade. To speak frequently of what I said, I did, where I have been, how much I own, etc., etc., is simply ridiculous, and reminds one of a certain animal given to braying. A French writer has pertinently said that "you should always avoid mention of yourself, since, if it be an eulogium, people will regard it as a lie; while, if you criticise yourself, they will take you at your word, and accept it as an article of faith."

3. Avoid slang. So many new terms have crept from newspaper columns (the worst of all word-mints) into common conversation, that it may be sometimes difficult to detect the difference between the counterfeit and the pure coin of our language. But there are many words and phrases intentionally used as slang which derogate from the dignity of pure talk. Among the worst of all these are the offensive nicknames given to the different political parties of the day.

4. "Avoid evil communications which" are acknowledged to "corrupt good manners." Mere gossip belongs to empty or frivolous minds. Scandal is the prerogative of the vicious.

5. Cultivate the mind. "Read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest" in order not to reproduce, but also to produce. It is only thus that any can be distinguished from the common herd, who talk without ever having created an original idea, who are ignorant of life and its great responsibilities, of literature and its many beauties, of science and its demands, and of the relative importance of every social relation. The tittle-tattle which in some circles is styled conversation is nothing more than an infinitesimal potion of homeopathic broth diluted to the lowest possible extent, with only body enough left to strengthen the patient to wag his tongue. Upon his poor head is written: "To let, apply within."

6. Be truthful. Speech without truth is but babble. There might be more honesty in society. Men and women, by flattery, try to deceive each other. But this same flattery is nothing but devil's sugar—sweet in the mouth, bitter in its results.

7. Exemplify delicacy and propriety. A maxim of Bruyere's is most pertinent, and should be learned by every man, woman, and child in the land: "There is speaking well, speaking easily, speaking justly, and speaking seasonably. It is offending against the last to speak of entertainments before the indigent; of houses and lands before one who has not so much as a dwelling; in a word, to speak of your prosperity before the miserable. This conversation is cruel, and the comparison which naturally arises in them betwixt their condition and yours is excruciating."

We should not neglect to regard as next to the art of conversation the art of silence. Perhaps nothing more than this would be so difficult of acquirement by the ladies. Not that they should be slurred by any rude insinuation. But still it must be acknowledged that under almost all circumstances they have, at least, a propensity to talk, with seldom a disposition to be silent. And fortunate it is for the race (perhaps), especially for that portion given to a frequent attendance upon dinner and other parties, that, when ladies are present, they are always ready to fill a gap in the conversation. There can be no hiatus. But my notion is, that most men, as well as most women, talk too much—that is to say, in the prevalent fashion—and that more frequent silence would add grace to their character. Talking "for talk's sake," or to "kill time," should be made an indictable offense for unruliness of tongue before the high court of St. James the Apostle.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Knickerbocker's Visit:

A POEM OF ANCIENT AND MODERN TIMES.

THE evening shades were falling fast o'er good Manhattan Isle,
Whose countless streets and avenues lay stretched for many a mile;
The shadows deepened, lazily, as slow the sun went down,
And spread its welcome pall of gloom upon the busy town:
Way up the street, the forms of men whose hearts, the whole day long,
Had been struggling in the mazes of the City's busy throng,
Were bending homeward, slowly, as they gladly craved the rest
Which came, with twilight shadows, as the sun sank in the west.
Each thoroughfare and artery became a busy scene,
Where trade and money-making had usurped the verdant green;
Swift ran the tide, with faces bent, some with the marks of care—
Some day-dream having vanished into bubbles light as air—
Some who, in that day's market, had been on the losing side,
Or had "Bulled," when stocks were downward, and then to "Bear" had tried—
For the thousands they had counted, when the morning sun was bright,
Had departed, with the shadows, as the sun went down at night.
So the tide of Life's broad current ebbed and flowed, and bore along
The barks which men had ventured, many frail, and fewer strong,
All freighted with their dearest hopes. Among the busy crowd—
Who were seeking home at sunset, some so humble, some so proud,
Leaving many scenes behind them of their daily toil and strife,
To enjoy the hours of pleasure in the fleeting span of life—
None had thoughts of aught behind them, save some few, who grudged the time
They must lose in speculation, with some project in its prime.

As the jostling crowd kept onward, there was gathering, quite unseen,
A phantom, having birth-place where the setting sun had been:
Away out o'er the Hudson, a cloud, almost a speck,
Was floating in the Heavens, like the fragment of a wreck
Drifting on the troubled ocean, 'mid the waves of blue and foam,
Till the fiercely-rolling breakers should provide it with a home.
Soon the drifting cloud came nearer, as the stars came out anew,
And the City's myriad gas-jets pierced the falling darkness through—
While from out it came the outlines of a queer and ancient form,
Standing by the Hudson's outlet, in a halo, soft and warm.
In its shape it bore the lineament of a sage long mourned as dead,
Moving with a step so weary, and a halt and feeble tread,
As the shadows vanished from him and he stood, and seemed to smile,
Wondering at the strange appearance of this good Manhattan Isle:
In stature, small and wiry, with a pair of restless feet—
Encased in shoes, with buckles, silver, bright and very neat—
And olive-velvet breeches, which he wore in old Dutch style,
Long reft of nap and lustre, but most cleanly all the while;
A coat of seedy homespun, tightly fitting, like the rest;
And a widely-plaited shirt-frill across his aged breast.
His hat, with points and corners, had a rosette on one side,
Placed jauntily upon his head, almost with youthful pride.
He listened but a moment, as a boat was passing by,
Then raised the little old cocked-hat, and gazed upon the sky—
While, as he looked, a single tear seemed running down his cheek,
As, with a feeble accent, he slowly tried to speak:

"Once more I stand, but now unknown, by sacred Hudson's tide,
With unfamiliar scenes around, no friendly hand to guide.
All the old lanes and pasture-fields, with clover-tops so fair,
Are lost to sight—no fences left—no shady bowers are there;
Old places, once so very dear to these old eyes of mine,
Are scattered like the hoar-frost by the ruthless hands of Time.
Old things were changing swiftly, when last I saw this Isle—
The honest old Dutch customs—and the stones, which marked the mile,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Were lost in streets and alleys; and the roads, of which the cows
Had traced the crooked outlines as they moved about to browse,
Were laid with stones and pavement—the degenerated race
Had begun, with their 'improvements,' to wipe out the old Dutch place.
One day, when weary, I returned, to find the Hotel closed.
Of my saddle-bags and contents the landlord had disposed,
To pay his o'er-due board-bill; and I saw my name in print—
The pages of my History had been used up without stint;
Some other man had edited my scarcely finished book,
With all its errors on its head; he took no care to look
To see it fairly written out; the records, sought with care,
Were handled rather roughly, for the author was not there.
They intended to be honest, though, I scarcely have a doubt,
As they did not send it forward with the author's name rubbed out.
They treated me quite kindly then; I found myself with fame,
For people wanted autographs of Knickerbocker's name;
And many whom I scarcely knew, and ne'er spoke to, before,
Shook hands, and sometimes chatted, as I passed a neighbor's door;
Such things to me were sudden, and it puzzled me to think
Why some invited me to dine, and others, e'en to drink.
At places where I traveled they seemed to know me well—
Though why the towns had altered so, scarce any one could tell.

"In Albany, the fellows had been working such a change,
With their modern innovations, that the very place looked strange.
It was accident delayed me"—here the old man's eyes grew red—
"I could not see the papers, and the people thought me dead;
My History was truthful, though; and times were then, I trow,
A trifle better times than those the people live in now!
All changed, alas! E'en winds were rude, across the Tappaan Zee;
I felt them roughly blowing, as they tossed me here so free,
Not knowing that the cloud-speck they were wafting slowly here,
Was the spirit of old Diedrich, who held that sea so dear.
Though eagerly I sought to find some old and loved face,
While wandering o'er the City, scanning every nook and place,
All are gone, I know not whither, as I wander here alone,
And see great piles of red-burnt brick and blocks of brownish stone,
In rows of great tall buildings, almost even with the street,
As far as I can see them, till the sides appear to meet.

"Away off toward Communipaw—God bless the ancient name!
There runs a line of long black things (I saw it as I came),
Long rails of iron, fastened down by nails and spikes and hooks,
In equidistant measures, as Dutch school-boys ruled their books.
And something, snorting, past me ran, with demon's speed and light,
Spreading a line of seething sparks, and breaking up the night;
Its sound was loud and rumbling, like whirlwinds as they pass,
With a line of funny boxes, upon wheels, with panes of glass
Like windows, and strange people, some awake, and some asleep,
Were nodding at the window-panes, as if afraid to peep
At the demon just before them, flying onward with its fire,
That screeched and whistled loudly, but did not seem to tire.

"Ah me! indeed, things have much changed, since I was last in town!
If people, too, have altered, as the houses have, that frown
Upon the streets from lofty heights, and, shutting out the sun,
Spread heavy shadows o'er the way, ere half its course is run,
I would not care to live and see such altered folks and ways,
Since half-doors swung wide open, in those palmy old Dutch days,
When streets were cleaned by private hand, and all the City's light
Was furnished by the lanterns, from each tenth house hung in sight!"

He started on his journey, then, to search the City through,
For traces of the ancient times, not lost amid the new;
Scarce thinking that the footprints of the dear and honest past
Were too slight in their impression in this modern age to last.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

He paused at first, and wondered at the strange things to be seen
About the ancient neighborhood, known as the Bowling Green.
Beyond him once there menaced, from the flowing river's side,
The Battery and City Gate—both once the City's pride;
And stood the famous wind-mill, which served to grind the grain,
Or to tell which way the wind blew, as it swept from o'er the main,
In earlier time, ere governors and Burghers sat in state,
Or puffed in silent councils, in their weightiest debate.
There good old Peter Stuyvesant leaned o'er his garden wall,
And looked upon the Battery—armed with two guns, bold though small;
Or beheld the sturdy Schoinge,* with its line of driven piles,
And the big canal in Broad Street provoked his proudest smiles;
The Schoinge meant to save the shore from seas or stormy blast—
The canal to be the taxing-place for goods that through it passed,
For all New England peddlers, who might deem it worth their while
To dodge the honest duties, in their thieving Yankee style,
Imposed by doughty Burghers, who had thought the City safe,
Hemmed in by walls of pine and oak, from any Yankee waif,
Whose readiness to trading—though honest, in the main—
Might not be proof against a chance for making quicker gain.
Time was, when all the City could be seen from where he stood,
When cow-paths straggled o'er the hills, and all around was wood;
But now, the miles of jutting piers, with ships in serried line,
Which, with their thousand spars and masts, made forests of hewn pine,
Bespoke the age of commerce, with mighty ships like these,
All freighted home, or outward, with the ventures of the seas.

Towards Wall Street then he took his way, to find the landing-place
Of the people from Long Island; and he hoped to find some trace
Of that most noted building, of their famous City Hall,
Put up in 1700—heavy pillars, wings and all.
In searching for the City Hall, a marble pile he found,
Erected in old Broad Street, with some noble buildings round—
The beaten halls of finance, where the brokers daily roam,
Like busy-minded spiders, seeking flies within their home;
Where the fickle wheel of fortune spins so quickly every day,
For those who make their money in the fast, new-fashioned way—
Where "Harlem"—or "Old Southern"—sometimes "Prairie du Chien"—
Are handled to make money, with "Erie," too, thrown in—
Sold up or down, with matchless ease by those who make their hoard,
By beating speculators in the ring-pits of the "Board."
"Prairie du Chien," from thirty-six, in two days made to spring
To ninety-five; one Saturday, the pavements loudly ring,
With "one hundred and fifteen bid," in hopes some shares to get;
But a heavy operator had so well his spring-trap set,
That prices reached "two hundred," and he still supplied the street;
Advance of forty-five was bid—he all demands could meet—
Till, finally, one Tuesday, he was selling to them all,
And rushing on the market stock—the price began to fall
Below its starting figures, ere it stopped, with ruin round,
Among the many foolish ones, who "long" of it were found.
The Wall Street man his million made by operations neat,
And many fell in stocks, that day, who ne'er regained their feet.
Next, one sold "calls" on Harlem, for several thousand shares,
And another operator caught this same man unawares—
Bought up the "calls," ran up the price, and when this man was "short,"
He called for all his many shares, and in his little sport,
No stock could then be borrowed, and the loser paid, in cash,
The difference in the market-price, for little more than trash.
The buyer then controlled the road (and runs it to this day),
Since it cost him very little, in the honest Wall Street way—
Its stock kept from the market, as a handy sort of route,
To divert his mind from steamers, should his ocean lines die out.

* The Dutch name given to the street-piling, erected on the shore of the East River, to protect the shores against washing away.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

And some, when speculating, and the prices do not suit,
When they must pay the market-price (and lose control to boot),
Apply for stern injunctions, when they can't deliver stock,
Because some shrewder moneyed man contrives their game to block.
And so, they play with all in turn, just as the cliques think best,
As they've done in "Mariposa," in "Toledo" and "Northwest"—
Not like the times, when Burghers earned their gold in honest trade,
When stock-board gambling was unknown, and none for fortunes played.

Away from Wall Street then he sped, to where the river shone,
As seen in moonlit vista, between piles of brick and stone.
The longings for the olden time came o'er his spirit, then,
At thinking of the ferry, and the steady-pulling men,
Who rowed the famous long-boats, as their owner stood on shore,
And watched them pulling 'gainst the tide, with strong and sweeping oar.
James Harding (once a victualer) succeeded to the lease,
Which Rip Van Dam relinquished, when his term of rent should cease.
Grown tired of taking payment for his fares in doubtful ways,
In stuyvers' worth of wampum, which was current in those days.
The landing-places pointed out—the contract read—should be,
One ferry-house at "Burger's Path," and one at "Countess Key."
The ferry-boats were worthy ones, one-manned, and numbered six,
All built for pleasant weather; but in stormy times, the fix
For passengers in crossing was a doubtful one, and sore—
If tides were running strongly, all were needed at the oar.
These ferry-boats and oarsmen, with the cattle-scows behind,
Were still in fond remembrance in our Knickerbocker's mind.
He could not find the Burger's Path—'twas now Hanover Square;
And Countess Key had vanished, for now Maiden Lane was there.
The barn, the boat-house, all were gone; the landing-places, too,
Were lost in Time's mutations, and no longer stood in view;
Instead, were iron buildings, built with care and great expense,
And iron gates shut people out, instead of picket-fence.
The ferry-slips were built of piles, and boats propelled by steam,
Were coming in and going from beyond the busy stream;
While vessels rode at anchor, with lanterns fore and aft,
To show which way their bows should lie, to any passing craft.
Old Knickerbocker wondered, and sadly stood and wept,
To think how things had altered, while he had calmly slept.
The streets were new, and carriages and cars came rumbling past,
And people rudely jostled him, they hurried by so fast.
The old East River, also, where once cattle roam'd so free,
Was now a line of wharves—Corlear's Hook he could not see;
And where Long Island's verdant hills were view'd with jealous eye,
Long streets of chimneys and church-spires ran upward to the sky;
So, judging from the steeples that he counted in his view,
The people should be Christians, and be very moral, too.

Old Diedrich wandered, next, to streets lit up by gas and glare,
As though the darkness of the night had little business there:
Far up Broadway, with feeble step, he moved, and wondered quite
At very many things he saw, and did not think all right.
At that late hour, when honest folk, in old times, were in bed,
Who got up when the sun arose, ere morning's dews had fled,
A sort of ruddy gleam o'erspread the pavement's dingy blue,
From open basements from whose doors the light came shining through.
Great signs, with pictures painted of women gayly dressed
(And some with very little on), the things within expressed.
From out these glaring cellars there arose a horrid din
Of ribald mirth and music, from the hidden depths within;
And staggering up the dirty steps, there came a motley crowd,
With lines of some harsh-worded song, and laughter, long and loud.
A look within old Diedrich took, and there beheld a sight
(Which would have been, in by-gone days, the modest City's blight);
The air was thick with wreaths of smoke, and men were sitting round,
While some low comic-singer made the heated hall resound,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

With words and tune he oft addressed unto the smiling crowd,
Acknowledging their rude applause, as he went off, and bowed.
Bold women moved amid the throng, and sought a rude caress
From those with whom they chatted, and in return would press
To order drinks for girls and men, and so run up the sum
They strove each other to outvie, for bad cigars and rum.
There old men joked and bandied words, with waiter-girls like these,
Dressed up in tawdry finery, their childish guests to please:
Old men, who should have been at home, their strength and minds to save,
Instead of mocking youth's desire, with one foot in the grave.
Old Diedrich shuddered at the sight—his phantom-heart grew sick,
As, through the eager-listening crowd, he tried his way to pick,
Contrasting times and people, such as he beheld that night,
With times when people went indoors, almost at candle-light.
'Twas getting close to midnight, and the crowd seemed to increase,
As, noisy from their liquor, they encored each song and piece;
Some, clapping loudly as they thought some dancing-girl the best,
While some, in drunken sympathy, applauded with the rest,
And then sank back into their seats, with sullen air and smile,
And took another drink or two, their senses to beguile;
While boys, who should have been elsewhere, between the sheets tucked in,
Were drinking wine, and smoking too, and adding to the din.

O'ercome, almost, he gained the street, with wrinkled brow, and frown,
And started on his busy way unto the upper-town.
The shops were closed; but, here and there, on either side, he saw
Great windows filled with dry-goods, and hats of felt or straw,
All trimmed with gayest colors, at a milliner's, he passed,
Unlike the old-time bonnets, plain, and warranted to last
For several seasons: fashions, then, were scarcely known to change,
For female fancy, in those days, had no such giddy range;
These hats he saw before him were like the caps, so small,
That Dutch girls wore at frolics, at quilting-bees, or ball.
Through plate-glass panes, with silver bars, he saw a great display
Of things of beauty and great price, in most approved array,
While lights were brightly burning within the lonely store—
More useful for protection than police on guard before.
A jam of omnibuses, next, their drivers crying out
The squares and streets they came to, in their up or downward route,
To people, crushed and crowded in a slowly-moving stream,
From passages and hallways, where the flaring gas-lights gleam—
All coming from the play-house, while he could not help but stare,
To think that e'en fair women had been seeing actors there!
Large posters, pasted up on boards, set forth the things within,
All seen, for so much money, when performances begin;
A knight in mail, with visor down, is struggling, with his might,
Against another knight in mail, his rival in a fight;
While some fair maid, with flowing hair, comes rushing in between,
All making up the interest of the last sensation scene,
Done up in grand dramatic form, by playwright skilled and bold,
From stories, long "continued," in some weekly issue sold.
The street, where once the "Collect" ran (e'en at his latest date),
Where boys were wont to bathe their feet, or on the ice to skate,
Was now a line of buildings, covered o'er with signs of trade,
With rail-tracks in the middle, where the big boys used to wade.
No pump, with iron handle—no Collect-pond remained—
And curb-stone gutters carried off the flood when hard it rained.

Still farther up the busy street, where vice and virtue met,
Where gilded sin and luxury their filmy snares had set,
A name of fire, in dazzling glare of gas-jets, served to show
The patrons of a ballet-troupe the proper place to go;
To guide the throng, some artist had displayed his practiced hand,
By forms, on whitewashed canvas, of the dancers new and grand.
Some gay saloons, he too beheld, with people sitting round
Long rows of white-clothed tables, and waiting-men he found,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

All bobbing up and down, in liveries dressed precise,
And trying in their movements to be o'er polite and nice.
Fair maidens—and their mothers, too—with shoulders white and bare (Or covered by some flimsy stuff, which hid no beauties there),
Were sitting at the tables, drinking glasses of red wine,
Or quaffed some sparkling sort of drink, which seemed as strong as fine—
At least, it had a strange effect; for words began to flow
'Twixt mother-in-law (that was to be) and most devoted beau;
The maiden's eye grew brighter, and her cheek grew flushed and red,
As, from her giddy motions, one would think it reached her head;
And as the lover poured the wine into the daughter's glass,
Sweet looks and loving words began between the two to pass:
And women flirted 'cross the room, whose husbands did not see
The silent signals they exchanged, in wanton coquetry,
With some one sitting opposite, who would a stranger seem—
Who just dropped in to have a cup of chocolate, or some cream.
And some were mingling in the crowd, who bore the look of shame—
Yet shielded from the world's reproach by fashionable name;
But, as he watched, the City clock tolled out an early hour,
As one by one the stars went in, and moonlight lost its power;
And, not till then, the merry crowd came bustling from within,
And rolled away in carriages, ere daylight should begin.
He left the square, as lights went out, not caring to remain,
And sighed a heavy phantom sigh, then started off again.

He sped, next, to the Bowery (which still retained its name,
With spelling slightly altered), though the place was not the same:
Quick-driven carts came rushing by, and as the light increased,
Came many working-people from their sleeping-homes released,
And men and boys, with hasty tread, were wending their way down
Towards their varied work-shops, in the business parts of town.
'Twas in that famous "Bouwery"—not then a built-up street,
A noted one-legg'd Governor once found a safe retreat,
When wearied with his office cares; or, with a chosen few,
To wander, in his quiet way, its shady pathways through.
Here once he planted for himself a famous-bearing tree,
Away from out the City's line, from boys and poachers free.
The length and breadth of highway through, our anxious little man Looked for the place where it should be, as every street he'd scan.
"These Vandal scamps, in their hot haste," he said, unto himself,
"To build their stores and drinking-shops, to hoard their Yankee pelf,
Have e'en cut down this famous tree, which, till it fell, should stand,
As proudly cherished as of old, since planted by his hand!"
At last, he found it; and, for once, he had no cause to weep;
He knelt and bowed with rev'rence, with affection, pure and deep.
"They are not quite so bad, I see," he murmured, with a smile—
"They have not torn up every thing, in their accustomed style;
They've turned the Bouwery from its course, but here this trunk I see,
Protected by an iron fence, and kept as it should be;
'Tis scant of leaf, and old dead limbs betray the scars of age—
Yet 'tis a punctuation-mark, still left on History's page!"

The sun came up; it was high-noon before he left the scene,
Where once so many precious things, in olden-time, had been.
Throughout the altered neighborhood, the only thing he found
Was Stuyvesant's old tombstone, set in consecrated ground,
With nodding weeping-willows, drooping o'er his grave the while,
Where old St. Mark's still reared its spire—an ancient, honored pile.
Old Diedrich hurried quickly from the spot where this was seen,
For there, in years long passed away, they laid him 'neath the green,
According to his last request, that his remains be laid
Near where his loved Governor's were hid beneath the shade.
The "Bouwery," where streets once bore the names of mighty men,
Who flourished in the City, and were justly honored, then;
And where old Peter's house was seen, with little porch and stoop,
Till burned in '77, by the vengeful British troop,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

He found a street, with pave and grade, where once were oak and pines,
And "Judith Street" and "Margaret" ran at uneven lines.

With furtive glance at old St. Mark's, he left the town behind,'
Where scenes were changed so rapidly, it almost turned his mind:
Where once the fields and barren rocks were homely in the sight,
And people would not travel in the lonely hours of night,
Were graveled paths; and roads, so smooth, they almost seemed to be Picked over by the hands of men, from every pebble free;
With hills and dells, and ponds, o'er which the architect had thrown Great massive bridges, carved and cut from marble or gray stone.
Far as his wandering eye could reach, the view was still the same—
A marvel of good order, that from out the wild-wood came.
Long lines of handsome carriages were going in and out,
While riders dashed along the pave of every bridle-route;
Barouches—phaetons—"Clarences"—and something called a "drag"—
A very proper English name, as o'er the roads they lag—
With spotted dogs, that ran along between the two fore-wheels,
Their noses almost touching the prancing horses' heels;
The wealth and fashion of the time, with folks of highest mark,
Were vying with each other, as they rode through Central Park.
"Indeed," he said, but not displeased, "they have done some few things,
From which an added lustre to the City's glory springs;
And here, where all the people find, it seems, a great resort
For fashionable flirting, idle-talk, and other sport,
I find these works of grandeur, which in Dutch times could not be—
To make, from common pasture-grounds, the noble Park I see."

He stretched himself upon the grass, unseen by men in gray,
Who paced, with quickened step and eye, along the crowded way,
Or calling to some fast young man, who drove with loosened rein,
To stop his team—which then he did—and trotted off again:
Then past him rode the ladies fair, and men of some renown,
Who mingled with the good (or bad) within the distant town;
Then came a pair of lovers, in their Sunday hats and dress,
Who slyly 'neath the lap-robe a willing hand would press;
And next, some bachelor, alone, drawn up so straight and prim,
As though the crowd of ladies were all looking right at him.
Behind him rode a millionaire—controlling four-in-hand—
High-perched upon a vehicle built in a foreign land,
The seats all filled with ladies, dressed almost in regal state,
With heads held very high in air, and trying to look great:
'Twas said, the man who drove the span, whose footmen rode behind,
Who spent his thousands every year in fancies of all kind,
Was once a jolly country-lad, and made his living, too,
By driving droves of pigs, or sheep, the country markets through.
Bold speculation (and good luck) had raised him o'er the mass,
Who gave him room along the road with his turn-out to pass.
Yet, while he rides, so brilliantly, and fashionably lives,
With open hand, in charity, he many hundreds gives—
While in such giddy whirl and show he scatters golden meed,
He's seldom found unmindful of the poor, who stand in need.
Behind him rolled a sober coach, with comfort, and no show,
Which, through the smaller roadways, is driven sure and slow;
The coachman wore but sober black—no gaudy arms or crest
Emblazoned on its panels—neater so than all the rest—
The occupants their riches won in honest trade, and such Bore on their rounded features some traces of the Dutch.

Old Diedrich would have tarried here, but, far-off he saw the gleam
Of where the ancient Harlem ran, a swift and noted stream.
Its sloping banks looked quite the same, all crowned in shaded wood,
Except where in some clearing a pretty cottage stood;
And men in row-boats fished, as oft they did when he was young,
And carried home to Bloomingdale their fish, on saplings strung.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

But, o'er the river stretched a frame, of wood and iron made,
Built out on piers of stone and brick, and over arches laid;
And as he stood, and wondered what this mighty thing could be,
The wings on either side were sprung, as he could plainly see,
A sloop passed through—the bridge swung round, and Knickerbocker saw
A train of cars come thundering safe across the fragile draw!
Still farther up, a steamboat puffed her noisy way along,
O'er channel-ways where rocks were hid beneath the current strong;
The decks were filled with passengers, all singing gayly too,
As up the Harlem River they were vanishing from view.
Above it towered a massive bridge, of such a wondrous height,
The combing-pieces on the sides were almost out of sight,
And men and women on the top were merely specks, so dim,
Like funny little puppets, looking down and mocking him.
The puffing little steamer, too, passed 'neath the arches wide,
As Diedrich shuddered, lest the boat should strike the stony side—
Yet more amazed, when safely steered and landed at the dock,
Just where the blue waves foamed and broke around the jagged rock.

At mighty works of art and skill, which modern hands had raised,
Our old-time Knickerbocker was most properly amazed;
But, as he stood, in listless mood, and rather ill at ease,
The sunlight slowly faded; birds were nestling in the trees;
The golden beams of sunset crowded out the brilliant blue,
And all the circling eddies took a darker greenish hue.
Beyond, up in the western sky, our phantom friend beheld
A distant cloud, borne towards him, which lingering thoughts expelled.
Old Diedrich smiled; the cloud sank down about his ancient form,
As fogs are sometimes seen to do, at sea-sides, in a storm.
"My time is almost spent," said he, "and yet, I am not through,
And fain would take, before I go, a hasty birds-eye view
Of several places once I loved, not very far from here,
Where Dutchmen spent their holidays, and met to drink their beer."

His means of travel being fast, to Spuyten Duyvil Creek
This little phantom visitor his wandering way would seek,
To see so many changes he ne'er dreamt of, years before—
A railroad-station; cottages, with gardens round the door.
The Hudson, too, was modernized—and vessels drifted past,
Their sails all spread to catch the breeze, as long as it should last;
Deep-laden sloops, filled up with brick, or stone, or market goods,
Were winding round the channel-ways, beneath the grim old woods;
Propellers, towing barges, sped, slow-moving, in the shades
Cast o'er the river's bosom, by the towering Palisades.
Away he flew, borne on the breeze, and ran a jolly race,
Against the "Lightning Express Train," to its next stopping-place.
He gained a mile, could then afford his rapid pace to slack,
Since heavy, frowning mountains ranged in line across the track—
He chuckled, in his glee, to think he could much faster go,
Than something modern he had met, since old times were so slow.
The train, however, did not stop—it did not e'en go round,
But shot beneath the mountain, through tunnels under ground.
Around the curves, and over ponds, it swept, while on its route,
The thriving towns and cities seemed like magic to spring out.
A clap of thunder echoed loud, and ran from peak to peak,
As adverse winds and rain-drops made his progress slow and weak;
The train kept on, unmindful of the storm that stopped him quite,
And gained upon his cloud so fast it soon ran out of sight.
Next, he saw splendid steamboats, running almost side by side,
As, sweeping round the river bends, they stemmed the ebbing tide;
And, through their open windows, he saw grandly-lit saloons,
With men and women dancing to some very lively tunes;
While red-faced men, seen through the ports, were throwing fuel in
The open, red-hot furnaces, with sooty smile and grin.

The steamers passed him quickly, as he then retraced his way
To where, among the Highland hills, old Tarrytown should lay,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Where honest Hendrick Hudson, once, discovery thought to end,
Not thinking that the river could run up beyond the bend.
'Twas slightly altered; towns had grown; but here our old man found
Most all the things he loved so well, in this familiar ground:
The silvery Pocantico brook still wound its idle way,
Where branches met and shade was found, at all hours of the day.
He sought the church, and found it, too; this storied place was still
The same old Sleepy Hollow; the dam, the bridge, the mill,
Were standing yet, though old and worn, and scarcely in repair—
As though the march of modern times had made no inroads there.
'Twas much the same; and though the storm, with lightning flash, broke o'er,
There seemed a solemn stillness, as in happy times before,
When lazy men, and maidens coy, and some Dutch truant boys,
Had sought a refuge from the world, in Sleepy Hollow's joys;
And here, as o'er the river spread the blackness of the storm,
The clouds enveloped closer our old Knickerbocker's form—
The ancient phantom seemed to fade, and slowly sink from view,
As, in the Christmas pantomimes, the brightest fairies do.

When he was gone, the clouds dispersed, the thunders died away,
And gleams of coming moonlight on the mountains seemed to play;
The brook, whose gurgling waters lately ran with so much speed,
Ran slower towards its outlet, as if it had no need
For headlong haste—and as it paused, old Sleepy Hollow wore
The same sweet, dreamy silence that it had an hour before;
The ancient trees their branches shook, and let the rain-drops fall
Upon the thirsty ground beneath, which gladly drank them all.

Within the little church-yard the shadows gathered slow,
And all the many grave-stones were whitened as with snow;
A startled robin, chirping, flew to seek its wonted nest,
Among the rose-trees clustered o'er some loved one gone to rest;
And as it flew, and glistening drops fell from its quivering wing,
From all their hiding-places airy figures seemed to spring;
Sweet lips some solemn chant expressed, then slowly died away,
As visions of old Diedrich's form seemed o'er the spot to stay.
The moon came from beneath the cloud, and all its bright rays shone
Upon the plain inscription, on an unpretending stone,
That marked the resting-place of one, whose witchery of thought,
Had, with a master's hand and skill, so many legends wrought—
Who gave to Sleepy Hollow's dells a great and storied name,
And gave to Hudson's mountain-banks a wide and lasting fame;
Who, while his path, in foreign lands, was thick with honors strewn,
And many friends around him grew, thought proudly of his own;
And when, at last, the Good One called the wanderer home to rest,
Was laid, by many mourners, 'mid the scenes he loved the best:—
From this old spot, so quaintly known, old Diedrich took his flight—
The cloud-speck rose among the trees, and melted from the sight,
Where, in this humble church-yard, the ancient branches wave,
And spread their falling shadows over Irving's honored grave.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE VIRGINIANS IN TEXAS.

CHAPTER VII.

CONTAINING WHAT WILL BE FOUND IN IT.

YES, Venable was remarkably successful for so young a beginner. Uncle Frank was delighted. He was a boy after his own heart. But his father rather shook his head. He was glad to see his son bold, active, fearless, energetic; but he feared he might acquire too great a passion for hunting, to the neglect of other and more important things. So, with the full consent of his mother—the empress of the household—his father issued his decree. Save in rare cases, from Monday morning to Friday night was to be given to labor and study; Saturday only was to be devoted to hunting.

As a great deal had yet to be done, study for the present was confined to one good lesson well learned and recited to Mrs. McRobert before breakfast. All day was then given to work. After an early supper Venable read aloud, or instructed his younger brother. It is astonishing how fast the boys came on in their studies, for of all teachers in the world a child's own parents are the best—when they are at all qualified to be parents.

By the end of July the garden was overflowing with the reward of all the toil. The boys had learned the art of raising water-melons by planting the seed in soil which had been dug up to the depth of near three feet. This permitted the roots to draw moisture up from far below, even when the earth was all dry and burned on the surface. Subsoiling this is called, and it is the secret of raising a good crop of any thing, and especially in a country subject to such droughts as Texas. In Virginia the boys had never entered the garden save to eat its fruits; but now almost all in it was the result of their own toil, and they enjoyed it ten times as much. And so with all the family—there was a larger, deeper sense of enjoyment than they had ever known before. They had now an object, an interest in life—a vigor and a pleasure unknown before.

Almost ever since reaching Texas Venable had paid special attention to writing, with the almost exclusive purpose of being able to write back to his favorite cousin, Charley—a son of his Uncle George. Thus he wrote, about the end of August:

"My Dear Cousin,—I was glad to get your letter. I am sorry to know that things are so dull with you back there in dear 'Ole Virginny,' as Rohamma calls it. Don't get out of bed till the breakfast bell? Why, we are up and busy by five o'clock every morning. It is the best part of the day—it is so cool and fresh and clear. 'I don't think the world could have looked more beautiful in Eden to Adam and Eve than it does now,' I heard ma say to pa yesterday before breakfast. You don't know how fresh and young ma and pa are both getting to be. You know pa used to be almost all day in the house at home, reading papers and things, complaining of being a little sick; and ma about the same. Now it is very little of the time pa is in out of the open air, and they have not either of them been sick at all. We are all glad we came to Texas—glad—glad. We do not have so many fine things and nice things indoors; but we look more out of doors for our happiness now, and out of doors it is grand, I tell you! The pure air, the splendid scenery, the spring, the river, the prairie, to say nothing of our stock and our corn! What we have inside our houses, you know, is man's work; it is God's work that lies outside, and there is so much more of it, and I like it best.

"But I want to tell you about my learning how to swim. I have told you before all about our magnificent spring. It is a stream gushing up from under the mountain, near seventy feet broad and twenty feet deep in places—all in solid white rock. If you stand on the edge you can see any quantity of fishes swimming about—the little ones near the top, the larger ones, as long as your arm, at the bottom. And then the water is so deliciously cold these hot days to bathe in. We have got the very place to bathe in too—down the spring from the house, out of sight, behind a heap of rock and a willow grove. It is solid rock; but it shelves in so gradually! You remember how afraid I always was of the water. Uncle Frank laughed at me so much about it that I waded far out, but I couldn't swim. I tried my best over and over again, but it was no use. One day Uncle Frank said it was all nonsense; so he took me before I could help myself twenty feet from shore out into ten feet water. 'Now,' he said, 'wait till you get your breath. Be quiet—don't be flurried. I'm going to let you go here—you must swim to shore.' 'But I don't know how to swim,' I said, and I almost cried, and begged and held on like an eel. He held me till I had got quiet again; then, sure enough, he suddenly left me to myself out there in ten feet water. Would you believe it, Charley, I actually swam ashore. I had to do it, you know, or go to the bottom! You can't tell how glad I was to find I really could swim. Since then I have been practicing every morning—am not at all afraid. Will has not learned yet; but I guess he soon will if Uncle Frank can only catch him. Duke can swim—and if it is nature to him to do so, I don't see why it should not be nature to us too, if only one would not be so frightened at first.

"I wish you were here. Every morning now I am out at the bathing-place as the sun rises. There is a flat, clean edge of rock just over a place twenty feet deep. When I have got off my clothes there I whistle Duke to me, then plunge off head-foremost as deep as I can drive myself down, down into the pure, clear water—Duke head-foremost, too, after me. Such a kicking and splashing, and laughing and shouting—it is the best fun in the world! Pa lets me stay in only ten minutes; it is too exhilarating—it weakens one when one stays in longer than that. I come out all aglow—so happy and so hungry! and so stout and strong after breakfast!

"But I am making my letter too long, especially as I write so often. Pa says this is the best way to write compositions—writing a real letter to some one. But I hear Uncle Frank in the yard. To-day is Saturday—my hunting day—and I must close. Love to all, from your affectionate cousin, Venable."

And it was well that Uncle Frank did come just then. Bessie was stooping over the ground playing with something when he entered the yard. As soon as she saw him:

"Oh, uncle, uncle!" she said, "do come here, hereth thutch a long caterpillar. I've been turning it over and over with a little thtick, it's got forty eleven legs—do come!"

Her uncle approached, gave one glance over her shoulder, and the next instant had snatched her almost across the yard. It was a centipede near ten inches long. It did look like a huge caterpillar, only flatter, and its body

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google made up of shells, like a string of chestnuts touching each other, yellow and hard. There were two long feelers extending from beside its jaws, and no less than fifty legs on each side, long and hard, with cruel hooks on them.

"It's a mercy I came," said the Texan, holding down the squirming thing to the ground under the end of his rifle, as the mother ran out and took the terrified child from the ground. "Bessie was playing with it with a stick not three inches long; if it had seized on her hand I don't see how we could have saved her. The miserable thing not only seizes on with its jaws, but it buries all of its hundred claws in the flesh too—never lets go, and sends venom in through each claw. It would have to have been cut off with a knife, and each separate claw actually dug out."

"Hold on, uncle!" cried Will; "don't crush it. I'll have a bottle in a moment!"

And in a few minutes he had run into the house and returned with a wide-mouthed soda glass jar six inches high. By a little management the reptile was driven in and tightly corked up, after the jar had been filled with whisky.

"Died drunk!" said Uncle Frank, as the centipede ceased to writhe in the jar. "And see what a purple it has turned! But what's your idea, Will?"

"Oh, I'm making a museum," answered Will. "Don't you remember that nice gentleman—a Swiss pa called him—who staid with us the other night. He had a long green tin case slung on his back, and such a queer knapsack. Studer, that was his name. He is collecting all sorts of bugs, and flowers, and things. I promised to save every thing of the sort for him till he came back. Come and see what I've got, uncle!"

Accordingly Will had him into his room. Along the wall he had got Venable to make him a neat shelf, and on it were a row of bottles given him by the Swiss naturalist. In one were half a dozen lizards of all sorts, with tails four inches long—lizards blue, green, yellow, striped, spotted.

"Hard work I had to catch these swift-jacks," said Will, "they run so fast. They flash through the grass like lightning in a cloud. I've only caught these, and you know there's a dozen other kinds."

"Where did you get this?" asked his uncle, taking up another jar containing a singular reptile. It was a sort of worm near an inch in diameter, of a dun color, with jaws and short legs, loathsome to look on beyond expression, about three inches long, something of a leech, centipede, caterpillar, and snake all in one.

"I found that by the corn crib," said Will. "But what is it, uncle?"

"I don't know," replied the Texan. "I asked Studer, and he don't know; he says that it is altogether new to science. Nobody knows whether it can bite or not, but I declare I'd rather risk a centipede. This is the second I ever saw. Suppose we name it after you the Lacerta Gulielmi—in English, Will's Grub. But how did you catch this tarantula without crushing it?"

"It was so strange, uncle, I must tell you about it. One day," continued Will, "I was going out to the prairie to drive up the cows. As I was walking along the path I saw this fellow taking his walk. See, his body is as big as a partridge-egg, all covered with black hair—just look at his horrid red jaws; and his legs so stout and so hairy he could hardly lie under a big saucer. He looks the king of all the spiders—and I expect he is—their great-grandfather at least. When he saw me, do you think, he didn't actually stop and then come jumping at me, his mouth wide open! How he jumped! I didn't have any stick, and I was afraid of him, I tell you. Just then I noticed a wasp flying round and round him. The tarantula began to run for his hole when the wasp struck him—bang! Oh, how mad he was! He reared himself up on his hind-legs, threw his fore-legs in the air and clashed them together, working his ugly red jaws all the time. But the wasp only flew round and round until he saw his chance, then popped him again on the back, knocking him clean over. I stood there and watched the fight I don't know how long. At last the tarantula tumbled over, and the wasp flew round till he was satisfied he was dead, then flew straight off about his business. I gave a hurrah for Captain Wasp, ran home, got my jar, and soon had Colonel Tarantula corked up. Did you ever know any body to be killed by a bite of one of them, uncle?" asked Will in conclusion.

"I've known many persons to be bitten by tarantulas and centipedes, but they were always doctored in time," replied his uncle. "A centipede crawled once over Francisco's leg when he was lying fast asleep—the print of the claws are there still and often pain him, although he knew nothing about it till he woke.

"Once," continued the Texan, turning to the others who had now come into the room, "I was out on the prairies on a surveying party, and lay down one night in my clothes, tired to death. In the night I felt something crawling up my leg under my pants. I knew it was a centipede, and I made a desperate grab and caught it off my flesh, and held it till the boys could cut my clothes off me around my hand with their knives. Another time I was getting up in the morning after sleeping sound all night, when I found a big black tarantula right by where my neck had been."

"Will had a little adventure of the kind the other day," said his mother. "He had washed his face in the basin, and, with his eyes shut to keep out the soap, he applied the towel to his face, then dropped it with a scream, for a scorpion had fastened on his nose. It was on the towel, but he did not see it. I was dreadfully alarmed at first, but applied ammonia to it, and it was well before night."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Oh, it didn't hurt more than a wasp sting," said Will; "not half as bad as a hornet."

"But it's the ants that are the worst," said his father; "there is a large bed of the red ants by the garden gate. I have been fighting them, as the boys call it, for weeks. First I poured down boiling water every day or two, then I blew it up by pouring powder down into the hole as far as it would run, then I tried some potassium Mr. Studer gave me. I would place the lumps in the mouth of the hole, moistened with water, and every ant that walked over it dropped down dead, killed by the fumes. But they are there still: I do not see that I have diminished them in the least."

"And I've a nest in my yard," said his brother, "that I've fought for years. I've tried all the things you speak of; and I once mixed a quantity of turpentine and castor-oil, poured that down and set it on fire: it was burning for an hour as far as it had run. Next, I tried to blow sulphur-smoke down. By-the-by, I knew a man who was himself killed by the fumes in trying that. Then I would sink a big jar in the path to and from the hole, the edge of the mouth on a level with the earth. Quarts on quarts I caught that way, but it didn't even thin them that I could see. Old Texans say the only way to break up a nest is to dig it entirely out. But then, they say, that the ants always carry their holes down till they come to water. I knew a gentleman who dug his well through an ant-nest on this account—seventy feet down he traced the hole, and didn't come to water at last. Then, again, I knew another man who had an ant-bed in the centre of his yard. He dug down six feet and came to the central nest. There were the queen ants—the grandmothers of millions — near as big as a wasp, and any quantity of eggs—a barrelful: he dug it, and left a spring of abundant water instead. He told me that all the rest of the ants turned claws up, dead—all over the yard for an acre around—of broken hearts when the citadel had been stormed, and their revered parents killed."

"It is the brown ant, the cutting ant, that does the mischief," said Mrs. McRobert. "They stripped our largest China-tree in one night of all its leaves; some were busy cutting, while others below were carrying away the leaves as they fell. If any of us prove to be sluggards here, it certainly will not be for want of going to the ant and considering her ways."

"And not one single insect or reptile but has its own particular end to accomplish in the world," said her husband.

"But what possible good do mosquitoes and horse-flies do?" asked his brother.

"There is no telling," was the reply; "the millions of insect life may consume things in earth and atmosphere which are in some way necessary, yet which would make the globe uninhabitable if not kept in bounds. As to the horse-flies, you well know that they actually drive the cattle up home—herd them from the prairies for their owners in summer—doing the work of thousands of herdsmen: change the name, call them winged herdsmen, and you will think more of these native-born Texans. As to mosquitoes, they hover over damp places, and many an ague and yellow-fever do they actually eat up in the bud, if we only knew it. I can't tell what each separate star is made for, or what each idiot is permitted for; but I do know that all things are created and ordered by One infinitely wise and good."

"Don't you remember, pa," interrupted Venable, "the lines you made me get by heart:

"'That nothing walks with aimless feet;
That not one life shall be destroyed,
Or cast as rubbish to the void,
When God hath made the pile complete;
'That not a worm is chosen in vain;
That not a moth with vain desire
Is shriveled in a fruitless fire,
Or but subserves another's gain.'"

"Yes," said his father, with some emotion. "It is my religion that nothing whatever but is made by our Father in heaven for some special, wise, good end. In same way that no event, great or small, but is permitted by the same Father in wisdom and love. I delight in such a God. I love to see Him every day, in every thing. It gives a meaning and a dignity and a glory to our daily life. Only feel this—a sense of our Father—our Father always on his throne—our Father superintending every thing and every event during each successive instant, and having him for our dearest, nearest friend, how it elevates and strengthens one all the time—as much, more in fact, in adversity than in prosperity. To know, love, fear, serve, rejoice in such a friend all the time is the sum and substance of my religion!"

All this time Uncle Frank seemed to be busy examining a horned frog which Will had bottled up among his curiosities. He said nothing, but it was evident that his brother's words had made a deep impression on him.

"However," said Mrs. McRobert, after a pause, "if you are going up in the cedar brake it is time to be off—it is nearly eight o'clock."

For some time past Mr. McRobert had been cutting rails and constructing a raft with them up the river for the purpose of floating them down to the mouth of the San Hieronymo. There Hark was to be ready, with boat and ropes, to secure the raft to the bank, to be drawn up the spring branch and hauled to the prairie they were in course of fencing. Hark had already been dispatched to the spot to make ready, and the two gentlemen, accompanied by Venable and Will, started for the brake. As it was his hunting day, Venable and his uncle both took their rifles. On arriving at the spot, some two miles up the river, they found the raft still swinging against the bank, held by its ropes.

"I see some of our cows have been about here," said Venable, pointing to tracks in the soft edge of the river beside the raft.

It would have been well had all looked closer

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google at the tracks, as well as at the ropes which held the raft.

"Friends and fellow-citizens!" said Uncle Frank, who was standing on a stump, "I've a proposition to make before we start the raft. It's very early. Hark had to bail out his boat and get his ropes ready for us below. They're out of venison at my ranch and at the house too. Suppose we step up a mile or two to Plum Spring and kill a deer. I can feel in this trigger-finger that one is on his way there this moment for a drink. We can soon have it here, throw it upon the raft, and then float away for home."

Exacting a promise from his brother and son that they would return within two hours at the farthest, Mr. Morton McRobert yielded his consent, remaining behind with Will. After they had been gone a few moments Mr. McRobert gave his son a charge on no account to leave the spot, and strolled off up the river to dig up a rare specimen of cactus which he had promised to transplant into his front-yard for his wife.

As he left Will drew his fishing-line from his pocket, tied the end to a convenient stick, baited his hook with a grub, and began to fish in a deep pool beside the raft. It was a lovely morning, the water reflecting the calm blue sky above. In the distance could be heard the singular cry of the great gray owl of Texas, while the tree lizards were still keeping up their morning concert. Nothing could be more still and peaceful. Already Will had caught several fine trout, and was glancing about for his father, to whom he was anxious to display them, when he heard a noise behind him. Looking back, he saw that it was only a cow—somewhat smaller, of a dun color unusual to him—and was about resuming his sport when he saw that the cow, on catching sight of him, had stopped and was angrily shaking her head. Then it suddenly occurred to the boy that it might be one of the wild cows of whom he had heard Francisco often speak. These are cattle that have for many years run wild, or are descended from domestic cattle, but have themselves never been tamed. They are regarded as among the most dangerous of all wild animals with which the woods of Texas abound. Even the most fearless hunter dreads to meet them upon an open prairie; for, especially when wounded, they are savagely furious. Now it so happened that the ropes with which the raft was secured to the bank had been kept in an old brine barrel in the smoke-house, and were saturated with salt. For several days the animal had visited the spot, and had chewed at the ropes until they were almost in two in several places. She was now returning to the spot when she caught sight of the boy.

In an instant Snap, Will's terrier, had dashed at her. Had it not been for this she might have turned and gone her way. As it was, provoked by the assault, she rushed right at the boy over the body of his dog. There was only one chance for Will, and that was the raft. With a loud cry for his father the boy sprang with all his might from the log, on which he was standing, upon the floating raft. The current already bore strongly against it; in a short time it would have broken loose of itself. The jar of the boy's feet was just the last grain needed to break the camel's back; and, as he struck upon the raft, the last tie that held it to the bank parted, and it began to float slowly away.

The wild cow, too, reaching the raft almost at the same instant, placed her fore-hoofs on the edge, though somewhat doubtfully, to follow. This gave additional impulse to the raft, and it was soon ten feet from the shore.

Even yet Will could have escaped by clinging to the overhanging willows. But he was too much terrified by the attack even to notice for some time that the raft was moving away. He was not so terrified, however, but that he made the shore ring with cries for his father. As to his father, he had been attracted from one flowering cactus to another till he had gotten some distance up the river. Then he observed an enormous ammonite — a fossil sea-shell—projecting from a high bank still further up. Laying down his cactus roots, he had broken off a pole, and had climbed the hill. He has inserted the end of the pole beside the petrified shell, and it is just rolling down the bank, when he hears the voice of his son again and again. Dropping every thing, he hastens down the bank and along the shore. But it is slow work at best—logs and boulders and tangled vines intercept him. His hat is knocked off. Once or twice he falls even in his haste. It seems to him as if he would never reach the spot—blaming himself as he goes for leaving it even for a moment. He nears it at last, bareheaded, anxious, exhausted. With an eager bound he leaps over a rock that hides the place from view. One glance shows him that the raft is gone, and the next the infuriated cow rushes upon him.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE RAFT.

SWIFTER, and still more swiftly, floated the raft down the river. Several times it struck against projecting points of shore, where Will could have leaped ashore; but he was too much alarmed to move from the spot on which he lay, poor little fellow! afraid to stand, and holding on to a cross-piece with all his might.

On and on he swept. Now he would cry for his father, and then he tried to steady himself on his knees and pray to God to help him. One thing encouraged him: he remembered that Hark was in the boat at the mouth of the San Hieronymo waiting to catch the raft. But he now began to observe, to his dismay, that as it floated down stream it was drifting toward

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the other side, the western side, of the river. As the globe revolves on its axis, spinning so swiftly toward the east, all things on its surface have a tendency to be left behind by the motion, throwing themselves toward the west. This is the reason that the western bank of rivers are more worn by the water than the eastern, and why drift-wood is thrown rather to that side than the other. It was at the very creation of the globe that God gave it this motion on its axis. This motion is part of a great arrangement of the Almighty, by which the globe is related to, and moves in perfect harmony with, the moon and sun, and all the planets, and all the myriads of stars. Now Will was only a little boy. He was but as a grain of sand on the sea-shore compared to the great globe he was on, to say nothing of how small and insignificant he seemed in comparison to all the universe lying around the globe. Yet there was a Providence of God in regard to even little Will in this grand motion of the globe on its axis. We will see how.

By this time the raft was nearing his uncle's ranch. Will knew that Francisco was somewhere there, and he began to shout for him as loud as he could. Francisco was there mending his saddle. He heard the cries, and ran down to the bank as fast as he could. But just before he got there the raft had swept around a bend below, and was out of sight. Francisco remained for half an hour on the shore, gazing in every direction and shouting, and he began at last to think it must have been something supernatural that he had heard; so he only crossed himself and went back to the mending of his saddle. He could not have saved Will if he had seen him pass. Why, we will see after a while.

As soon as the boy had passed his uncle's landing he began to shout for Hark. By this time he was almost on the opposite side of the river. Hark was sitting in the boat, the oars in his hands, waiting for the raft. At his feet was a large tin bucket, in which was his dinner; but he was fast asleep. The boat was not tied, but the end of it was high enough up on the sandy bank to keep it from floating away. Negroes can not sit still any where for half an hour of a summer's day without going fast asleep; and though Hark was as fine a black man as you would wish to see, he was not superior to his nature.

Will was almost on him with his raft before he heard his cries. Then he started up and began to back the boat out in a desperate hurry; but before he could do this and get turned fairly around the raft was far down stream on the other side. There was a Providence in this too. Negroes, however smart on land, are perfect fools on water, unless they have been very much used to it; especially when in the least danger, they lose all their presence of mind. Even one who can swim is ten times more apt to drown than a white man. I am sure he would have drowned both Will and himself if he had waked before the raft had passed him; perhaps that was the reason he was permitted to be asleep.

Poor Will! he now sank on the frail structure that bore him, exhausted with terror. There was no hope now. He began to have strange fancies that he was on the back of a great bird that was flying away with him. Then he thought the wild cow had got on the raft, and was trying to get at him. Once a garfish several feet long actually jumped through the raft beside where he lay, flapped about on him, and then slipped off again.

By this time he began to hear the roar of the rapids below him, but in his fainting condition he imagined it was Hark and Rohamma grinding hominy on the steel mill. As he neared the rapids the frail structure began to give way; it was not meant to endure such a strain. As the raft neared the middle of the boiling waters it parted in two. One glance at the blue sky, one swift thought of little Bessie and his mother, and, with a half prayer on his lips, he sank beneath the turbulent waters.

Do you think it was without the ordering of a Heavenly Father that in all that dense forest there was only one human being, and that he happened to be, not miles and miles away as usual, but upon the west bank of the stream? And he could not have told for his life why he was there, for he was there sitting on a log doing nothing. For several minutes he saw the raft before it came to him, and the boy on it too. In an instant he had waded out into the rapids. Just as the raft reached him Will sank through it into the water, and the same instant the stranger dived so as to let the raft pass over his head. When he emerged, dripping, the scattered rails were all shattered and strewn over almost the whole surface of the river below, tossed and torn apart like straws by the rapids.

But that was a trifle. They had first borne the boy safely to him, and he now slowly struggled ashore bearing the child upon his bosom. Himself all ragged and emaciated, his overgrown hair mingling with his unshorn beard, no mother could have laid a child down more tenderly than he. For several minutes he rubbed and chafed the cold body with painful anxiety and murmured prayers. At last there were signs of returning life, and the large tears actually rolled down upon the wet mass of beard as he exclaimed to himself, "Thank God, thank God!" as if from his very soul. And when the boy opened his eyes and drew a deep breath, his companion sat on the grass beside him weeping aloud, overcome either by weakness or emotion, or both combined.

From this, however, he was speedily aroused by the sound of oars, and there came Hark down the river rowing with all his might, his back to the rapids, intent only on pursuing the raft with its precious burden; for Hark would a great deal rather have lost his own black Scip any day than his young "Mass Will." It may be a shame to him as a father to say it, but it is a

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google fact; in this, too, he ought to have risen superior to his nature, but he couldn't; at least, didn't.

"Back water! back water!" shouted the stranger to him, loud and earnest.

Hark instinctively obeyed. And it was well he did, for it was all he could do to stop his boat before it had got caught in the rapids. In a few moments the stranger had borne Will in his arms and laid him in the bottom of the boat, while Hark looked on with astonishment and delight, his hands trembling with excitement.

"Lor, massa," he exclaimed, "whar did you come from? how did you catch him? Whar de raft?"

"You never mind," said the stranger, interrupting the volley of questions, and placing Hark's coat tenderly beneath the head of the boy as he lay. "You mind what you are about; row back carefully, take him to his mother, and tell her to give him something hot to drink; quick too. What's in this?" he continued, as he saw Hark's bucket in the boat, which had been covered by his coat.

"That's my dinner, massa."

"I wish you would give me some of it," said the man, in a quick, nervous manner, with a lighting up of his haggard face.

"Give you some of it!" said the negro, seizing upon the bucket and pressing it with both hands upon the stranger, "Lor bless you, massa, you's welcome to it, and the bucket too! You might eat me too, if you want to! You welcome! welcome! mighty welcome!"

Without a word the stranger seized upon the bucket, and was up the bank and out of sight in an instant.

"Oh, you is a fool!" said Hark, as he rowed up stream. "Why didn't you ask him to ride up in de boat to dinner at de house? Guess Miss 'Manda glad to see him. Looked as if hadn't had any thing to eat for a year. Too-whoo, too-whoo, too-whoo, cooks-for-you-all!—hears de owl hollo dat ebry night, too. But you shut up, nigger. Row! dat's what you do, row!"

And he did row with a vigor that soon brought the head of Dolores to the landing-place at the mouth of the spring, and rowing up the spring the negro soon reached the flat rock near the house.

To fasten the boat, to take the exhausted boy in his arms and bear him into the house, was the work of a few moments. Mrs. McRobert, Rohamma, and Bessie stood breathless while he told the tale—and over and over again. It was terror and joy combined that paled the cheek of the mother as she laid Will on the bed and began to remove his wet clothing, while Rohamma hurried out to prepare something hot for him.

"Colorado water, eh?" said she to Hark. "You so fond ob Colorado water; I hope you got enuff ob it now. Floatin' down de ribber on a raft! nebber heerd of such a ting as dat in Virginny; dat's Texas! Country nebber made to lib in; made for Mexicans, centumpedes, qurantulas, and frogs with horns—not for white folks. You Scip, you'd better bring dose chips, or I'll Texas you!"

But let us return up the river, down which we have drifted so unexpectedly. We left Mr. McRobert just as the infuriated wild cow rushed upon him. So sudden was the attack that he had barely time to leap to one side to escape it. Knowing the ferocious nature of the creature he had to deal with, having no gun with which to defend himself, all, however, was nothing to him in comparison to his desire to follow the departed raft and rescue his boy.

Before the animal could turn again upon him he had seized the readiest mode of escape from the spot by plunging into the river as he was. A few moments' swimming placed him far down stream. Landing again, and without waiting to dry his clothes, heavy and clinging to him with water, he ran on along the rocky shore looking eagerly for the raft at every bend.

Meanwhile the victorious cow having driven all her enemies from the field, quietly resumed her feast upon the broken ends of the salty ropes. But not long. Uncle Frank and Venable had succeeded in killing a deer at the spring in the brake. As rapidly as possible they had flayed and cut it up, and were about starting with as much of the flesh as they could carry, when Hoogenboom, the Dutch wood-cutter, happened upon them with his axe.

Wait on me while I say a word or two about him. We all know that Germany has sent an enormous emigration to America, a large part of which has come to Texas. New Braunsfeld is a town in the Valley of the Guadaloupe wholly settled by a colony from Germany—a prosperous town it is too, as German in every thing as any town in Germany. There are other like towns in Texas, besides thousands of German families scattered separately about. They have notions of their own in regard to the style of their houses, are exceedingly fond of lager beer and meerschaums, have by no means as strict religious notions in the observance of the Sabbath and like things as is common in America; they are, however, a most valuable class of population, industrious, saving, sober, honest. There are two distinct classes of these emigrants. The most numerous are poor people who have come over to better their worldly situation in life, a thing in which they eminently succeed. The other class consists of highly educated men of all the learned professions, who have left their own land in search of more liberty of thought and action than is allowed them there. Hoogenboom was one of this class. He had been a professor in some German college; was a learned and talented man. Becoming implicated in the political troubles in Germany he had fled to America a poor man. What little he had he had been in some way defrauded of after reaching America, and he had been glad to accept the offer of Mr. Frank McRobert to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

cut rails in exchange for land. Somewhat disgusted with the world, he had made himself content with his family in his mountain cabin cutting wood, killing deer, reading, smoking. Besides his children he had only one pet; this was his Mexican dog Schlick, to which he took a fancy on account of its extreme ugliness, there being not a hair upon his whole diminutive body—yellow too, as every thing Mexican always is.

This was Hoogenboom whom the hunters persuaded to assist them in carrying their deer meat to the raft. Very short in stature, very thick in circumference, a huge wool hat on his head, a pipe as large as a coffee-cup held between his lips by its six-inch stem, Schlick at his heels, a load of meat in his hands, Hoogenboom parted the brush and entered the spot in advance of his companions, who were toiling behind him more heavily laden. In a flash he was rolling—an enormous ball—on the ground, knocked over by the cow, while at the same instant Schlick flew high in the air, landing in the top of a thick cedar from the horns of the animal.

"Take to the brush quick, quick!" cried Uncle Frank, as it rushed upon them.

In an instant the hunters had dropped their meat and plunged into the thicket. Whirling upon her heels the excited animal rushed back upon the prostrate Dutchman. It seemed impossible for him to escape being gored. Too much stunned and astonished he still lay helpless on the ground without even attempting to rise. Where he had fallen happened to be the top of the bank leading down by some twenty feet to the river's edge. The cow dashing upon him, placed her long horns against his side; but according to his singular habit, Hoogenboom had on no one can tell how many thicknesses of clothing. At the same instant, too, he seized upon the horns and pressed them down to the ground, so that when the animal threw up its head to toss him in the air it only rolled him like a hogshead down the slope.

As he rolled a bullet from the rifle of the excited Venable grazed her side, and back she turned upon them—turned only to receive a bullet from the steady rifle of Uncle Frank right between the eyes, and to sink to her knees, and then at full length on the ground, dead.

"But where in the world are your father and Will?" said the Texan, as he came out of the thicket with his nephew. "And the raft is gone too!" he exclaimed, as he reached the top of the slope.

"Oh, uncle, what can have happened?" said Venable, white with anxiety. "Here are the ends of the ropes. They look as if they had been chewed in two. And here is Will's fishing-line lying on the ground. Oh, uncle, what can have happened? Where's pa and Will?"

His uncle glanced at the dead cow, and the truth dawned upon him.

"Don't be afraid," he said, concealing his fear. "They have only drifted down the river to Hark. They are safe there by now. But let's hurry—never mind the venison now. Are you hurt, Hoogenboom?"

"Not mooch," said the Dutchman, who had by this time sat up. "Dunder and Blitzen, vere's my pipe? And Schlick tight up in de tree, Himmel! Men, help get him down before you go!"

But when he had scrambled to his feet he was alone; with his dog above him, the cow beside him.

CHAPTER IX.

WINE-MAKING, PECAN GATHERING, ANTELOPES.

When Hoogenboom was assisting the hunters to carry their venison he had promised to come over to San Hieronymo in a few weeks and show them how to make "one shplendid Vine," as he called it. Wine! but where were the grapes to come from, do you ask? Nature had planted and trained and ripened them in magnificent abundance. Standing in the door of the house at San Hieronymo you could see, now that fall had come, all the woods around fairly loaded with them. The vines weighed down the dog-wood thickets with great clusters of black grapes as large as a bullet each and larger. The vines ran exulting to the very tops of the highest pecans and live-oaks, and enriched the whole tree with glorious clusters. You could have loaded a train of cars with them. The children had eaten of them until tired; and very refreshing they were on the long hot days, if you only avoided eating the thick skin and swallowed merely the pulp.

According to his promise, very early one sparkling September morning, Hoogenboom made his rotund appearance, not a bit worse than Will for his adventure with the wild cow.

"I can't tell why it is," said Uncle Frank, who was standing in the porch as the Dutchman rolled up toward them, pipe in mouth and almost extinguished under his broad wool hat, "but Hoogenboom always reminds me of Molly McGruder."

"And who was Molly McGruder?" asked Mrs. McRobert, who was standing beside him.

"Not know Molly McGruder?" replied her brother.

"Why, Amanda, who could have had charge of your early education? By-the-by, how young and blooming you look, and you are getting so rosy and plump too, and you smile oftener and laugh a good deal more, I'll be bound, than you ever did in your old Virginia!"

"Thank you! but what about Molly McGruder?"

"Oh, only this. The morning of the battle of San Jacinto Sam Houston held a council of his officers under the tree where he slept. The case of Texas had reached its crisis. A few hours would decide whether all this magnificent country was to be still a miserable province of twice miserable Mexico, or whether it was to

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google be a free and independent republic; whether we were then and there to give the Mexicans a drubbing, or whether they were to beat and then butcher us, as they had done Fannin's command. It was a solemn time. Houston and all the officers around him were serious—consulting the plan of battle. Suddenly in rushed a huge Irish lady—the very double of Hoogenboom, only in petticoats—but she had boots and copperas trowsers on too. I saw them. The sentinels tried to keep her away, but they could not. No, see Houston she would, and in she rushed.

"'Which is Mr. Houston here?' she asked. You know how particularly polite he is to ladies; so he replied, with a bow, 'I am, Madam.'

"'And these here are your people, ain't they?' she asked, with a motion of her hand toward the Texan soldiers all around.

"'This is the Texan army, Madam,' he replied, with dignity.

"'It is? Well, they are your people, I'm told. Now, you are all trespassing on my land—Molly McGruder's me name—it's me league you are on—you are frightening me cows and trampling down me grass, and I want you to get off me land straight away. I'm a lone widdy woman—Molly McGruder's me name; but I won't have nothing of the sort—you've got no right to come here—it isn't your league. Go right off—clear out—take your people away. I won't have it—it's me own land—Molly McGruder's me name!'"

"Good-morning, Mr. Hoogenboom," interrupted Mrs. McRobert, for that gentleman had by this time reached them. But the Dutchman had only time to lift his hat with a bow. Soon he had the whole available force of the family at work. Hark and Rohamma and Mr. Morton McRobert were too busy to assist. But all the rest were soon up to the lips in wine-making.

Uncle Frank drove the wagon under the trees, while Will and Scip clambered up into them and threw down the clusters of grapes by the bushel. Meanwhile Hoogenboom, assisted by Venable, had got ready the wine-press, which they had spent days before in constructing. This was simply a very strong box, larger than a barrel, placed against the trunk of a pecan-tree, in a level place near the house. One end of a long pole was confined in a notch cut in the tree above the box, to be used as a lever in pressing down into the box a heavy block made just to fit in it. At the bottom of the box were holes for the juice to flow out, and spouts so arranged that buckets could be placed to catch the juice as it flowed.

In a little time the wagon was alongside of it heaped with grapes. These were thrown into the box, pressed down and chopped up therein with a clean spade. The block was then put on, the lever fitted, and when Hoogenboom caught hold of the end of the lever and drew up his feet, suspending all his enormous weight thereto, the juice gushed out in a red torrent as fast as they could catch it in buckets. When the grapes in the box were thoroughly pressed, they were thrown out and a fresh supply placed in; so that before night there stood by the press quite a long range of barrels filled to the bung-hole with grape-juice.

But the work was by no means done yet. For days, in fact, at times for weeks, Hoogenboom put in play all the wine-learning he had brought with him from the Rhine—changing the juice from barrel to barrel, using sugar and a little alcohol to help the work—until, finally, there were several barrels of a claret superior by far to any thing to be purchased in the cities, and which brought a high price when sent to New Orleans; for one barrel was as much as they cared to keep for home use.

But the gathering of the pecan crop was the most exciting time of all. It took place not very long after Fall set in. All summer the trees had been almost breaking down under the nuts, and there is not a richer sight than to see a noble pecan-tree, as tall as the tallest hickory, full from bottom to top of the oval nuts growing in dense clusters, a shade darker in color than the leaves.

When at last the hulls began to fall off, the whole family—negroes, wagon, and all—went into the work of gathering them as into a grand frolic. There was on the south of the house, along the river, a bottom of pecan-trees, extending along for miles. Some persons cut down the trees to get at their rich crops. But a better plan was adopted. Hark, armed with a long, light, tough pole, was sent up into the tree. Clambering up, he would in a short time thrash the whole tree soundly, even to its farthest twigs. The nuts would rattle down from the green cloud of foliage like a hail-storm—shaken out by the thunder and lightning of the dark Jupiter above. Pans, baskets, buckets, aprons, every thing were used by the eager hands; and it is astonishing how soon the wagon would be filled even with the sides, and heaping too, with nuts; not small ones either, but as large as a partridge egg, and just about the shape too, and that when the hull was off.

Thirty bushels that wagon held, and quite a beaten road was made from the bottom to the house, hauling pecans and returning for more. They were emptied in an inclosed space on the clean rock near the spring, and were easily thrashed out of the hulls. For two weeks after the gathering was over all the children—Bessie included—looked as if they had on black gloves, their hands were stained so with the juice of the hulls. It was with regret that they were compelled at last to cease from gathering, leaving the edge only of the pecan forest near the house touched—the vast forest of pecan-trees, loaded with millions of bushels, remaining to supply the wants of peccaris, bears, squirrels, birds, and other hungry tenants of the green woods. As to the family hogs, they increased beyond all count, fattening upon the abundant mast, not only of the pecan, but also of the oak trees.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

When the wine was sent to Port La Vaca to be shipped to New Orleans the pecans were sent too, sewed up in strong two-bushel bags. In return the merchant in New Orleans remitted a large amount in cash, besides sending enough groceries for family use to last for many a month. But the pleasure of it all was, that it was all the glad and joyous labor of their own hands. With all its privations, there is a free, untrammeled, independent exuberance of life in Texas—unbounded like its prairies, pure like its sky—which goes far to reconcile, and more than reconcile, the Texan to his home. Any how, whether it is the Colorado water, or what, people who once leave the old States and the old enjoyments for the free pleasures of a wild life ever after look back upon the hours spent in Texas, when they return to the old routine, as among the sweetest hours of life—sweet, like life's earliest hours.

The first days of December found the farm advanced beyond any thing they had hoped. It is astonishing how much can be accomplished by willing hands, prompted by warm hearts. As to the servants, they had done more work, and that more willingly, than during double the same length of time, even under the sharp watch of Watkins, the keen overseer.

Hark's name was really Hercules, first contracted into Harklis, then into Hark. He was of gigantic build, as black and as strong as one of the genii we read of in the Arabian Tales, worth three common hands—so active, powerful, trusty. A special pride he had taken in laying hands on the place from the start, when nothing had been done, and doing all that needed to be done. The family loved him and his family only less than those who were the white members of the household. The affection between the dwellers in the house and those in the cabin was, as is often the case, strong and sincere beyond any thing imagined by those who have never known the relation—a love, esteem, respect, and cordial attachment absolutely unknown, unconceived of, between the two races when existing under any other than this Abrahamic household arrangement.

And the white members of the family—not one of them but had done more real work since they entered Texas than during all their life before put together. Since May they had thought, planned, consulted, toiled, enjoyed more than during a lifetime in Virginia—it had been to them a long and happy picnic. Buy a league out there, make a home on it yourself from the start, and see if it is not the fact. Never had the family enjoyed such health and spirits—the blessing of God, so often invoked at table and family altar, had descended upon them. The chief lack was of an opportunity of attending public worship on the Sabbath; but that was soon to be remedied, as we shall speedily see.

It was during the second week in December; the weather had all along been delightful, growing warmer and warmer until it might almost be called hot. One morning at breakfast Uncle Frank, who had just come over to ride out with Venable in search of cattle, paused as he carried his fourth cup of coffee to his lips:

"Hear that? a Norther sure enough at last!" he said. "You've never seen a Norther yet; if you don't be gratified, and that right soon, I'm mistaken."

"I can not see that the wind has risen," said his sister; "yonder is a tree, and the leaves are perfectly still."

"It was not the wind—it was the wild geese I heard flying overhead," replied her brother. "It's not a sure sign, for they are sometimes mistaken; and nothing's certain in Texas but uncertainty. But generally when you hear them look out for a Norther."

"All ready, uncle!" cried Venable, riding up to the door and leading his uncle's horse.

As the Texan mounted he looked all round the horizon and shook his head.

"Run and get two Mexican blankets, Scip," he said; and continued, as he received and strapped them to his saddle behind, "I don't much like to go out on the prairie. However, we won't go far." The blankets on so warm a day excited the amusement of Venable; but putting spurs to their horses they were soon far out on the prairie eastward.

They had ridden two or three hours, but had found no cattle of their brand.

"Not an inch farther to-day, my boy," said the Texan, running up on the top of an eminence, which, like an island at sea, commanded an expanse of twenty miles around. Unslinging from his back the telescope, which he always carried when out on the prairie after cattle, the Texan swept the whole horizon to detect what he could among the long brown grass which tufted the whole expanse.

"Ah, yonder is a herd, I believe!" said he at length. "Pshaw, no," he continued, after gazing longer, "it's only antelopes."

"Antelopes, uncle? Antelopes! Where—where?" cried his nephew, eagerly. For months he had suffered under the singular enthusiasm in regard to this kind of game which seizes upon those new to Texas—an enthusiasm which pursuit of them only serves to whet—a kind of insanity.

"See that knot of timber about a mile from here?" said his uncle, pointing eastward. "Well, look to the right carefully—"

"Yes, yes, I see them," interrupted his nephew; and shifting his rifle from the pommel of his saddle to his shoulder, and driving the spurs into his horse, he was off like a shot.

"Stop—halloo—hold on!" cried his uncle, endeavoring to rein in his own horse. But in the attempt, encumbered with his telescope and rifle, his half-broken animal was almost too much for him, and it required all his attention to keep from being thrown, as the mustang dashed forward, then reared under the powerful curb, then kicked up, whirled around to the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google right and left, backing and pitching a thousand times worse than any bark in the roughest sea. The passenger on board needed all his attention to manage his wild mustang, and all his breath to whoa! at him, so that when he had at last got the upper hand his nephew was far out of hearing, tearing across the prairie toward the knot of timber.

"Whoa!" cried the Texan. "I like to see spirit in a boy as much as anybody—hold up! but to start off after antelopes—take that, you fool! Might as well try to run a hawk in the air. There goes my blanket! Real grit of a boy! Whoa!—hold up, I tell you! Only let me get that blanket strapped on and I'll show you!"

But it was rather his mustang that showed him. The Texan had dismounted, gathered his fallen blanket, and was about mounting when the animal caught sight of it, gave a sudden bolt, and was gone.

"Well, here is a pretty fix!" said the Texan, gazing after his flying steed. "Ten miles and more from home, past two o'clock, a Norther coming up, me on foot, and that boy gone after antelopes! One good thing, that mustang has gone toward home; I may catch him, and when I do—!"

"Ah! woeful when," sings the poet. Following on foot, the Texan soon caught sight of his mustang. It had stopped to graze. As he cautiously drew near his master could see that the coil of rope had fallen off the horn of the saddle, and was trailing at length on the ground from the animal's neck. Creeping stealthily up, with many a honeyed term of endearment on his lips, which was only the sheerest hypocrisy, the hunter laid his hand upon the knotted end of the rope, but before he could grasp it firmly the suspicious animal was hundreds of yards away upon the trail leading to his stake.

Again he would stop to graze, and again escape, half for the joke's sake, just as his master made sure he had him. It was wise in the mustang, for he must have known the vengeance in the bosom of his master, burning more and more fiercely at each escape; but it was terribly inconvenient for that master, who was now panting and perspiring under the load of telescope, rifle, and heavy blankets—especially as the afternoon heat was very great.

"Exactly, just as I thought; a Norther, sure enough!" said the Texan, as he observed a herd of cattle, before hidden from sight in a hollow of the prairie, now running in a long line for the nearest timbers. Still, beside this, there was no sign of a rising wind whatever. The day continued sultry, the sky cloudless.

"What did I take him out for this morning?" said the Texan, in tones of deepest anxiety, as he strode on more and more rapidly in the direction homeward. "What will Amanda say? what will Morton do if Venable—" Here the Texan, gathering his blanket in a roll upon his shoulder, began to run. It was dark, however, before he reached the timber, for he had been much farther out on the prairie than he had supposed.

As he entered the timber a murmur deepening into a roar began among its topmost boughs, while a sudden chill pervaded the air. Hastening first to the cabin, the Texan called out Hark, and sent him on to the stable to saddle up the best two horses there, with an injunction to be as quick as possible. Hurrying then to the house, he met his brother, who was coming out to see if the absentees were yet returning. The elder brother read in the agitated manner of the younger the evil news even before a syllable was spoken. In a few words he told him every thing.

"Don't alarm Amanda," he said; "but put on all your warmest clothing, an extra blanket or two, and a bottle of brandy, and come with me as soon as you possibly can. Hark's getting the horses saddled."

"The best plan is to tell Amanda every thing just as it is," replied his brother. "You go on to the stable; I will follow you as soon as possible with every thing."

But short as the time really was, it seemed hours to the Texan before his brother joined him at the stable.

"Isn't she screaming and crying?" he asked, as his brother rapidly strapped on the blankets upon the saddle before mounting.

"No; she never does that. She is pale, but only cool and calm; never fear for her," replied her husband. As the brothers were riding rapidly out of the stable-yard the Texan observed that Hark was following them on a mule.

"No, Hark, no; stay at home," he said suddenly and sharply to him. "Cold that only hurts us kills them dead; he would be of no use," he continued to his companion, as they rode rapidly along through the darkness and the rapidly increasing wind, which was excessively cold. As they rode out of the timber upon an eminence which commanded a view of the prairie, the Texan suddenly reined in with an oath.

"I beg your pardon, Morton; but see yonder," he said, pointing northward. "As I live, the prairie is on fire! and on such a night!"

But only for an instant could his companion gaze upon the red glare that shone upon the sky in the direction pointed out.

"Morton," said his brother rapidly, in a loud and almost harsh manner, "let me command for this one night. You stay at home. It'll take all you and all the rest here can do to fight the fire off the field and the place. You remember I told you how to do it. I was careful to tell Hark too. Call him out right off, and get at it. It'll take your very best to succeed. You leave Venable to me. I'll attend to him, and be back as soon as I can. Hurry about it, Morton, if you want a rail or a shingle left!"

And before his brother could speak the Texan had taken from him the brandy and the blankets, and had spurred out into the gathering darkness, the roaring wind, and the bitter cold.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

STRUGGLES FOR LIFE.

ANIMALS do not die what is termed a "natural death."—We begin thus at the end, because such a condition of dying suggests their manner of living. Not even those caged or domesticated, since they do not live natural lives; nor yet those which head their classes and have none to prey upon them, as the lion and the eagle. For even the king of beasts always needs all his agility to spring upon the agile antelope; all his immense muscle to drag down the sturdy buffalo, whose shoulders like his own are storehouses of strength, so nicely does nature balance power and swiftness in the hunter and in the game; and when coming age makes him even slightly rheumatic he speedily degenerates into an old, snarling, grizzly cur, to be gored by the wild cow whose calf he would worry, or stripped of his flesh by hyenas who were wont to act Lazarus at his royal repasts.

So also the King of Birds. We are told that when the eagle becomes old, and abates the fierce vigor by which the beak, blunted against bones and whetted again upon the crag, is kept in natural state, the upper mandible, through overgrowth from unnatural disuse, becomes curved and hooked about the lower until the two are clasped, and the bird dies of starvation. Certainly my neighbor has a parrot whose beak, like the nails of lazy fingers, must occasionally be pared; for he now eats soft food, and does not use his bill for nut-crackers as in his Brazilian woods, although he sometimes gnaws his wires by way of compensation. So, too, if a pet squirrel has his nuts cracked for him, his tusks will grow until they cut through the lips; for nature made them to saw by the hour through the jagged shell of the butternut. And if the royal bird becomes weakened some of his caitiff subjects, as the crow, raven, or vulture, would have no reverence for royalty, that they would not assist the slow process of starving. If the fact first stated is true even of the monarchs, those which excel in strength, what surely of the weaklings in a world where there are no modifications to the law of might?

But we will trust to facts rather than to inference. We never find in the woods or fields animals living on with signs of old age or sickness. Nature has no provision for invalids or paupers under her system of merciless kindness. In the kingdom where her laws are unmodified there is only health and ever-enduring youth, strength, and vigor, kept up to the degree of fullness. Death is the only doctor: for age and debility there is the one simple remedy.

We find, indeed, the same practice just this side the animal kingdom; for among the lower tribes disease is generally death, and helplessness and deformity are unaided. Perhaps the piety of Æneas was the more renowned because parents were not always thus cared for. And prolonged may be alleviated suffering; certainly not soundness is the compromise which civilization even makes with chronic disease. When Old Benjy, in "School Days at Rugby," goes to a kind of rustic medicine-man to be cured of his rheumatism, the old charmer gives him some simples, but with no great faith: "Not as 't'll do 'e much good—leastways I be afeared not: there's only one thing as I knows on as 'll cure old folks like you and I;" and when Old Benjy eagerly asks what, he grimly answers: "Church-yard mould."

Of most animals the conditions of existence are severely circumscribed and graded to narrow limits; and if they falter or vary, they are quickly cut off or caught up by some of the many enemies whom they only just escape when all goes well. Take, for example, the birds. Violence besets them in every stage, ab ovo usque ad mala. Many of the early eggs, of ground-birds especially, are chilled by late snows or long continued early rains, which flood the nests or drive away the parents, through hunger and exposure. The first brood of the woodcock family is frequently destroyed by April snows. The same thing, indeed, happens to other animals.

Once in early April my plow turned out a nest of young rabbits no bigger than rats. The day was warm, but the mother had been driven away by a sudden spring snow, and the little orphans had perished. Never did death counterfeit sleep more perfectly. When the furry nest was gently opened and spread out on the warm mould of the southern hill-side the little fellows appeared as if taking a baby-nap. But the end was strange and tragic enough. When the oxen came round again they scented the place where the nest had been, and seized with a most unusual fear, they lifted up their unwieldy bulks in great, unnatural leaps, until one happened to set his broad fore-foot upon it, and gave it a quick burial in the deeply-loosened soil.

There is hardly any food more acceptable to animals in general than birds' eggs. The crow will search through a whole orchard for robins' nests, taking the apple-trees by rows, making short flights, and hopping from one to another in the most business-like way, as a boy will hunt for hens' nests. The cuckoo is another destroyer. A wild pigeon once built in our orchard, and we watched the nest most carefully. One day we saw a cuckoo plunge into the tree in his piratical, sneaking style. We ran to the rescue, for we knew his business, only to find the remains of a breakfast of scrambled eggs served up in the cup of the nest. The Greek, Latin, and Saxon fame of the bird, even that Anacreontic in the old English Reader beginning:

"Hail! beauteous stranger of the wood," have availed naught with us from that day. For had we not found a wild pigeon's nest the preceding year in the same orchard, showing so much attention to the young one that the parents finally left him altogether to our care with the most flattering confidence—my brother, raising the little squab to the dignity of a

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google decoy, by taking its bill between his lips and giving it the finest of wheat, moistened in his mouth.

The weasel and his cousins all have a tooth for eggs; the rat in egg-sucking earns his worst reputation; the fox and raccoon will make long tramps for their sake at very unseasonable hours; and the whole cat and dog families are born with the taste; while snakes and turtles, creepers and crawlers, find in eggs a diet suited to their doubtful teeth and slow stomachs.

When the young appear there are for them the same and other enemies. More than two-thirds of about twenty broods under my observation were destroyed by one southeasterly storm, on the 18th of June. Of nine nests closely observed but one, apparently the most exposed of all, on an old hayrigging, escaped all enemies. The cow-bunting or blackbird will lay in other birds' nests, and in every instance a brood is destroyed; for the egg is stronger and larger and breaks the others, or the young one will consume all the food, and finally crowd the others over the walls of their own castle. Last August I saw one of these little wretches waited upon by his foster-parents—a pair of canary goldfinches—whose united weight might have been two-thirds of his. They had placed him in a shrub-oak, whose curling, sickly leaves showed that it was a good feeding-ground for insect-catchers. His insatiable screaming kept the little fellows busy at work, snipping the green worms from the under side of the leaves, the young horse-leech crying, meanwhile, "Give! give!" Another was the pride of a pair of ground-sparrows, much smaller than himself, who evidently considered him as a future king of all ground-sparrows, and bitterly were they paying for the conceit. His appetite was as active as that of his brother aforesaid. Every bread-crumb was bespoken beforehand. Sometimes, again, a hail-storm breaks the tender eggs and bruises to death the young, or even the old birds, as during the past summer in the vicinity of Rochester.

It would be tedious to name all the destroyers. In an elm-tree in the back-yard was once enacted the sparrow-scene that Homer tells us of at Aulis. A huge black snake had crawled up to a robin's nest by the help of a grape-vine, and lay with his under-jaw on the rim, having the young ones in his very breathing, like Milton's fiend in the bower, squatted in the form of a toad, at the unconscious ear of the first mother. With patient self-denial he was sparing them until he could secure the parents also. But their piteous twittering soon brought aid to the spot. A battery, consisting of an old French musket which had run the blockade with Lafayette, loaded with about a handful of crow-shot, was brought into position and sighted. The heavy charge went crashing through the dense boughs, and then a silence. But when the thick blood pattered on the flat vine-leaves, and the serpent slid slowly to the ground, shot through and through his half-dozen coils, the robins had no longer any fear, but flew backward and forward from the nest to their deliverer, with the most manifest evidences and expressions of joy and gratitude. A few minutes more and one of the parents would have been caught by the wing, and the remainder of the day employed in wadding this and all the brood down into the monster's maw; and he, drugged with fullness and slow digestion, would have crawled away for a three-days' drowsiness, until hunger should again creep up to light the fires of his basilisk eye.

All the reputed feats of deglutition performed by the anaconda and the boa, his brother, appear very possible to us when we observe the ways of our own serpents of smaller scale. A little water-snake, no thicker than the finger, will "worry down" a frog that seems more likely to swallow him. And indeed, perhaps, the sole reason why he does not is, that nature has arranged it the other way; for he himself will bag ducklings and goslings in the same manner when he has become grown and his voice a thorough bass. The water-snake will seize a young frog with the jaws, for he does not depend upon his coils further than to stay himself by twisting his tail among the stones of the spring, or the weeds of the pool, and for a time will only hold on. The frog will swim out the length of the line, drawing it straight after him, then the snake will contract and pull him back, so evenly balanced are the two. Finally, the poor victim will become utterly exhausted, and then will begin a process, apparently hopeless and impossible; but patient slowness surely prevails.

A gentleman in an adjoining neighborhood, hearing a noise among his fowls, found that a rattlesnake, nearly six feet long, had crawled out of the Pawlings Mountain, where he had lain in winter-quarters, and had seized, with spring appetite, a young rooster nearly a year old, and was engaged in swallowing him. The process occupied nearly two days, and being near a public road was witnessed by many whom the gentleman, not wishing to be solely responsible for such a snake-story, wished to make vouchers with himself. It was a favorite theory of Thoreau, who saw plain facts in nature with more careful eyes, perhaps, than any other American, that the world's wonders are not only about equally but universally distributed, the difference being in the power of eyes to perceive; and when foreign marvels as those in Kane's Explorations were read or related he would coolly reply: "Most of these phenomena may be seen in this neighborhood." He would certainly have found in the above a support of his theory.

When the young birds first leave the nest fresh perils await them; for enemies which can not harm them there catch them upon the ground. The danger lasts until they are fully grown. A hawk will haunt a covey of partridges during this stage, taking from the flock seemingly almost as his wants demand. And

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

yet there is something like a truce among the tribes during the breeding season—both because insects, worms, and other such tenderer food are fed to the young, even of birds of prey, and also for other reasons which we shall mention. But during the winter, when the population of three zones is huddled together, as on the Florida peninsula, like pleasure-seekers at a watering-place, the truce is entirely suspended. Falcon and heron are then crowded together. The sparrow-hawk has followed his bobolinks and blackbirds, and enjoys them as they enjoy their rice-fields. For the full-grown bird to escape his enemies there must be the fullest vigor to keep up the swift circulation, which keeps up the high temperature of body, that rarefies the air stored up in the bones, quills, air-chambers, and even in the closeness of the feathers, which buoys and balances like a balloon, lightening the toil of the wings. If the bird become reduced in condition he loses his poise and lightness and power to escape his foes of earth and air.

Our resident birds suffer also from severity of climate. I know an instance where an April thaw revealed a lost covey of fifteen quail, which had been smothered in a snow-drift, their heads all together, as their manner is when the flock huddle for the night. And, finally, animals will treat as outcasts the unfortunates of their own number. A flock of tame ducks in the pond have maltreated and banished one of their community, whose only crime is an unlucky cervical distortion, highly offensive, it seems, to these connoisseurs. The disabled buffalo is not merely deserted but actually persecuted and driven out by the herd; and should he luckily gore one of the wolves, which finally beset him, the pack would strip their brother to the bone before performing the same office for him.

We thus see that Nature forestalls the fears of Malthus without the aid of chronic disease or pestilence. These are the refinements of humanity and civilization. Virgil, indeed, tells us of a terrible "Rinderpest" among the Alps, in his old grandfather's day, which did not confine itself to that portion of animal life corrupted by human contact: when the "night-wolf, ruled by an intenser care, no longer went stealthily about the sheep-folds; when the timid fallow-deer wandered out of the woods among the hounds; when the vipers died in their curved lurking-places, and the waves washed forward the offspring of the unmeasured sea like shipwrecked bodies along the shore; and the very birds, the air unhealthful even to them, left their life under the high cloud." But Virgil was making a poetic as well as an agricultural essay. Nature regards the maladies of her families as incurable, and the privilege of prolonged suffering and continued helplessness as mistaken kindness. Moreover, this is her only safety against hereditary disease, and, finally and speedily, degeneracy and utter deterioration.

As it is, there is always sound stock, and a youth, like Bacchus, ever young. Old Poll Parrot and aunt Jenny Wren may sing as gay songs, wear as brilliant plumage, and hop about as lively as their grand-daughters; and if old Robin Gray takes a mate six generations younger than himself he is annoyed by no neighborhood sentiment touching disparity of age. There is a social liberty which may well make Stuart Mill delight and despair.

We should naturally expect that beasts and birds of prey, since they appear to have no checks upon their increase, would multiply inordinately, while the weaklings, which can make no defense against one of a hundred enemies, would become utterly exterminated. But the modifications of the fact entirely change its tendency. There is seldom more than one pair of eagles in the same mountain, and only the severest drought will bring more than one family of lions about one of those Artesian wells of nature which, in the interior of Africa, when the beds of river torrents become dusty and lake bottoms dry, cracked, and overgrown, yet keeps its stagnant depths, and gives drink to the beasts of the field that roam over so vast a region. If only the essential conditions—climate and food—are favorable, the most helpless creatures will hold their own, defying destruction. There is no fear that the pike will clear the pond of the fish he preys upon if the water and the bottom are only suitable for hatching the eggs and feeding the shoals of life that are so easily set swimming. Beasts of prey bring forth seldom, and have small families (one, but a lion, as Æsop's lioness said to the fox), while the birds of this class lay few eggs, and their bodies, little more than skin and bone, seem to lack the heat for a lucky hatch. Moreover, the young of both is for a long time helpless. The nest of the eagle often contains one addled egg and a single eaglet—and this, for several weeks, a clumsy, helpless mass. The timid partridge, on the other hand, lays almost a score of eggs, and with fat body, warm blood, and double feathers, hatches every one, and each young bird at the approach of danger will, from the first, kick away the shell from which it is scarcely freed, and run off into the bushes like a young Indian.

There is in the natural world, vegetable and animal, what might seem to be a waste of life, and Nature appears to accept the fact, and make provision for it rather than against it—to replace rather than remedy. On a roof in sight of my window there is a garden-spot of moss bright with perennial greenness. The buildings are in the form of a T, with foot to the east, and the place of growth is the northern slope of a covered-way connecting the upright with the cross-bar. A heavy cornice keeps off the morning sun. A wing of the building flings over it a shadow from the south, except when the sun is highest, and then, for the most part, the slope of the roof just keeps it in the dividing plane between sun and shade. The western rays are entirely excluded. Only at a certain hour of

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the morning, at a certain season of the year, does the sun reach near the spot with full beam, and the course of this is distinctly outlined by the limit of growth. The shingles, with surface softened by time, give the needed soil and retain the moisture, and thus are supplied all the conditions essential to its delicate life. All about the great building it is the only mossy growth. And yet, doubtless, against every square foot of exposed surface the floating moss-spores have drifted, and, if the place were wet, clung and commenced to live again. But the many perished; the few alone kept life. Within view of the same window a strip of the green-sward has been broken by taking up a water-pipe. A growth of weeds, thick as the ground can hold, has sprung up from the raw earth. But wherever the lawn grass may be uprooted the same will happen.

Last April the trackmen removed several feet of a gravel-bed, and now the barren bank is skyey with the blue bloom of the Indian bean. In like manner a watering-place, supplied by means of a lead pipe leading from a distant spring, has been made on a dry hill-side. The ground has thus become artificially soaked, and now nourishes a cluster of the cat-tail flag. Yet there are no more seeds of those plants in these places than elsewhere. Neither is it necessary to tax our credulity with theories that seeds will grow after lying dormant for so many years, and that the accumulations of centuries, perhaps, lie hid in the earth, like the buried generations, awaiting a quickening. The truth is, Nature sows the whole land broadcast, yearly —every foot of soil, way-side, stony places, and good ground. The garden soil is full of wild seeds, though for years every weed has been pulled at sight. The thistle and the milk-weed are only two of many plants whose seeds are upborne upon their down, and, like the spirits in Michael Angelo's terrified fancy—

> "To be imprisoned in the viewless winds
> And blown, with restless violence, about
> The pendent world."

The cat-tail flag has a spike of the downiest down packed almost solid, in a way which to call most skillful would scarcely seem reverent. In time this head bursts with growth and ripeness, like the boll of the cotton plant, and a gossamer, to which the thistle-down seems coarse, goes floating down the limitless leeward. Sometimes, with a gentle gale, they will rise straight upward, as if the specky seeds which cling to the fibres were to be planted in cloud-land. They may float as long as there is a current, even lie in balance in a motionless air, until dampness gives them weight. Over the vast field sown there is only here and there a spot where they can grow; yet they lodge every where, and on every side, up in the crevices of trees and rocks as well as their congenial home by the edge of the pools. From a cotton-wood just across the railroad floats out, on every side, a seed-bearing mist that would plant every year a forest of a hundred acres. Wherever they fall on unoccupied soil they spring up as thick as buckwheat in a sown field; and yet not one in a million ever comes to a tree, not one in ten thousand ever makes seed-leaves.

The insect kingdom presents perhaps stronger instances. Every year enough eggs are laid by grasshoppers, locusts, and stinging insects to bring the plagues of Egypt to our doors; and yet only few are hatched, and great numbers during any one season is no reason for expecting an increase, or even a return, for the next.

We thus see that in all this destruction of bird-life there is nothing exceptional or accidental, but rather the working of a general principle of the natural world. But, furthermore, there is no loss or mistake in this destruction of insect life; in the diffusion of seeds as wide as the winds there is no waste. One purpose of nature is thereby to have a germ of life ready for growth at every possible opportunity; but chiefly, perhaps, it is the miracle of mercy by which her hungry thousands are fed. Most of nature's wild harvest is food for winter birds—those which are resident, as the quail, or those which come down to us from the north, as the snow-bunting. There is no livelier winter picture than the white-bellied snow-bird husking out the sweet seeds of the timothy grass or the fruit of the golden-rod. Not only are seeds diffused by their down, but they are also thrashed out by winter winds, glided far away over the glassy snow-crust, or whirled along with the moving drift. Seeds are simply every where. On a hill, where nothing can grow but bunches of yellow broom, out of a soil made of broken rock-chips, I can always discover seeds of many kinds, and the microscopic eye of bird and insect finds them wherever he finds earth. It is only when the very hill-points are covered with snow that the crow becomes tame with hunger, and the spicy, concentrated food of our wild seeds carries our hardy winter guests through seasons they so much compliment by their coming. Seeds and eggs are also food for ants, beetles, crickets, and that ilk, which must all live like the rest of us. A little pinery last summer was all in a hum with insects; this winter their nests, looking like the fly's eye under the microscope with its thousands of lens, glued fast and varnished over with a water-proof which surpasses Russian invention or Yankee imitation, affords unctuous food for the chickadees.

We note the habits of animals with more certainty and satisfaction because of their strong local attachment, which often keeps the same individuals under our continual observation. Among other definitions given of man he has been called an animal that travels. Birds, in their migrations, can hardly be said to be travelers; they are fugitives from climate rather—nomads in quest of better subsistence. They retreat slowly before the winter, and hang on its very skirts on their return. And it is pleasant to think that, with all their charms of plumage, melody, and cheerfulness, they are,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

moreover, old friends come back. It is not easy to identify the individuals positively; but doubtless not merely the same family, but the identical pairs, return to the same haunts, and refit the same nests year after year. Upon a rafter of the homestead barn a pair of chimney swallows for thirteen successive summers pasted "their pendent bed and procreant cradle," as the royal party in Macbeth remark of the "martlets" in "coignes" of the castle, in that delicate and gentlemanly conversation which so fitly precedes the impending tragedy. They were, no doubt, the same pair; for the barn-rafter was an unusual place for the nest of a chimney swallow, and the young never reappeared in the barn after once leaving it. The young of all animals, indeed, seldom occupy the deserted homestead; but, impelled by that unfailing instinct which provides for the fulfillment of the first recorded command, go forth, if not from the region, at least from parent and home. A neighbor has a cherry-tree in whose fork a robin's nest has been built for nine summers in succession, and he is assured by many circumstances that they are the same pair. There are many such instances apparent, but not positive; for if one of the pair is killed the survivor readily finds a mate, notwithstanding poetry tells us,

"The widowed turtle mateless dies."

And the one and the other dying, and the survivor in each instance finding a mate, there is thus afforded an unbroken succession occupying the same familiar nest, and, to all appearance, and somewhat in fact, the same pair. The English game-keepers sometimes shoot the male pheasants from their preserves, and find their places soon supplied at the expense of their neighbors; and it is well known that the tame pigeon will fill the place of the lost mate with hardly a break in the busy family duties.

There is much significance, too, in the manifestations of birds at their coming. Their rapture is not the excitement of discovery, but the evident joy of welcome and recognition. Only childhood in its very best moods shows such charming innocent gleefulness. The bluebirds buffeting the mad March gales with breasts bright with the azure of coming skies, fly straight home to the old apple-tree stump, even though the last snow flurry is yet lying upon the doorway. The spring swallows can not twitter fast enough for their feelings; and the lark alights naturally to rest on her old look-out, the hillock in the meadow. Not merely birds, but all animals, show a strong local attachment. I know of two instances where the common land tortoise was marked, and found for many years about the same spot. One of them, like Nestor, has already lived with three generations of mortal men; for he was marked in 1818 by the grandfather of a friend with the father's initials. He had then been an established visitor for several years, coming every season to make his "lodge in a garden of cucumbers," putting himself exclusively upon green cucumber diet with as happy carelessness of cholera as the young bloods of the German gymnasium on a peripatetic picnic through the Lombardy vineyards. As he invariably gnawed the first fruits, he was sometimes carried a half mile away across Wappinger's Creek; but, like his ancestor who beat the hare in a race, he would travel all night and be found early at work. Tempora mutantur, but the tortoise is not changed with them. Only he brings different spouses; but whether a bigamist, a polygamist, or one often bereaved and as often comforted, can not be stated. It should be considered, however, that he attained majority during the Jacksonian Era, and is perhaps only an ultra conformist to the system of rotation in office. It may be said he is necessarily home-keeping; but, speed excepted, and who is better fitted to travel? Diogenes's tub, with him, is no philosophic idiosyncrasy, but an established, portable adaptation. And even as to speed, he could have waddled to the remotest point on the Pacific coast during his half century of human acquaintance. There would seem to be some semblance of fact as well as logic in the Aristotelian puzzle, that Achilles, swift of foot, can not, giving a little the start, overtake the tortoise.

But this local attachment is for the neighborhood rather than the parental nest or home. Every animal has its haunt, beat, or stalking-ground, and goes beyond unwillingly. Until he becomes permanently disturbed, you will find him every day near the same spot. Wild pigeons, until they have been repeatedly fired into, some killed, and many wounded and sore, will come daily to the same acorn-trees. The squirrel will pick every nut from his favorite hickory-tree before going to another. The timid quail, when undisturbed in his gentle life, will be found with his covey threading his still way through the familiar field stubble. The propensity of the fox to double and return to the same ground when pursued by the hounds is his only and fatal weakness. He gains somewhat by crossing his own track and baffling the scent of the dogs, but he loses all when he passes within forty yards of the concealed hunters, who can choose their own ambush. Sometimes he runs off a few miles in a straight line, and then the hounds lose courage as they miss the cheering of their masters, and they also do not like to be "Parted from their ancient ground."

When they quit the chase and return, the fox will be found very little behindhand—the whole party being guided by the back track. I know of an instance where the same fox, as the hunters very well knew, was started in the Ulster Mountains opposite Poughkeepsie, and run off toward Rondout for several times in succession. He always followed the dogs home promptly. The same is seen in migratory birds, as the wild ducks, foraging for a few days about the same pool, until the season compels a somewhat extended flight, or the blackbirds lingering about some secluded grain field.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The acquaintance which animals have of the region they thus ramble over is wonderfully intimate. The partridge follows the windings of the airy paths of his woodlands as if they were beaten tracks. Flush him ever so suddenly with the pointer, and you will not find him uncertain which way to take. He will burst through the best opening in the thicket, scale the knoll where the birches are rooted in the rock crevices, then, setting his wings, will sail down the opposite slope, sliding under the flat boughs of the hemlock, and, curving round the hazel-bush to make it a screen, will hide himself in another of his coverts, and all without brushing a leaf with his whirring wings, which play like those of the humming-bird. So, too, of the night-trampers; the fox, in his wanderings by many a still moonlight, has trotted up and down every little water-course, followed the zigzag of every fence, smelled and scratched for field-mice around the old stumps, listened to the barn-yard music from the edges of the wood, caught sun-naps rolled up in the dry autumn grass, passed and repassed by ways of his own, to and fro, over almost every foot of his domain. When Sir Henry Lee, in "Woodstock," wants a guide to help young King Charles run Cromwell's pickets, Scott, whose last pride of old age was to excel in marking the fox, makes him say: "No fox ever earthed in the chase knows the country for ten miles round better than Martin the Verdurer."

We may know what animals may be found in any new locality not more surely by their tracks than by the food which Nature provides. "Where the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together." I have seen the woods sheared of their foliage by a kind of caterpillar; then came wild pigeons to feed upon them; then multitudes of hawks to prey upon the pigeons. In like manner we may always know what migratory birds to expect first in the spring, by observing what food and nesting-places Nature has first made ready. That class of birds which seem about half-domesticated, as the robin, the wren, sparrow, and bluebird, no doubt build earlier, because their affiliation with man provides food and protects their nests; while the thrushes, and such children of the thickets, wait longer for food and the growth of leaves to hide their homes.

But the woodcock and his cousins are our earliest housekeepers. His haunt is where a secret spring oozes up from the depths of the marsh, keeping warm with its gentle boiling a large space of the shaky area. This never freezes; the first snows are melted in a few hours by the warm breathing of the parent earth, and full winter, not buries, but only bridges the spot with ice, from whose under side the large drops have been all the winter falling. When spring as yet only makes signs, and winter is scarcely failing even, this covering is worn away, and we are cheered by circlets of the greenest grass, made yet brighter by a setting of stubborn snow, with a ribbon of the same color reaching down to the nearest water-course. Here, also, he finds his early food; for insects and worms drew themselves thither as the cold came on, and some, whose species pass the winter in a state of torpidity, here keep up life at the edges, surface, or bottom of the pools. Upon a dry box or hassock is placed the simply-constructed nest. Early in spring, when the rills brim with snow-water, and the wind from the snowy hill-tops yet chills the sunshine, the bird and nest and surroundings of brown grass appear so entirely alike that, unless you catch the gleam of the eyes, which stand out from the head like beautiful beads, the animal and vegetable life would seem blended together. In some old-time Irish rebellion a certain Fenian Head Centre plunged into a native bog up to his very mouth, hiding his head, also, under an impending turf. Being detected, nevertheless, he was curious to know how he was discovered. "I caught," answered the Celtic sleuth-hound, "the sparkle of your eye."

Birds which live upon the ground—which means also those which are ground-colored, for brilliant plumage is found only in bright foliage—are not easily discovered during sitting time. The finest scented pointer will then almost poke his nose against the nest without starting the occupant. So, too, during the moulting season in August, it often seems puzzling how woodcocks are not flushed when the finest dogs beat every foot of the finest grounds. The explanation is, when birds have been for a long time quiet with feathers closely contracted they give no scent. Sometimes a dog, to his master's great delight, will start a bird on ground that a rival has just hunted over. He is put down as an animal of superior scent, when the truth is the bird, stirred up by the first, gave scent to the second.

Last autumn a young English nobleman was hunting with an American cousin in the valley of the Hudson. The Englishman had undeniably the better dogs, and Yankee pride was humbled daily. Finally, it became known that the blacksmith had what he called a Russian Pointer with wondrous moist nose, and he should sustain the national honor. The patrician puppies first hunted a small swamp, and came out saying, unqualifiedly, in their quiet, convincing way: "No birds here." Then the Russian Pointer, realizing, doubtless, the good feeling between his country and ours, walked down slowly and magnificently into the swamp, with his shining head thrown back, and, halting, pointed out the bird. A very extravagant offer to buy, and an unwise refusal followed, and neither for a sufficient reason. It was an instance where the second chance was the best. Sometimes, indeed, old hunters, relying upon their dogs, will prefer to follow after another party.

Birds usually live fast, have quick pulse, voracious appetites, and active digestion, with much insensible perspiration; by which last they are scented. But they may also, during certain pe-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google riods, as incubation and moulting, assume a reduced condition of vitality, and adapting food and motion, nutrition and consumption, to each other, thus keep smouldering a slow fire of life—just as the human pulse, which, braced by exercise, will beat seventy-five, may, by persistent quiescence, in something like health and half life, be reduced to forty-four. In short, they move little and eat little; and all animals, man included, live as they move.

This condition of not being seen or scented during incubation is an important provision for the safety of those birds which live upon the grounds, for their nests and themselves would otherwise be more exposed. The same is true of moulting, which is a kind of teething period, when the birds are diseased, and of course unfit for food, and unwilling, and in some degree unable, to fly; for when woodcocks are hunted at this season in the corn-fields they will run in the furrows before the dogs, and when started will fly in a low, straight line; while in October, when the plumage is full and vigorous, they will arise straight up out of cover, as if tossed up by a spring-board.

Of bright-colored birds the plumage of the male is always more brilliant, and this also is an important fact for the safety of the household. Although each sits on the nest by turns, the female has by far the greater home care, and her more subdued and sober colors are less likely to attract danger, while the conspicuous ornament of the male bird serves often to divert it. Many a truant bird-nester has been fooled by the open, noisy demonstrations of a dandy chewink, now become an active, shrewd, and courageous father; while the quiet little Quakcress of a mother, in charge of the house and all the treasure, cowered demure and still among the leaves. And against natural enemies stillness is the best security. Almost all animals have fine scent; but keep still, and you surely will not be heard, and, even though imperfectly hidden, probably will not be seen. You may "snake" for a quarter of a mile to get a shot at ducks; break the smallest twig, and your labor is lost; but go first to the pond and wait in perfect stillness, and they will alight within a hundred feet, although you were so imperfectly concealed that they saw you at once though they did not notice you.

OLD MRS. HUNTER.

ALMOST the first object that met my eyes at Stormy Beach last summer was a stout lady dressed in black, and bearing in her person the marks of age and sickness. She was sitting in the summer-house on the bluff; and as I had hurried there on my arrival to catch the long-desired glimpse of salt-water, I may say I made the acquaintance of the ocean and old Mrs. Hunter nearly at the same moment.

The lady, however, was more forward in her advances than the waves. She scanned me a moment through her glasses, and then addressed me with that languid interest that old persons indulge in with the young and enthusiastic. I am not fond usually of making haphazard acquaintances; but this old lady was evidently a person of refinement, and the frankness of her remarks amused me. She did not hesitate to state at once the reasons of her being at Stormy Beach—her ill-health and the deplorable condition of her eyes; upon which topics she might still have been dilating had not the hotel gong rung and diverted her from the subject. I did not know at the time, what I afterward discovered, namely, that Mrs. Hunter was very fond of disinterested attentions. Men and maids she had at beck and call, but their services were paid for, and thus not satisfactory; to be waited on by those on whom she had no claim was one of the gratifications of her life. Not being aware of this foible, I did not feel called on to assist this stranger up the path to the house; but when I saw her trembling and uncertain steps I conquered my selfishness and arose to follow her. At that moment a sportsman, with a dog at his heels, came directly across Mrs. Hunter's path; his rapid approach startled the old lady; she did not see the dog, which jumped round her feet, and she would have fallen headlong had I not caught her, and saved her at the cost of a bad strain to my wrist. She was a dead lift, and the shock made us both ashy pale. I tried to laugh it off, but I was in agonies of pain, and Mrs. Hunter never could treat lightly any thing occurring to herself; so the house was soon in possession of all the details, and I was installed as Mrs. Hunter's particular friend for the rest of the summer. It is never very pleasant to be patronized, and had Mrs. Hunter been a younger or more vulgar woman, her kindness might have been obtrusive; but, as I have said, though spoiled by a long life of self-indulgence and prosperity, she was a lady, and my position was happily one which made me entirely independent of any one in that narrow circle. So Mrs. Hunter and I got on admirably together, and I could thus study a new page in the interesting book of human nature. My wrist pained me for a week, during which time Mrs. Hunter, who roomed next me, was almost constantly by my side. The friends with whom I was temporarily placed were disgusted when they came into my room and found her sitting day after day, sawing back and forth in my only rocking-chair, whiling away the time with long stories about herself. But I was not as bored as I might have been by the recital: there were many points in these narratives that interested me, and little by little Mrs. Hunter's history, from the time of her early privations to the present moment of affluence, was spread like a map before me. She had had two sisters, brought up, like herself, in great poverty, though their family was one of the best in the country: they had all married, but she only had secured wealth, the eldest being won by a worthless man of insinuating manners and great

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

personal beauty; the youngest by a country clergyman, respectable, but without talent. To both these women, therefore, poverty had clung close as the garment of Nessus; while it was left to Mrs. Hunter, the sickliest, the plainest, and probably the least intelligent, to find a rich, respectable parti, and to float down the stream of life, flags flying and drums beating, a living illustration of the partiality of fortune. The sisters were both dead, and Mrs. Hunter spoke of them with the same indifference with which she mentioned the departed Mr. Hunter, who had left the world about the same time, making his widow his sole legatee.

She had long been accustomed to her blessings, but there was one privation she never could or would be resigned to; she had no children to whom she could leave her property. Over this only want of her later years she "made her moan" with a frequency wonderful to witness. I wanted to say to her, "Mrs. Hunter, do you suppose that Fate would make an exception in your favor of the universal rule, and give you every thing you want? Did you ever see any one in the world without a grievance, and do you expect to be different from your race?" But she was an old woman, so I said nothing; and Mrs. Hunter went on maundering as before.

She had two relatives, however, equally near to her, and to one or both of these, she informed me, she meant to leave her comfortable fortune, when no longer able to enjoy it herself. These were the children of her sisters. The eldest, Mrs. Winship, had left a son, Howard, a very handsome young man, according to his aunt, and altogether worthy of the high place he held in her regard.

"He is coming down here in a day or two," said she, "and then you will see him. He is a most elegant young man, and devoted to me, almost like my own son."

"What a treasure he must be!" said I. "And how about the other nephew—is he coming too?"

"Oh! the other is a girl," said the old lady, in a very different tone; "and to tell the truth, my dear, I am almost sorry I asked Howard to bring her down. Esther is a good young woman—a very excellent person, indeed; but she is not fitted for society, and she is so terribly plain!"

"Tell me all about her," said I. "I am plain myself, and I take an interest in ugly people. Do describe her."

"No, I can't; it is too much trouble; and besides, you will see her for yourself. Don't call yourself plain, my dear; beside Esther Carr you are as handsome as Helen."

"She must be dreadful," said I, shuddering.

"No, not that, by any means, but so unprepossessing that it is hard to love her; and I frankly own I never could stand having her much with me. That was what her mother wanted, and I really meant to have her live with me after she left school; but it wouldn't do. She staid with me three months, and then I sent her home to her father and step-mother at the rectory. They have younger children, and as they are poor, I dare say she works hard enough for them all."

"Poor thing!" said I; "it is a sad destiny."

"So you think, my dear; and so I think," said Mrs. Hunter; "but you may be sure she likes it. She never complains; and when I send her pocket-money on quarter-day she says it is more than she needs, and gives it to the children. Now, you know, if she chose to keep the money for her own purposes (and I wish she would) no one could take it from her; so you see it is because she has no elegant tastes, and don't know how to spend her money properly, like a lady."

I did not take this view of the case exactly.

"In a large family with small means," said I, "it is quite impossible to cultivate elegant tastes, Mrs. Hunter. I dare say your present keeps the whole family afloat."

"Well," said Mrs. Hunter, "I have no intention of supporting Mr. Carr's family, or himself either; but I would give Esther twice as much if she ever would look decently. But she can't; her hands are as red as beef-steaks. Now you notice her, my dear. I don't mind telling you that I sent her two hundred dollars by Howard to pay her expenses here and buy herself some nice clothes, and you'll see how she looks!" and Mrs. Hunter nodded her head several times oracularly.

"I don't mind telling you," she said again, "because I know people may blame me about Esther. But she is her own worst enemy. Do what I will I can not help it."

"She must be amiable," said I, "to be so kind to her little step-brothers and sisters."

"Well, she is one of those people that must be always doing something. I never saw her sit without employment for an hour in her life. I believe she thinks it a sin. What she will do here with all these gay people I can not think. But she has never seen the sea, and as I had asked Howard, I could do no less than ask her too."

"I think you were quite right," said I. "If she enjoys the ocean as much as I do she will be most grateful for your kindness. Then her cousin will be here, and he can entertain her, and perhaps she may make friends even with these gay people. I know one person who, though not very gay, has taken an interest in her already."

"You are very kind to say so much of my niece," said Mrs. Hunter, benignly, "and I fully appreciate the attention. As to Howard, I know you will like him. He is my idea of what a young man should be. But as to his playing the attentive to Esther, that can hardly be expected. In the first place, he is so very fond of me that he never lets any one else engross me when he is near. And then he dislikes Esther; he says she is so nervous and blundering; and it can't be wondered at, they

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google are so different. Who would think they were sisters' children?" And here the old lady returned to the one grievance, and dropped the thread she had unwound for my benefit.

Mrs. Hunter had by no means exaggerated her niece's ugliness. When I saw her at tea the night of her arrival I did not wonder that a person with such a regard for appearances as the aunt should regret having asked to Stormy Beach a doleful-looking protegée like Esther Carr. She was tall, and had a nice figure; but her dress did not fit her, and her manners were diffident. She had great, sleepy-looking brown eyes, a bad skin, and dark hair, which, though not ugly in itself, grew down within an inch of her eyebrows. Altogether she was not nice-looking, and my sympathy began to die away at the prospect. She hardly spoke a word at the table, and received little attention from Mrs. Hunter, who was pondering on the wisdom that Howard Winship poured in at her left ear. This youth was as regularly handsome as his unfortunate cousin was plain. No one could find fault with his features, yet the result was not as pleasant to my eye as to that of his affectionate aunt. He was perfect as the wax gentleman in a barber's window; but there was an expression on his pink and white countenance that was weak, if not sinister; and no barber's block ever had such a disagreeable leer in its witless eyes of glass.

For some days I saw nothing of Esther Carr; I was off crabbing and boating with my own friends, and came home too late to cultivate her acquaintance. This provoked Mrs. Hunter extremely; she was very requiring, and having got accustomed to my society she could not bear to be without it; but I did not feel bound to humor her whims, and consequently let things take their course.

It was the fourth night after Esther Carr's arrival that, as I was undressing about eleven o'clock, I heard in the room next me a continued sobbing, low but sorrowful enough to rouse my interest. I knew that Esther had changed her room that day to be nearer her aunt, and I was convinced, therefore, that it was she, and no other, who was thus grieving in secret. I felt so badly to think of the poor girl alone with her trouble among strangers, that I hesitated hardly a moment before I prepared to take her castle by storm. I rearranged my dress, and, knocking gently at her door, begged in a cautious whisper to speak to her for a moment. After a long delay Esther Carr came to the door, and in a husky voice asked my wishes. Fortunately I had a woman's tact, and in a troublesome knot in a lace I found an occasion for asking assistance. The girl brightened up in a moment and came into my bedroom with an eager step.

"Do you like to do things for strangers?" said I, watching the reflection of her red swollen eyes in the glass as she undid my dress.

"Oh yes! very much; but I have no time at home, every moment is taken up with mamma and the children." Here her face clouded up, and she burst out anew in a trickle of tears. She was home-sick, poor child! and I, having once been at boarding-school, knew how to feel for her. I pushed her gently down in the rocking-chair, Mrs. Hunter's vacant throne, and putting my arms round her, kissed her with an emotion I could hardly account for myself. Then the sluices were opened, and Esther Carr, in all her native goodness and simplicity, stood revealed before me.

I can not begin to tell the miseries that this young and inexperienced girl had suffered from during her probation at the Beach. She had left a home where she was the chief counselor and friend to come among people who took no interest in her, and from whom her diffidence and want of knowledge of the world compelled her to withdraw herself; she knew she was unprepossessing, and had no means to make herself attractive; her aunt had found fault with her from the first moment of her visit, and her cousin, for whom she had evidently no regard, had not ceased to favor her with the sharpest criticisms. In short, she was thoroughly unhappy.

I listened, with many friendly expressions. The girl so frankly lamented her own shortcomings, was so evidently attached to her simple home, and showed so much regret at Mrs. Hunter's dissatisfaction with her, that I saw she was a real jewel, though plainly and poorly set.

"Aunt Hunter is so displeased with me for having no taste in dress," she sobbed; "but how can I help it? We have but one store in our village, and I need but the plainest clothes there. I suspect if Aunt Hunter saw me ironing father's shirts and the baby's frocks every week, she would not wonder that my hands are so red and coarse. Why," said she, drying her eyes suddenly, and looking me full in the face, "I dare say if some of these rich, idle people were to know what lives clergymen's families live in those little country villages, they would lift their hands and eyes in disgust. I never realized before the tremendous gulf between the rich and the refined poor. It can not be bridged over."

"Yet you are happy at home?" I said.

"Yes, I love them all so much, and they love me. I am so useful there; every leisure moment is a direct boon to be valued and enjoyed. Here the days seem endless."

"Your aunt means to be kind to you," said I. "Don't you ever talk freely to her? I think you are capable of interesting her very much if you chose."

She gave me a despairing glance. "I never by any chance say the right thing," she replied. "I can manage my father's whole congregation better than I can satisfy Aunt Hunter and Howard. Why, Miss North," she went on, "how could we be one on any point? We have not an idea in common."

I pondered for some moments without speak-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ing, while Esther buried her face in her hands and sobbed, but more gently than before.

"Does your aunt wish you to go to the ball next week?" said I, at last. I fancied that Mrs. Hunter had been unusually trying that afternoon, and that, perhaps, this ball in prospect had furnished the text for additional reproof to Esther.

"Oh yes, she has made up her mind that go I must, and it terrifies me to death. I can't dance, and I have no ball-dress; indeed I never needed one before."

"Any white dress will do," said I, "and every girl should see a dance once in her life, at least. I will take care of you among my friends, and promise you a pleasant evening in advance."

Esther sighed. "I have no dress whatever that will do. Indeed my wardrobe is quite unsuited to such a place. It is not my fault, however—" And she stopped.

"Whose fault was it?"

My opinion of Esther Carr would be affected by the use she had made of the two hundred dollars sent her by her aunt. According to my views of honesty she was bound to spend the money as Mrs. Hunter had directed, in fitting herself with clothes. I therefore felt anxious to know that she had not misused the gift or even diverted it.

"You can get what you need here," said I. "There is a dress-maker who often furnishes the ladies with goods; but her prices are high."

"I have no money to spend in that way," said Esther, blushing. "My aunt was very liberal to me when she invited me here, and sent me a large sum for my wardrobe; but it failed to reach me, except a small part, which I kept for traveling expenses."

"Did you tell Mrs. Hunter and your cousin? They would have made it all right to you, of course."

She blushed again.

"I have not told my aunt, it would only annoy her. Indeed, she has not asked me directly any thing about it, and as to my cousin, he is not the one to help me."

I watched her keenly, and in a moment guessed the truth.

"If your cousin has withheld the money from you on any pretense whatever, you do wrong, I think, in not telling your aunt. Pardon my plainness, Miss Carr, but you are near splitting on the rock that has foundered so many young persons. You are putting yourself in a mean position to shield a mean action. Don't do it, or you may suffer for it all your life. Tell the truth, and let the blame fall where it belongs."

"I have promised not to tell unless questioned. The person will restore the money as soon as possible, he says."

I smiled. I had known scores of such promises made but never kept. Those who take what does not belong to them will keep it to the end.

"You will tell the truth, if asked?" said I.

"Yes, most gladly; but till then I am dumb."

"Let us talk of something else, then." And I turned the conversation to pleasanter topics.

This affair in which I had interested myself ended differently, however, from what I had hoped. When Mrs. Hunter, lured on by a few remarks of mine, finally learned from Esther that Howard Winship had kept back nearly all her present, she showed none of the righteous indignation that I had anticipated. She made up the money to Esther as if she were doing her a double favor, and, sending for her check-book, presented to her erring nephew twice the amount of which he had defrauded his cousin.

"Young men must have their pleasures," she said, coolly; "and, besides, he would have paid Esther, I have no doubt. She is such a silly child she does not know how to spend money even when she has it." And this was the end of that business with Mrs. Hunter.

Not so with me, however. After this I watched Mr. Winship more carefully than I had ever done before. Indeed, I had a right to do so, as it soon became evident to every one that this pink-and-white Adonis was devoting himself exclusively to my humble and unobtrusive self. Whether it was the reputation of being an heiress, which in some way had fastened upon me, or to please his partial relative, whose favorite I still continued to be, I know not; but certainly my most attentive swain at Stormy Beach that summer was the elegant and unscrupulous Howard Winship. He was deficient in intellect, and, though cultivation was not wanting, his mind was of that arid sort which produces only the most stunted crop. He had, however, his wishes and aims. To be the best-dressed beau, the best billiard-player, and the most elegant lady's-man at the Beach was his evident ambition. His deeper plots were not so patent; but I perceived that one was to cast out Esther Carr from his aunt's affection, and place himself in the vacant niche in her heart and will, and another to enjoy to the fullest extent consistent with caution every opportunity for dissipation. Many a night, when old Mrs. Hunter was safely tucked in bed, dreaming, perhaps, of her model nephew, this same youth was assisted up the private staircase near my room by a couple of kindred spirits, who had been gambling and drinking with him in a neighboring bar-room. His voice was so peculiar that it could not be mistaken; and I often wondered that the curses, "not loud but deep," in which he indulged on his return from such orgies were not heard by others as well as myself; but nobody ever seemed the wiser, and I, of course, held my peace.

The night of the ball my charming friend was the pink of propriety. His mustache was waxed to an inch of his ears; his little feet pattered about the room in the most elegant patent-leathers; and no gloves could fit more faultlessly than did those of my hero. Yet his appearance did not excite half the remark of that of Esther Carr, who, gotten up by myself and Mrs. Hunter's maid, shone out well-dressed and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google almost handsome for the first time in her life. A white dress made to fit her handsome figure, and proper arrangement of the hair, altered her into a striking woman. She was more at her ease, too, than usual; and surrounded by acquaintances who were too well-bred, or too indifferent to criticise, she lost her diffidence and enjoyed the scene as much as any one. Mrs. Hunter surveyed her long through her glass.

"My dear, what have you done to Esther?" she said at last. "Why, she looks quite like the rest of the world. I am very much obliged to you, for I know you have taken all this trouble for me."

"Not at all, Mrs. Hunter," said I. "I like Esther so well that I have done it for the pleasure of the thing."

"You can't make me believe that," said old Mrs. Hunter, shaking her head. "There can't be any real affinity between you, I am sure; you are a woman of the world, my dear, and my niece is not. It is only your kindness to me that makes you feel so."

"I admire Esther extremely," said I again, "and I am really interested in her, Mrs. Hunter. Her very peculiarities are delightful, and place her above ordinary people."

"I don't know who you mean by 'ordinary people,'" said Mrs. Hunter, bridling up and looking rather hurt. "I confess that, for my part, I dislike nothing so much as eccentricity, and I call Esther a very eccentric person. But don't let us quarrel about her, my dear," she added, as if poor Esther was too insignificant even to discuss. "Here comes Howard to ask you for the Lancers, and he is one of the family who I hope will not be outstripped in your regard by any one."

Poor Mrs. Hunter! If she had known all the sentiments her precious nephew excited in me she would not have seen us walk off to the top of the room with the subdued rapture that now brightened up her visage. But that she never knew. Mr. Winship's selfishness dwelt on the top of his character. It existed, too, in such boundless measure that he could have furnished out ten heirs-apparent, and not have shown a deficiency. My delight (and rather a mean one I now think it) consisted, when in the society of that sweet young man, in stirring up this froth on the surface, and seeing it foam and bubble.

"How well your cousin looks to-night!" I now said. "Your aunt and I were talking her over, and we concluded that she was a very stylish-looking person."

Howard's little bead eyes dilated with rage.

"It is the first time my aunt ever admired Esther, I am sure, her looks are so much against her, poor girl! She has found a good friend in you, Miss North; she owes much to your kindness."

"Not at all; she owes it to her own sweet temper. But does she not look well?"

"As well as she can look. But I doubt very much the expediency of bringing her to such a place. It will give her a taste for pleasure which may make her discontented with her own simple home."

"I have no fear of that," said I, warmly; "she likes her family too much. But why, Mr. Winship, should Miss Carr not know more of such pleasures? I confess I see no reason."

"She has no opportunities, her circle is so narrow."

"Not so narrow but that it contains some excellent friends. Your aunt likes your cousin better than ever before, and will become in time dependent on her society. As for me, I am not a very illustrious person, but I do not intend to lose sight of your cousin, I assure you." As I said this I looked at Howard, whose inward disgust could hardly be concealed.

"You are entirely mistaken as to my aunt," he said, with a sneer; "she does not alter in her feelings so easily. Her likes and dislikes are strong and lasting."

"One would think you had some stake in the matter," said I, coolly, "or naturally you would prefer my view of the subject!" and I again surveyed him, after this impudent remark, with a look of considerable contempt.

Now Howard Winship was a fool in many things, but a streak of cunning was not wanting. He saw he had gone too far; and, with the agility of the moral mountebank, he changed his manner with the next figure of the quadrille. I will not repeat all he said and did. He affected to ridicule Esther, and then to pity her; he made the most of her foibles and timidity; and seeing nothing was of avail he dropped the subject entirely, and began to flatter me in a style overstrained and nauseous. I could see he was afraid of my influence with Mrs. Hunter, and to make me Esther's foe or his own fast friend was the object of these blandishments.

In the mean time the evening sped on, and Mr. Winship would not allow me an instant's relief from his society. His little feet had pattered through all the dances that I would dance with him, and still he dogged my footsteps up and down the room.

"Do go away, Mr. Winship!" I said, at last, "and look after your aunt a little; she must be weary of all this noise and confusion!"

"Is there nothing I can do for you especially?" said Howard, with a tender glance out of the brown beads.

"Yes, something I am dying to ask you, but you may decline."

"No, on my honor! only try, and you will see how willingly I shall obey your commands."

"Well, then" (a gentle timidity manifested on my part), "go and ask your cousin to dance."

A blank look of horror now appeared on the face of my devoted.

"But she does not dance," he faltered.

"No matter; it is a kind, cousinly attention, and I wish you to pay it." And he went, and troubled me no more that evening.

All this time I had been watching, in the intervals of dancing, over the fortunes of my

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google friend Esther. She needed no active assistance from me, for she had now made many acquaintances, and her diffidence abated as she felt herself more at home in the hotel. She was the particular friend of all the children in the house, and this evening she had spent in playing games with them in an adjoining room. Here she had been occupied for some time when I saw her again walking the piazza with a meek-looking stranger who had arrived that evening by the late stage. The young man looked like a theological student, and Esther was talking eagerly, contrary to her usual habit, and endeavoring to make her friend enjoy himself—thus gratifying at the same time her own unselfish nature. It was just then that I sent off Howard, and not five minutes after Esther came to my side with her friend in tow.

"This is Mr. Maclay," she said, simply, "a great favorite of my father, and a new-comer at the Beach. I hope, Miss North, you, who know every body, will be so kind as to introduce him to some young ladies. I have known him from childhood, and can answer for him any where!" And she laughed a laugh which Mr. Maclay echoed in a tone not unlike a bray. I took an interest in this youth from the first glance. He was odd-looking enough, to be sure; but this arose partly from his straight, soapy hair. His face was pleasant, and it was evident that he had brains, from the few words that fell from his lips even now. I had no fear, therefore, to bring him up before Mrs. Hunter for judgment, and I did so at once.

Really this was a pleasant evening, and every one went to bed—with the exception, perhaps, of Mr. Winship—with a feeling of satisfaction that is not often the result of ball-room gayeties.

The next morning a terrible reverse of this feeling came to me. As I was sitting in my room with Esther, after a surf-bath, a letter arrived. This letter I had long expected from a European port. I had anticipated the pleasure of receiving it and my satisfaction in the news it would contain; but, alas! the letter was in a strange hand. It told me coldly, as only strangers can, that terrible suffering and probable death hung over the dearest friend I had in the world. This was all; few particulars were vouchsafed, and no hope, although another line was promised in a week, to tell the result. My first thought was to keep my secret, even from Esther, so I took up my work and tried to continue the conversation, but I found it impossible. A sudden dizziness stole over me, and when I came to myself I was in Esther's arms, and still alone with her.

"Oh, I am so thankful you are better!" she said. "You have been so pale I thought you would never wake again; yet I would not call any one—it would have filled the room up and made such a talk!"

My looks must have spoken my gratitude.

"I bathed too long this morning," I said, "and I am not strong to-day. If this is not the whole truth, Esther, it is enough for the world to know."

"Quite enough," said Esther, her ready wit catching the idea; "and here is your letter, Miss North; put it away safely, for it might attract curiosity."

"Esther," said I, "I hate half confidences, but sometimes they are unavoidable. For one week, certainly, I must bear the agony of a most cruel suspense. How I shall endure it here, with all these curious, gossiping people, I do not know. To go away suddenly would excite remark, and that must not be. Help me through with this trial, if you can."

"I will," said Esther, and she took me in her kind arms with a sisterly embrace.

Perhaps if I had debated the subject with myself I should have decided not to trust even Esther with this confidence; but, for once, impulse was better than matured reflection. During the wretched days that I spent in my chamber Esther was a pillar of strength to me, keeping up a continual battle with people who wanted to come in my room and ask me questions. At the end of three days I was obliged to dress myself and appear as usual, or I should inevitably have been rooted out, stock and branch. In the mean time Esther was plied with questions. As she sat on the piazza outside my window, sewing, I could hear the passers-by stop and deliver their fire. How? what? when? why? were the unfailing demands, and the reply was always the same:

"Miss North had fainted after coming from the bath." And that was all.

Not so easily put off was old Mrs. Hunter. "Well," said she, angrily, "you won't make me believe that a surf-bath could make a healthy girl ill for three days. There's something else at the bottom, I know, and if it's a love affair I shall certainly warn Howard immediately!"

"Aunt Hunter," said Esther, sharply for her, "pray don't get up any ridiculous reports about Miss North. I was with her the whole morning of her illness, and it happened just as I told you. It would be very unkind to make so much out of it. Miss North will see you when she is able, and you will perceive that she has been really ill."

Then I saw I must show myself, at the risk of more merciless criticism; and I did it as I would have gone to execution. All this time Mr. Winship was not failing in polite messages and attentions; he made me sherry-cobblers without end, and sent them regularly to my room every morning. He wrote little notes on note-paper, watered with his monogram, "H. H. W." for "Howard Hunter Winship," inviting me to ride, to drive, to walk, to play croquet, and do every thing that an invalid can not possibly do. In vain, of course; and when I finally left my retreat, it was not in Mr. Winship's society that I found the change I needed. No, strange to say, another person now divided the attention of Mr. Winship's clique. No other than Mr. Maclay, who, somewhat improved

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in appearance by the efforts of the hotel barber, and with great powers of conversation, utterly extinguished the unfortunate Howard. Mr. Maclay was not a theological student, but a young man of ample fortune and respectable family. He had been well educated, and though without the society manner, he had such a fine character and such firm principles that duplicity and meanness fled before him. Even Howard Winship stopped gambling on the sly, and renounced the private staircase. Some little bird, perhaps, told him that "propriety is the best policy" when one is running a race for a wife and a fortune, and he thought best to make the sacrifices for a time at least. One of Mr. Maclay's talents was shown by his great success in getting up all sorts of pleasure-parties, both by land and water. In all these Esther took an active part, owing to his influence. His interest in her was so evident that I wondered if it were only, as she said, the result of long intimacy, or whether something deeper lay below. On her part, I could see, the idea of any body so plain as herself creating any warmer feeling than that of friendly regard was entirely foreign. She had been brought up to toil and poverty, and enjoyed this transient gleam of pleasure, though she knew it could not last. She was one whose religious principle lay deep in her character, and she accepted with patience and gratitude both the sufferings and alleviations of her lot.

It was curious to hear Mrs. Hunter's remarks on Mr. Maclay. Before she knew his social status she lost no opportunity of sneering at him. "One of those beggarly clergymen, my dear," she said to me in private conference, "with a loud voice, and no end of conceit! I hate the whole tribe! they are a pest to society! I do hope he won't marry Esther! I shall never forgive her!" "A good excuse," thought I, "to leave Esther unremembered in her will." Therefore, when the truth came out that Mr. Maclay was a gentleman-farmer, of good principles and large property, I hastened to impart the fact to my elderly friend. "I am glad he is well-off," she said; "and if he is respectably connected, as you say, it would be a nice match for Esther after all: he is not at all to my taste, but it would be a great load off my mind to have Esther comfortably provided for." Thus she reasoned, and so she twisted things to suit her own views. If Mr. Maclay were poor, she would disinherit Esther for marrying him against her wishes; if he were rich, Esther would not need her money, and she could leave it where she chose. Indeed, but for one little incident that occurred about this time, Mrs. Hunter never could have been convinced that her nephew was not a paragon and she his idol. This incident arose from Howard Winship's determination to eclipse all the festivities of the season by a gigantic water-party, ostensibly in my honor, but really to extinguish the remembrances of Mr. Maclay's successful attempts in the same line. There was more fuss about the arrangements of this party than any one except Mr. Winship could have made on so trivial an occasion. I know I was tired to death with hearing about it, and hoped fervently I might escape it altogether; and strangely enough, I did escape. Mrs. Hunter and I drove to the place of embarkation together, but our driver was stupid and missed the road, and by the time we arrived at the landing the yacht had long disappeared, the captain having taken the advantage of the breeze nearly an hour before. Glad was I to return quietly to the hotel; but Mrs. Hunter was any thing but satisfied. Though not able to go herself on the expedition, she had done every thing to forward it, and I believe had intended it as a grand finale to Howard's attentions to myself. The result caused an explosion of temper on her part which was senseless and quite unbearable.

"Mrs. Hunter," said I, quietly, "you are forgetting yourself and our relative positions; this affair is of very little consequence, and warrants no such anger; I request that you will let the matter drop. For my part, I am glad to have missed the party, of which the whole idea is utterly tiresome!"

This plain speaking did Mrs. Hunter good. I suppose that the truth had rarely been told her in her life, and it created a new sensation in her mind. When, however, we reached the hotel, and found from another driver that the party had waited for us on the dock till the last moment, Mrs. Hunter gave in like a spoiled child, declared she was sick with exposure to the sun and vexation, and took to her bed, complaining with an energy which surprised while it diverted me.

The unfortunate water-party meanwhile were suffering all the discomforts of a changing atmosphere. About the middle of the afternoon a dead calm took the place of the wind after a small hurricane had come tearing out of a black cloud, and made us really anxious about our friends. Then about eight o'clock a steady rain set in, and Mrs. Hunter, really sick with fright and nervousness, sent for me to her room, and made me an humble apology for her rudeness and pettishness. I sat with her all that evening, and she, throwing off for once her rind of self-deception, confessed many of her failings, and deplored her worldliness and hardness of heart. Indeed she well might. Diseased, tottering on the brink of the grave, how sad was the view opening to her eyes! How should she face the dread uncertainties of a strange existence whose spirit was so fettered to this? Even with that withered hand, so shriveled and yellow, had she done but lately a cruel injustice. She had taken from Esther Carr the prospect of a comfortable old age, and condemned her, by an unjust will, to poverty and privation.

"I have left it all to Howard," she said, "and sometimes it troubles me; I fear I have done wrong!"

"You fear you have done wrong!" I said,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

my face glowing with indignation. Mrs. Hunter's will was certainly no affair of mine, but I felt how unjust it was, and my soul burned within me.

Mrs. Hunter turned away her head on the pillow, and said nothing for a moment.

"It is money left me by my husband," she said at last, deprecatingly; "and Howard is my favorite, he loves me the best, I know."

"You are mistaken," I said, gravely. "I can not measure the depth of Mr. Winship's tenderness, but I know Esther's worth. She loves you much, and, besides, she is really grateful for your kindness. If the time ever comes to test the affection of these relatives, believe me you will not find Esther the least affectionate or devoted."

Mrs. Hunter lay again motionless for some time.

"You do not think this a question of preference," she said at last.

"By no means; I consider the disposition of time and money a matter of duty. In that world to which we are all hastening, and where we must give a strict account of our actions, it will not be a sufficient answer that our tastes led us to commit this or that injustice. By the great tests of love to God and obedience to his law of righteous dealing shall we be judged, and by that alone shall we stand or fall."

I stopped, feeling I had been too frank with a person so much older and more experienced than I, but Mrs. Hunter was not angry—she was in one of those softened moods that come upon us all at times, and, taking a religious work that lay near her, she asked me to read to her, while her maid was sent below to inform her niece and nephew of her illness as soon as they should arrive.

It got to be two o'clock, the storm growing wilder and wilder every moment. Wondering where in the world the unfortunate pleasure-seekers could be, we sat hardly exchanging a word, and looking equally pale and ghastly. But such apprehensions are almost always overstrained. Just as my watch told me it was three in the morning I heard a rumbling at the door, and a subdued sound of voices on the piazza, and in another second Esther Carr, wet to the skin and pale as ashes, rushed into her aunt's room, and threw herself down beside her.

"Oh, Aunt Hunter!" she said, evidently very much frightened, "Anna says you are ill, that you have been frightened to death about us—is it really so?" and she looked at her aunt with a glance so full of affectionate interest that I was sure even Mrs. Hunter's dim eyes saw it. She kissed her for the first time with real affection as she felt her wet clothes.

"Yes, I have been very ill and anxious, but it will not kill me this time; are you all well and safe? Where is Howard? He should have come to me."

"He is behind in the open wagon, aunt; there was but one stage, and the ladies were crowded into that;" and she went on, standing in a puddle of her own making, to describe the troubles of the day, in part arising from Howard's bad generalship. There had been much annoyance but no real danger, and I dragged her, smiling at last, to her room to change her wet clothes. Mrs. Hunter felt already much better.

"When Howard comes," she said, "I shall feel easy. Let us all keep still so as to hear him arrive."

Poor Mrs. Hunter! To the silence she enforced she owed one of the cruelest moments of her life. We heard a wagon drive up, and the gentlemen spring on the piazza. Then Mrs. Hunter's maid came forward and gave Mr. Winship his aunt's message, the others having walked into the hall and left him alone. Twice Anna spoke to him before he answered. Then he lifted up his unmistakable voice, and exclaimed, so loud that it seemed but three feet off,

"Confound that old woman! The deuce take her and her messages!"

Mr. Winship did not see Mrs. Hunter that night. When he came to her door he was denied admittance, and indeed for two days the old lady was obstinately invisible to the unconscious object of her wrath. Had he broken every commandment of the Decalogue I am quite sure his aunt would have forgiven him, but to be confounded as an old woman was more than her temper could bear. He had, by those few words, uttered no doubt in a moment of artificial excitement, wounded her self-love and vanity beyond remedy, and never again was he to her the petted favorite of old.

Nor was this all. Mrs. Hunter before she left the Beach altered her will, and, as it afterward proved, distributed her property with complete justice. Disappointment had enlightened her reason, and it was to Esther she clung in those sad days as to one who had never deceived her.

But now my own affairs took a new turn. Another letter arrived, of a brighter import, but requiring my presence in town. I had therefore no choice but to pack my trunk, kiss Esther with real sorrow for good-by, and meet Mrs. Hunter's reproaches with all possible amiability.

"'Tis too bad!" said she, as I went in her room for the final adieu; "I never took such a fancy to a stranger in all my life, and now you are going away, what shall I do without you?"

"You must keep Esther with you for the rest of the summer," said I, smiling, "and when cold weather comes you can together make me a visit in town."

So indeed it was arranged, but such plans do not always come to fruition. When December arrived Mrs. Hunter was in that land where all worldly schemes are set at naught forever. Esther Carr visited me indeed, now no longer a poor dependent on a rich relative, but herself a rich relative with a train of poor dependents. "So the whirligig of time brought round its revenges," and all through a few foolish words

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google spoken in an unlucky moment. Howard Winship was not left totally unprovided for. A comfortable income, payable out of the estate, was left him for his life, and Esther, who felt as if her good fortune must not be all her own, paid up his debts and set him free once more before the world. Yet he was not grateful. Such people as he never are. Though his aunt had not failed to let him know why his legacy was withheld, he never ceased, even before Esther and me, to accuse her of injustice and favoritism. It was only a few weeks after Mrs. Hunter's will was opened that this disinterested young man paid me a morning visit at my own home in town. After telling me of the fortune left to his cousin, and of sundry legacies to charitable institutions, he failed not to recount his own wrongs with a pathos that in a different cause would have brought tears to all eyes. My own were perfectly dry, however, as were also my remarks upon a proposition which he hesitated not to lay before me on the instant. This youth's vanity was so inordinate that I soon perceived that he thought this tribute of admiration on his part necessary to my happiness. He had come to the conclusion that my attentions to his aunt and cousin, and my illness and depression at Stormy Beach, were but the effects of a passion for him which I had vainly attempted to conceal. Judge of his surprise, therefore, when I informed him that not for a thousand worlds would I make myself the slave of his selfishness. Indeed, long before his brown beads had attempted a glance of admiration in the direction of my humble self my destiny had been settled on a basis of respect, confidence, and affection, such as his weak character could neither excite nor satisfy. He has offered himself since, I hear, to the young lady whose two hundred dollars he so condescendingly borrowed on a former occasion, but she has not been more amiable to him than myself, being in a somewhat similar situation, engaged to be married to a person she thoroughly esteems, no other than our unfashionable friend, Mr. Maclay.

But enough of Howard Winship and last summer's experience. Old Mrs. Hunter, after all, has not lived in vain. She has watered the earth with her bounty, and made the hearts of many afflicted ones to rejoice, as the parched meadows revive after the rain.

CIVIL WAR AND SOCIAL BENEFICENCE.

THE "History of the Sanitary Commission," by Charles J. Stillé, Esq., of Philadelphia, one of its members, allows us to write these two hostile expressions close together. It may be a question whether this history should have been written so soon after the war, or precisely at this period of the war, we might more truly say, while the members of the Commission and the prominent workers in it are still alive, and personal feelings of every kind are so warm as to affect judgment on the work accomplished or intended. It may be questioned whether such a history should be written at all, seeing that the operations of the Commission are tolerably familiar to our own people, and can possess no great value to any besides. The contributions which the Commission made to Sanitary Science can not be regarded as of much intrinsic or general value. Its own supplies of knowledge were drawn, always largely, at first wholly, from European sources. And its seventeen monographs, admirable as they were in themselves, and serviceable as they were on their occasions, were rather adaptations of existing knowledge to pressing emergencies than additions to the stock of information on hand. What was best, what was most precious and memorable in the Sanitary Commission, is precisely what can not be told in a history: namely, its unexpectedness, its impulse, its glow, its inspiration, the moral enthusiasm that called it into existence and swept it along in its course. There was nothing very peculiar in its form of organization, its methods of procedure, or its modes of action. Take the spirit out of the Commission and little remains to interest the public at home or abroad. And the spirit can not be conveyed in a volume—not even in one so candid, clear, comprehensive as this. Besides, is not this a little like letting the left hand know what the right hand did? There is no boasting in these pages, no fine writing, no decorative or magnificent rhetoric; still, an aroma, like the breathing after fame, pervades the book, and gives a not disagreeable, but yet a distinct flavor of self-conscious importance to it, which reminded us of that text in the New Testament to which we have alluded.

But all this is aside from the question. Whatever proprieties may have been violated, here the history is—a part of it at least—a noble volume, telling the whole splendid story at large and in small, with all the facts and the figures, the tables and the views, the statements of receipt and of expenditure, lists of members and agents, in fullness and detail, sufficient to satisfy any admirer and any caviler. The story, if long, is interesting. It will vindicate the Commission, so far as it may still need vindication in any quarters; and it will give complete knowledge of its work in quarters where it may be revered less intelligently than it deserves to be.

Our Civil War had few peculiarities that an American cares to remember. It had grand features of hope, faith, patience, endurance, heroism, consecration; but it was not especially remarkable for these. Other people have exhibited zeal as hearty, valor as splendid, fortitude as amazing, and devotion as pure. The immense breadth of our country, the vast multitudes of our population, the universal and popular character of our enthusiasm, displayed these fine qualities on a scale never approached before; but the qualities themselves were not peculiar to us. The striking peculiarity of our war consisted in its being the war of a free peo-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ple, led by an inspiration higher than they were conscious of or were quite ready to believe in, toward an end which only their prophets saw in vision. The lesser peculiarities, which are spots on this great glory, were the strange unconsciousness of danger; the singular unpreparedness for an emergency that had been threatening for months, not to say years; the superstitious confidence in our beneficent stars; the childish trust of the people in the wind caused by the waving of their bright swords, in commanders who had never led a battalion, and in soldiers who had never smelled powder; the short-sightedness of statesmen who had spent their lives in watching the signs of the times; the stubbornness of officials in all the great departments; the stupid imbecility of the Government; the general incoherence, indecision, inaptitude, dreaminess, doltishness, and almost levity that prevailed during the first few months of the conflict.

The first five chapters of the volume before us exhibit all this in a truly pathetic manner. Our bureaus were comparatively new, yet the keys to the drawers were lost, so that no access could be had by those who wished to deposit fresh and precious information inside. The secretaries were fixtures against the diplomatic wall. The cabinets were immovable, and the departments, though absurdly small for the apparatus they ought to contain, could not on any consideration be enlarged. Nobody would see that the journey marked out must extend a long distance beyond the next turn in the road, over rough, untrodden, miry, and rocky ways; and all persisted in believing that the respectable family carryall, with its good, safe horse, which any old woman could drive, would answer all the purposes of the route. It is painful and even shameful to remember all this. The story of the Sanitary Commission will do as much as any thing to make us forget it; for the Commission worked nobly against it from first to last, obviated many of the difficulties that were incident to it, anticipated many of the dangers that would have proceeded from it, prevented many of the calamities that must have ensued in consequence of it, made amends for the defects, came to the rescue of the imbecilities, and by besetting the Government behind and before brought the hearty faith of the people to bear upon the emergencies as they arose. The impotencies of the Government called out the potencies of the people. The uprising of the general loyalty showed itself in the steady equipment of regiments. The uprising of the general heart showed itself in the support of the Commission. Other people have given proof of their enthusiasm in war. Our people have set the example of an enthusiasm in mercy, as much more beautiful as it is more wonderful.

But the charity of the country was as incoherent and promiscuous as the patriotism. Exuberant and ebullient enough, it would have undone itself if it had had its own wild way. If the first army of soldiers resembled the mob that followed Walter the Penniless to the Holy Land, wasting away as it went, through its lack of wisdom and its superabundance of faith, the first bands of beneficent workers came near losing themselves in the wilderness of their own ecstasy. With trembling zeal they busied themselves at labors of which the best that could often be said was that they were innocent. The lint-scraping did no harm; and the Havelocks had no worse effect than driving the men almost mad from the heat they caused about their necks; but the dainties that were put up by careful hands at home would have sickened the healthiest troops, if a kind Providence had not arranged that they should be sent off in the wrong direction. There was no aim or concert in the beneficence. Private affection, family pride, class preference, State prejudice were all at work breaking up its mass and interfering with its flow. The bounty ran sadly to waste; the kindness was turned to unkindness; the benevolence led to jealousy and heart-burn; the inefficiency of the Government was rather increased by the means that were taken to mend it.

The service that the Sanitary Commission rendered to the country by enlightening and guiding the benevolence of the North can not be too gratefully appreciated. It was a hard and to some extent an ungracious service, for it involved the necessity of administering rebuke where people are most sensitive; of chilling enthusiasm where chilling seemed most uncalled for; of reproaching as prejudice what seemed the most natural predilection; and of substituting for the many strong feelings that were impelling the women to good works the one impersonal and somewhat indefinite passion of loyalty to the Government and devotion to the General Cause. We all remember how well the burning orator of the Commission, who was its president, discharged this service; if we did not, this modest history would leave us less well informed than we should be.

The most remarkable passage in the financial history of the Commission, and the most momentous passage in its existence, was the romantic and thrilling beneficence of California. This Dr. Bellows relates himself, as he alone could, for he was the only member of the Commission who visited the Pacific coast in its behalf. The brilliant chapter in which this part of the story is told illustrates the peculiar character of American earnestness. California was distant from the scene of war two thousand miles by land, and five thousand by water; almost an independent country—too far from the centre of national life to feel very sensibly the care or the protection of the Government. Its population had been rapidly drawn together by the hope of sudden riches, and were devoted to all that makes up the sum of material civilization. They had too many excitements of their own to be much moved by ours; and it would not have been at all surprising—seeing how lit-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tle understanding of the war we had ourselves—if they had regarded it as a struggle between the Atlantic States which did not greatly concern them either in its causes, its principles, or its results. They were, on the whole, "Republicans," it is true; for the New England element was large among them, and that is always favorable to civil liberty. But there were many Southerners there, too, who made up in intensity what they lacked in numbers. They occupied leading places at the bar; they exerted the most powerful influence from the pulpit; they held the military offices in the harbor and on the coast. The fashion and wealth of San Francisco were mainly in their interest; and such aristocracy as there was was theirs. Leaving out of account the mercurial temper of the people, "their quick and contagious affections," it would be difficult to understand how even their abounding, lavish, inconsiderate generosity could have been turned into the channel of the Sanitary Commission. They who undertook to ask for it were timid at first, and set their aims low. But before the stream had more than cleared its channel it became a freshet. Giving to the relief of the soldiers of the Northern army soon swelled to a rage, a wild fanaticism. "The whole city," says the Report of the Committee of the California Branch, "seemed to be thrilled as with an electric shock; and the talk of the groups on the streets, the merchants on 'Change, boys in the gutter, of men, women, and children, was the movement for the relief of our sick and wounded soldiers; and every loyal man's heart beat in active sympathy with the work." This was more than could reasonably be expected; but this was the smallest part of the wonder. "Men of every political party gave—whether Democrats, Republicans, or even Secessionists; and there was no sect of religion that was not represented in this noble army of givers. Christians gave with loyal self-denial; Jews as earnest sympathizers with the suffering; heretics as citizens of a Republic to be saved; and men of no religion with an ardor worthy of the humblest devotee. The representatives of every nation gave—English, German, French, Irish, Chinese, Italian, Hungarian, Russian, Spanish." The employés of all the great corporations and manufacturing establishments, whether belonging to private individuals, or to companies, or to the Government; the scholars and teachers in the public and private schools entered heartily into the work, and helped to make it a festival of charity. Benevolence burst out in great jets of humor that tumbled rollicking through the land—the most extravagant devices were resorted to for raising money. A white pullet, sold to five or ten successive "highest bidders," brought over one hundred dollars. A box of immense strawberries was sold for a gold dollar each berry, the largest being purchased for one hundred and twenty-three dollars. One man carried a sack of flour on his back from city to city, and town to town, selling it wherever he went for all it would bring, till he had made the rounds of that Israel. Having exhausted California, he came with it to New York on his way to St. Louis. It collected as much as forty thousand dollars. The California story is one violent extravaganza. Money given in this fashion was flung away in frolic, rather than bestowed in charity. More than a million of dollars was pitched into the Sanitary Treasury in this jocund style. The other Pacific States swelled the sum: Nevada, Oregon, Washington Territory, Idaho, Colorado. The mania spread to the Sandwich Islands; Vancouver's Island caught the fever, and even Peru found something left in her well-drained silver mines for the soldiers of the Union. We do not mean to say that all these contributions were secured without effort; but the effort was not at all proportioned to the result.

And this leads us to remark on the incidental character of the events on which the whole of this great history turned. People were constantly, all through the war, lifting up their hands in astonishment, as if Providence had specially interfered in their affairs. The lines of influence ran so near to the surface that they were every moment or two cropping out. This is always the case in times of great excitement; what is deepest comes to the top; feelings are all a-quiver; the nerves of motion are laid bare, and any passing touch, though no heavier than the atom of a feather, was pretty sure to fall on some sensitive part and cause a thrill to run like lightning through the whole social organism. Incidents that in ordinary times would be insignificant, in such electric seasons attract special attention, and are really of extraordinary moment. We saw this continually during those five passionate years, both in political and in military affairs. The history of the war for the first two years was a history of accidents. The Sanitary Commission itself was an accident.

In one of the last days of April, 1861, two men accidentally met in the street, and talked about the alarming condition of the country. One was Henry W. Bellows, the other was Elisha Harris. A meeting had been called at the "Women's Infirmary" to consider what could be done toward meeting the exigencies that were pressing. The result of that meeting was a resolution to call a larger one in a more public place. Dr. Bellows worded the call, which was numerously signed, and the meeting was a large one. The result of this meeting was the organization of the "Women's Central Association for Relief." It being necessary to obtain information respecting the actual or prospective needs of the army, Dr. Bellows applied at the head-quarters of the Medical Department of the army in New York. He came away from this interview satisfied that the enterprise he had engaged in was unnecessary and perhaps officious, and he publicly said so. This rebuff led to closer inquiry, to wider consultation, and to a determination on the part of several associations, among them "The Associa-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tion of Physicians and Surgeons," to send delegates to Washington and ascertain at the seat of government whether any voluntary action on the part of the people could be made serviceable. The conception of the Commission was talked into shape little by little at this and subsequent visits to the capital. The horrible condition of things, and the stubborn opposition or stolid indifference of the officials, made the talking arduous, close, and protracted; but it made it searching, exact, and thorough. To meet objections was to devise plans; to overcome obstacles was to lay the ground-work for new enterprises. By the time the authorities had given their assent to the proposition of volunteer relief, the forms it was to take, the objects it was to effect, and the scope it was to embrace, had all been worked out. But to frame a plan was one thing; to get it into effective operation was another. A new series of "accidents" contributed to this.

The Commission was called into existence by a deep solicitude for the safety and health of seventy-five thousand men, who had left their homes for a short period to put down, it was expected, a rebellion of considerable though not very formidable dimensions. Fifty thousand dollars, it was thought, would be enough to meet all the reasonable expense of thorough inspection and faithful supply of deficiencies in medical equipment and stores. Boxes and bales came in on call, and the small room in the Cooper Union presented a busy scene. For the first six months all went on very easily. The army was close about Washington, and was in no crying need of supplies. But, as time went by, as the army increased in numbers, as the battalions moved away from their base, as exposure and fatigue brought on sickness, as inspection became more imperative and more difficult, as the needed machinery grew complex and costly and hard to obtain, as the work augmented in every particular of detail, as effort rewarded by success called for new effort to make success good, as call came fast on call, and duties on duties multiplied, the want of money was severely felt. Supplies of clothing and stores poured in—a steady if not an overflowing stream; but money was as important as supplies, and money was scarce. Expenses were heavy with the people; the cost of equipping regiments was thought enormous; the necessity for pecuniary aid for orphans and widows and unsupported families was urgent. The necessity for aid to the soldiers was not perceived. The Commission had not reputation enough to command or to attract contributions of large amounts; many different societies all over the country were soliciting subscriptions for army relief, and the consequence was that the work was menaced with fatal obstruction at the critical moment when its importance began to be felt.

It was precisely at this moment of suspense and embarrassment that succor came from an unexpected quarter and gave to the Commission its new birth. Two years before this, Thomas Starr King, a clergyman of the Unitarian faith, of brilliant reputation as a lecturer and pulpit orator, had left Boston for San Francisco to take charge of a parish there. Excessive labor at home and in the lecturing field had impaired his strength and worn upon his spirits; he was burdened with cares, he was embarrassed in finances; his fame as a preacher was high, but was slightly tending to wane; his popularity as a lecturer was wide and warm, but it was not on the increase; and the labor requisite to sustain it, coupled with the fatigues of travel and the physical exposures to which that wandering life is subjected, was already too much for an elastic but sensitive frame. He had for some time thought of removing to another field of labor. The Western States and the Pacific Shore both tempted him. San Francisco held out the greatest sanitary and pecuniary inducements, besides being more exciting to his imagination, and he went thither in the spring of 1860.

That decision of his proved the salvation of the Sanitary Commission. His adaptation to the place and the people was wonderful. He drew all hearts to him in a moment. Great audiences gathered to hear him speak. His lectures were in demand far and wide. His rich voice, his glowing face, his bright smile, his cordial manner, his sweet spirit, his resounding periods, and his rhetorical exuberance, made him a universal favorite in all the region. He more than repeated in the cities of California the triumphs he had achieved in the cities of New England and the Middle States. At the time of the breaking out of the war he was the most widely known, the most popular, and the most electrifying speaker on the Pacific slope. His lectures, fresh and vital, treating of a great variety of themes, with great freedom, full of bright thoughts from a bold and enlightened mind, had flashed the characteristic ideas of New England politics and morals into every spot which could collect an audience of men and women. He was known every where, and every where he was beloved.

The war found him ready. The audiences that had assembled to be fascinated by his wit assembled again to be thrilled by his loyalty. He recalled the early history of the nation; he revived the memory of the Revolutionary glories; he held up to view the majestic figure of Washington; he sketched the eventful periods through which the country had passed; he explained the significance of its ideas and the import of its institutions; he placed in strong lights the advantages of union and the perils of disunion; he laid bare the schemes of the Southern politicians; he poured scorn and derision and invective on the heads of the men who would break up a liberal government for private and partisan ends; he made the people feel that the cause of the Union was their cause, and that they were responsible for their share of the expense that must be incurred for its preserva-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tion. It used to be said—and was affirmed by high authority—that Mr. King saved California to the Union. Of course that was an extravagance. But it is no extravagance to say that he secured California to the Sanitary Commission.

An intimate friend of Dr. Bellows, and in frequent correspondence with him, he was aware of the difficulties that beset the Commission, and was immediately interested in meeting them. It was doubtless through his influence, in great part, that the first one hundred thousand dollars was raised. That one hundred thousand dollars was the making of the Commission. It was more than half as much as had been received from all quarters in the preceding fifteen months of its existence. So splendid a demonstration of beneficence, attesting so deep a confidence in the new agency, attracted universal attention, provoked rivalry, and stimulated ambition in a remarkable manner. In one month the receipts went up nearly two hundred thousand dollars. From the date of November 1, 1862, there was not for eight months less than two hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars cash balance in the treasury at the close of each month; nor, with the exception of two months (December and January 1863-64), ever less than one hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars. That first installment of California's splendid bounty—that first one hundred thousand dollars—besides being the parent of vast sums for the soldiers, was more than the stimulator of the Commission itself. It emboldened the managers to strike out at once into a larger policy; it confirmed their purpose and their ability to resist all the sectional and local schemes for sending relief to particular departments of the army. It encouraged the contest against powerful Branches which were disposed to set themselves up as rivals, and one of which was on the point of taking the field as an independent organization, dividing the interests and the endeavors of the general public. It so enlarged their capacity for extending and perfecting their machinery as to virtually compel all the numerous Relief Associations to avail themselves of their arrangements and agencies as being more economical and effective than any they could devise or set in motion themselves.

The immense advantage in many ways of a common agency—competently equipped, ably administered by responsible men, central in position, unsectarian in character, broad in policy, having the confidence both of the government and the people, and controlling all the open facilities—can not be estimated too highly. In a struggle like ours, which was a struggle for National Unity, all jealousy was deplorable. Sympathy in benevolence, harmony of domestic and social feeling, co-operation of all with all and for all, was important in view of the charitable work to be achieved. But it was even more grandly important, as adding the force of a united sentiment of fellowship in suffering and sacrifice to the force of a united purpose in war. We were fighting for more Unities than one. The political unity of States was the primary concern; but a unity of feeling among all the people—a unity of kindness, a sentimental unity of compassion, the gathering together of multitudinous hearts of men and women for the purpose of alleviating one another's sorrows and binding up the wounds of one another's beloved who were stricken and dying, was a concern, if not so instantly urgent, yet as permanently deep. This last unity was, indeed, the more vital of the two. If that had existed the other would never have been disturbed. When that shall be established the other will be a matter of course.

It seemed at the time that the Sanitary Commission was disposed to carry things with a pretty high hand, and showed an inclination to browbeat and overbear other organizations whose purposes were as holy, and whose spirit was as devoted as its own. Its tone was complained of as imperious—and perhaps it was; but on the whole—in view of the terrible mischiefs that spring from sectarianism in this country—we are led to think that its plan was wise and its supremacy fortunate. It did undoubtedly help to make the people one in the bonds of a universal fellow-feeling. This would have been lost if the Commission had received only its limited share of local support; that is, if it had failed to make itself a National Organization. And it would have failed if California and the other Pacific States had not chosen it as their almoner.

So much has been said of the influence of woman as a cheerer, comforter, and inspirer during the war; of woman at home, in the hospital, in camp, and on battle-field; getting up fairs, conducting correspondence, organizing auxiliary associations, nursing the sick, and catching the last words of the dying, that it is unnecessary to say many words about it here. The blessings of our free social life were never so beautifully demonstrated and illustrated. Woman in America is not an ornament to society merely, but a constituent part of society. The general interests of the community are hers. She is in the habit of thinking with the general mind, and feeling with the general heart. The country is her country; the war was her war; the Sanitary Commission was as much her protégé as it was her patron. She was more valuable to it than it was to her. She would have loved and labored and devoted herself without it. But without her it would not have lived a month; without her it is doubtful if it would have come into active existence at all. It is certain that it would have been shorn of the greater part of its strength, and of nearly all its inspiration. It would be an affront to the women of the country to say that their sacrifices were any thing remarkable. They only wait for an opportunity to make similar sacrifices all the time. They reveled in this opportunity of breaking the alabaster box of their hearts, and pouring out the precious bal-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

sam on the feet of the Crucified. They exulted in the privilege of showing that they were broadly human; that they had brains to plan, hearts to feel, souls to dare. Their pent-up aspirations broke out through the limits of routine existence, and proved that, without overpassing the lines of the feminine sphere, they could satisfy themselves and at the same time influence society, politics, and war.

Mr. Stillé's volume amply vindicates the Sanitary Commission against objections that were brought against it during the period of its greatest activity, and are still now and then urged by people who misunderstand its purposes, or are ignorant of its achievements. It used to be said frequently, and it is said still, that its organization was unnecessary—that the Government was fully able to meet all the emergencies of the war. But unless we suppose that the Government neglected to do all it could, this assertion can not be maintained; for the Government did actually come very far short of satisfying the demands of the soldiers in camp and hospital. Its incompetency was glaring. The preparations it made in advance for the comfort of an army about entering on a campaign were lamentably insufficient; and the resources it was able to call in when the campaign ended disastrously were equally scanty. Time and again, in most critical passages, the Commission came to the rescue of the Government, and was the means of saving hundreds if not thousands of lives through its timely assistance. In the construction of hospitals, in the institution of homes, in the establishment of feeding stations and convalescent camps, in the operations for the special relief of men returning from rebel prisons, in arrangements for the comfortable transportation of wounded soldiers by ambulance-wagon or hospital-car, in setting up agencies for the adjustment of war claims, in making provisions against special diseases like scurvy; in short, in every important detail of measures for the prevention or the cure of the miseries arising from the war, the Sanitary Commission was in advance of the Government. Often it had the field of labor and the labor all to itself. It is no unqualified disparagement to the Government to say this; for with us the Government is not the same thing that it is in Europe. Its reserved forces are conceded to be in the people, whose vigilance, activity, and sympathy are taken for granted at all times. Not the ultimate authority by which the Government acts merely, but the vital power with which it moves refers back immediately to the popular will and heart. The whole nation is, in a certain sense, the Government. It lends impulse, it accepts responsibility, it supplies momentum and direction. Where our Government stopped movement did not stop. The Sanitary Commission was simply a new expression of popular government. It was the nation governing itself in an extraordinary emergency by unusual methods. The Government did not break down for the very good reason that the governing people did not break down. The regular administration was inadequate, and the reserves came up, that is all. But the regular administration was inadequate, and if the reserves had not come up there would have been unspeakable disaster.

After the battle of Antietam the medical supplies furnished by the authorities were not one-tenth of what was absolutely needed. A large stock had been accumulated at Baltimore; but the Medical Department relied on the Quartermaster's Department for transportation; and the Quarter-master's Department, considering the wants of the well more important than the wants of the disabled, held back all but a very small quantity, which did not reach the battlefield for several days owing to the destruction of a bridge. The Commission had its own wagons in charge of its own agents, moving with the army through the whole of that campaign. Two large wagons, each accompanied by an inspector, were kept all the time well up to the "front." Others followed in the rear with full supplies. A loaded train was dispatched from Washington every day, and for several days after the battle they continued to come in. But for these provisions the condition of the wounded of Antietam would have been frightful to contemplate. Besides doing its own work on this occasion, the Commission was able to do the Government's work besides, by transporting stores from the Medical Purveyor's office in New York to the Government dépôt at Frederick.

The services of the Commission at Vicksburg and Chattanooga were cordially appreciated by the officers of the army. At Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville it was, as usual, on the ground, and all ready to furnish relief in any quantity and kind required. General Meade bore grateful testimony to the efficiency of the volunteer work after the battle of Gettysburg, when, anticipating a second fight, he moved away from the field with his medical staff, leaving behind him more than twenty-two thousand men, whose condition required not only immediate, constant, and skillful care, but a large quantity of hospital conveniences.

At the opening of the campaign of the "Wilderness" the Commission employed two steamboats and two barges to convey stores from Washington to the base of the army, and forty-four four-horse wagons to transport them to Fredericksburg; in this way sending more than two hundred tons of supplies to the points where they were most needed. At the same time it had nearly two hundred Relief Agents, including the Field Relief Corps, the Auxiliary Relief Corps, and the Special Relief Corps, busy all the time giving their personal attention to the wounded. As all this was none too much it is fair to infer that its proffered aid was not superfluous. When we add that the Sanitary Commission was not the only voluntary organization that was at work on several of the occasions we have mentioned, but that the Chris-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tian Commission was in the field, and several State and Soldiers' Aid Societies were represented by their agents besides, the charge of supplying a fifth wheel to the Government coach is nothing less than ludicrous.

Nor is it true—from this volume—that the Commission embarrassed the Government by usurping powers that did not belong to it. That Government officials threw great obstacles in its way at starting is probably true; for they did not at once comprehend the design of the organization, and they were naturally jealous of interference. No doubt the projectors of the Commission assumed a lofty tone in pressing their cause, urged some things which it was humiliating to consider, and pressed some claims which it was unpleasant to allow. They were importunate and absolute. Their criticisms had an impertinent and intrusive sound. Their demand that the Government should either remove or place in honorable retirement a Surgeon-General who did not favor their plans carried an air of dictation with it that would have been offensive but for the imperative nature of the case. Mr. Lincoln did one day ask one of its officers if he wanted to "run the machine." But the Commission never intended doing more than supplement the action of the Government; and when its operations were fully under way it was seen that it did no more. It urged on all its agents the necessity of observing the rules of official etiquette, of respecting form and discipline. It addressed itself always at first to those in authority, obtained their sanction where necessary, and was careful not to cross their path. We have searched this history carefully for examples of intrusive interference, but can find none that indicate a purpose to transgress the bounds of respectful and courteous action. The character of Mr. Olmstead, who represented the Commission in Washington through all its formative period, who had charge of its practical organization, and came into most frequent and close communication with the Government, would of itself be a sufficient guarantee of scrupulousness in this regard so long as he was there. After he left the relations of the Commission with the Government were too well understood to be compromised by indiscretion.

Mr. Stillé does not conceal the fact that the continued existence of the Commission, after its immediate objects were accomplished by the cessation of the war, was a cause of irritation "to certain high officials;" but he maintains, and justly, we think, that this irritation, like all the rest, was, on the whole, a healthy one. All governments would be the better for popular criticism; but only popular governments are directly accessible to it. If the Sanitary Commission had been the only pungent critic in the first year of the war its censure might provoke comment. But fault-finding was universal. The daily papers gave voice to fierce rebukes and denunciations. The mouths of men were filled with bitter complainings on a score of matters. Nearly all remark was caviling. The Sanitary Commission only gave one form of expression—a form emphatic and practical, but respectful and reasonable, to one phase of the general discontent; a phase, too, that was suggested by the deep anxiety that friends and lovers felt for their darlings exposed to unusual perils. The remonstrance was useful. But for its earnestness and its prevailing power the war would have been conducted in a very different spirit, and, possibly, with very different success. With such a rival as the Sanitary Commission was, the Administration was forced to make efforts, if only to satisfy the people, which would not have seemed possible under ordinary circumstances. Those who did the best service themselves, whether in the army or out of it, have the least to say about its officiousness.

Another crime of which the Commission has been popularly but vaguely accused, is extravagance. The charge was not a strange, or, at first sight, an unreasonable one. The gentlemen composing the Commission were reputed wealthy and free-handed, accustomed to spend liberally for themselves, and to do whatever they did in the most costly way. Their views were large; their projects were conceived on a grand scale; they would have the best of every thing, and enough, let the expense be what it might. Stories of waste and carelessness came up from the army. Men from the farms were said to be feasting on delicacies such as are found only on the tables of epicures. Jaunty officers told of their sending out to the Commission for potted chicken and brandy peaches to make their comfort complete. Vast sums of money came in to its treasury. The cash receipts were nearly five millions of dollars. The supplies were estimated at fifteen millions. At the close of the war the treasury contained a quarter of a million of dollars. These are large sums; but whoever will take the trouble to examine the ample tables of receipts and expenditures contained in this volume will see that it is all satisfactorily accounted for, and will, perhaps, wonder how so much was accomplished. Unless these figures lie sadly, the Commission practiced economy instead of extravagance. Compared with other departments of war expenditure its work was done cheaply. The cost of the management was very slight. The three hundred agents it employed on an average during the war received about two dollars a day for labor, half of which, at least, was highly-skilled, some of which was of professional eminence, and worth from five to ten times that amount. The twenty-one members of the Board—all men of ability, reputation, and heavy professional responsibilities—received no compensation, but gave their services and time gratuitously. Their traveling expenses alone were paid, and these not always. There probably never was an organization of men whose hands remained so clean after the touch of money, or who were so little suspected of harboring

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

a mercenary spirit. If they were extravagant, it was that the soldiers might want nothing that would do them good—not that they themselves might feather their nests at the nation's expense.

The credit for what was achieved hardly belongs to one of the chief actors more than to another. The cause enlisted eminent and varied talent. The fertile projector and eloquent advocate, the man of profound scientific attainments, the man of large medical experience, the clear-headed organizer and manager of affairs, the accomplished tactician, the able financier, were all called on for the utmost of their ability, and they gave it. The work of keeping alive the public interest by addresses and correspondence devolved on the President; the executive labor of engineering the enterprise through the immense practical difficulties that beset it at head-quarters fell to the General Secretary. All worked terribly. The whole Board held twenty-three sessions, lasting four or five days each, usually in Washington. The Standing Committee met daily for a period of nearly four years—as many of them, that is, as were not absent on some tour of inspection among hospitals or on battle-fields. Such devotion is extremely rare, even when it is handsomely remunerated. When given gratuitously on so large a scale it is unexampled. It would have been marvelous in ordinary times; but then in ordinary times it would have been impossible. The popular excitement ran so high that it came in great floods fully up to the level of this personal consecration. More envied these gentlemen their labors and sacrifices than pitied them. Instead of being praised especially for their zeal, they were regarded as peculiarly fortunate in the opportunity they had for turning it to good account. Multitudes would have been thankful to do what they did, and bewailed the incapacity and the obscurity or the unluckiness that prevented them. The hard-working members of the Commission were looked on as privileged people, who traveled about the country, visited camp and battle-field, saw the war in all its phases, were taken into the confidence of statesmen and generals, were admitted behind the scenes of the great drama that was playing, were clothed with authority and covered with benedictions, were consulted, listened to, looked up to deferentially, and in addition to all this, enriched by the consciousness that they were helping on the dear cause which all had at heart. Thousands would have welcomed their "deprivations" in exchange for the dull routine of their own uneventful lives. Happy men! who could fling off their restlessness in work, and quiet their souls by consecration! The sufferers were those who remained at home and read of what others were doing.

The Commission floated on the wave of a tremendous popular feeling. That feeling was the splendid thing, after all. That was the wonder—the uprising of a people's heart; the outpouring of a nation's sympathy; the spontaneous and exuberant devotion that could not contain itself or confine its munificence to one channel or to any channel, but overran all bounds, took strong men away from their moorings, and made the proud and the humble alike willing instruments of its behests. Outbreaks of patriotism are not uncommon in history. That flame is often fed by fuel that is not sacred. Pride and defiance and fury—the wrathful nitre, the fierce sulphur and pitch—contribute to make the fearful glare which seems to so many a holy fire, but which thoughtful men contemplate with mixed feelings of triumph and of sadness. The spirit of patriotism is apt to be a spirit of anger and bitterness. The people start to their feet in indignation; the breath that inspires them is the breath of war. But this spirit has in it no element that is impure. It is more than love of country; it is love of humanity. It obliterates class distinctions; it disregards sectarian and party lines; it fuses together the native-born and the foreigners; it crowds loving-kindness into the very thick of battle; it abolishes the difference between friend and foe, between loyalist and rebel. At Gettysburg it heeds only the cry of suffering, not asking from whose lips it comes, and ministers with equal devotion to the defenders and to the assailants of the Union. That spirit promises that war shall henceforth be less barbarous than it has been in former days. Does it not hold out a hope that war shall one day cease altogether? The triumphal achievement of this organized tumult of benevolence is America's noblest contribution to the annals of martial heroism, and the finest vindication of her free institutions.

AUNT SARAH'S OUTFIT.

THE door opened and Milly burst in. A plump figure, a round young face; brown hair blown about the cheeks, whose color was deepened by her rapid walk, brown eyes that smiled in concert with her ruddy lips.

"Half-frozen, aren't you? Come to the fire," said Aunt Sarah. "Was there any mail?" asked Caroline.

"Yes, plenty. Here are the papers—and a letter for father, on business, probably—and another for you, Caro; Nelly White's writing. And what do you think, Aunt Sarah? One for you, all the way from California!"

"From John!" said the good aunt, excitedly, as she put on her spectacles. "Run and call your mother, Milly. She's up stairs, clearing out her bedroom closet."

Mrs. Morgan came down full of interest in her nephew's welfare. She found her sister and the girls in a state of delighted animation.

"Only see, mother," cried Milly, jumping about, "what that good fellow has sent his aunt. A check for seventy-five dollars!"

"Nobody knows that it is for me," said Aunt Sarah; "we haven't read the letter yet. It's for you, girls, just as likely as not."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"No, it's for you. It ought to be, and it is."

"He must be doing well," said Mrs. Morgan, in a tone of quiet pleasure. "Milly, my child, I do believe you are strung on wires. Keep still a while, can't you, and let us hear what John has to say."

Thus adjured Miss Amelia seated herself on the edge of a chair and listened to the reading out of the epistle, not interrupting it by her comments more than half-a-dozen times.

"What a good letter John writes!" said Mrs. Morgan when it was finished.

"Most excellent!" added Aunt Sarah, with emphasis, regarding affectionately the well-formed characters.

"There, you see," said Milly, "it was for you. I told you so."

"The check? Oh yes, he sent it to me because I was the one he happened to be writing to. But he did not think of my keeping it for myself. He meant it for the rest of you just as much."

The girls glanced at each other and at Mrs. Morgan. "Oh, Aunt Sarah!" exclaimed Caroline, laughing. "If there ever was a woman born to be imposed upon!"

"Now I tell you," said Milly, with decision, "that money is for you, and you shall spend it for yourself, every cent. Sha'n't she, mother?"

"Certainly. What a nice time it will be for you, Sarah, to make that visit to Boonville that has been talked of so long! James and Sophia really think quite hard of it that you never spend any time with them; they will be delighted to have you. Pleasant weather is coming on soon, and I don't see that you can do better than to go."

"And you can have a splendid outfit," said Milly. "I'll sew day and night to get you ready."

"Thank you, dear;" and Aunt Sarah pondered the matter. It was evident that the proposal struck her favorably; but, on the other hand, long prejudice and habit were against such self-indulgence.

"It would be pleasant to see James's folks," she said, "and I should like to go over the old place again. All the objection I have is the expense."

"But look at this!" urged Milly, presenting the check. "You're seventy-five dollars richer than you were this morning. You can spend it all, and be just as well off as you were before."

"Spend such a sum upon myself!" said Aunt Sarah, horrified. "What can you be thinking of? But it will make me feel a little freer, I don't deny."

"Now we'll have an early dinner," proposed the active Milly; "and after that you and I will go down town and choose out lots of things. You'll want a new bonnet and mantle, and some dresses and worked pocket-handkerchiefs, and collars, and ribbons, and laces, and—"

"Amelia! Worked pocket-handkerchiefs! laces!—an old woman like me!"

"Not old a bit," said Milly. "You're very nice-looking, and you'll be quite charming when I've spruced you up a little. I intend you shall make a conquest while you're gone; you can just as well as not. Can't she, mother?"

"Don't be so giddy, child. Your aunt will lose all patience."

"And, Milly," continued the lady under discussion, "you mustn't get any extravagant notions in your head. I must have my things made over"—great scorn apparent in the niece's countenance—"and a few new ones, of course," she hastened to add, conciliatingly.

"Aunt Sarah, suppose I should say I would not sew a stitch for you; where would you be then?"

"Badly off, indeed—but you will not be so cruel."

"Don't know. Can't answer for myself if I hear much about making over old things. Now let us talk about what you'll need. There's the mantle, first of all. They have lovely cloths at Hooper's, all the soft, pretty shades. And if you'll just have a circular cut at the dress-maker's, I can make it as well as any body. They are very simple, and here's Wheeler and Wilson to do all the stitching. Unless you'd rather have a basquine."

"A basquine!" groaned Aunt Sarah. "Why not one of those short sacques at once?"

"Why, you wouldn't look a bit badly in a basquine—would she, Caroline? You're straight and slender, and not too slender. However, I'll indulge you there. You shall have a circular—a sober, proper, old-lady circular. Only, if I yield so far, I shall expect to have my own way in other things."

"But, Milly," interposed her subject, anxiously, "I thought of cutting my striped lady's cloth into some newer shape—"

"Cut it, if you like, for mother's rag-carpet; that is all the cutting I shall consent to. And next in order is your bonnet. I was in at Miss Dawson's this morning. She has a few straws and some pretty ribbons; but it is rather early yet, and she is expecting more next week. Then we will select the very prettiest she has, and when it is trimmed in some quiet color, with a rose-bud or two in the ruche, that will be attended to."

"Child, child! And my nice mohair that I've only worn two seasons. Just as fresh and good as ever it was!"

"Aunt Sarah," said Milly, encouragingly, "that's a very good suggestion of yours. Don't be afraid to mention any thing that comes into your mind; it may give me a useful hint. Yes, we'll just rip up the mohair and have it dyed black, and it will come out quite a new bonnet. I don't know even," she went on, with generous concession, "but I'll let you put the same ribbon on again; you keep your things so extravagantly neat. And that will save several dollars for other purposes. You'll always find me in favor of economy when your object is to spend upon something else; it's only parsimony that I can't abet you in."

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-09-19 13:58 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015056090437
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"And now just drop your projects, if you please," said the patient aunt, "and let us hear Nelly's letter. Does she say any thing about coming here?"

"No. She wants me to go there instead." And Caroline read aloud an urgent invitation to that effect. Following this was a description of several new spring styles, which the girls pondered with interest, and felt convinced must be bewitching. The envelope contained besides a collar-pattern and three or four scraps of Miss White's recent dresses.

"Oh, how sweet!" said Milly. "The prettiest spring silk I ever saw. What lovely things she always gets!"

"Yes," agreed Caroline, contemplating it. "If it were green where it is lilac I don't think I ever saw one I should like better for myself."

"It would become you sweetly," said the aunt, and an ambitious project rose in her mind, but she prudently refrained from putting it in words. Milly, who soon returned to the attack, thought her strangely apathetic about the preparations for her visit. Every proposal was met with coolness and the assurance that there was plenty of time, no sort of hurry. "Well," said Milly, in desperation, "there's one thing you'll want at any rate, for I suppose you'll do there just as you do here, and always go around working and helping in the morning—it's a new calico. They have very pretty ones at Hooper's, and if you'll just let me run down and get one, I can tear off the skirt and have something to do."

"Well, to keep you quiet," conceded Aunt Sarah; and the busy niece went off like a small whirlwind. The waist and sleeves kept her occupied next day, and she was tolerably contented. Not, indeed, that her tongue or mind were idle. She decided on the color, price, and quality of her aunt's alpaca that was to be, and bent herself resolutely to the task of squeezing out a handsome dead-lustre silk from the remainder of the seventy-five dollars.

"How one of those heavy black silks would look in summer!" exclaimed Aunt Sarah, with great scorn.

"It might not be very suitable for a girl," admitted Milly. "But there are a great many cool days when it would be nice for you; and, besides, I know you of old, Aunt Sarah. If I don't make you get a silk out of this solid lump of money, you'll have plenty of excuses every time I mention it." The good lady smiled, and offered no defense, conscious that the charge was just. Her niece, meanwhile, pondered quantity and cost, the width of the silk, the number of breadths, but could not satisfy herself.

"Oh dear!" she exclaimed; "these are such unsettled times! You can't tell about the price of any thing."

"No, you can't," agreed Aunt Sarah, with more interest than she had yet shown in Milly's projects. "Things are altering so every day. Now that Richmond is taken we may have peace very soon, and then prices of all kinds will go down at once. It would be really foolish to buy just now. I'll tell you, Milly, you wait in patience for a week or two, and we may get as much again with our money."

This argument had its weight, and no immediate action was urged. A day or two after, Mr. Morgan came in with a package. "Something for you, Carrie," he said.

"By express from New York! What can it mean? I haven't sent for any thing. It looks like Cousin Helen's writing; it is, I'm sure. Well, now, what can it be?"

"Better open it and find out," suggested her father; and this advice being followed, the parcel was discovered to contain yards and yards of the loveliest spring silk. The girls were all astonishment and delight.

"It's just like Nelly's, only green where hers was lilac; and it is a thousand times handsomer; I'd a great deal rather have it. How odd that Cousin Helen should chance upon this very pattern! and how good of her to send me such a present! Wasn't there any letter, father? I wonder she didn't write, but I presume she will in a day or two. I must sit down at once and thank her; I can catch the afternoon mail if I hurry."

"So you like it?" asked Aunt Sarah.

"I should think so, indeed; several degrees more than like."

"Well, I'm glad it suits you. And about your letter," she continued, nervously, "I guess I wouldn't write it just now, because, you see—well, you know you admired Nelly's silk so much—and I thought this would be very pretty; and so—"

"Oh, you extravagant aunt!" cried Carrie. "It's lovely; but you are too bad. And I'm sure I'm delighted; but I feel as if I had been robbing you."

"No matter about that," decided Aunt Sarah, "so long as you are pleased. It isn't every day that I am in funds to make a pretty present, and I thought for once I would indulge myself."

